This treaty, by express terms, had reference only to the canal to be constructed "by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean," but it recognized in the eighth section the possibility of the construction of such canal by way of Tehauntepec or Panama. This treaty did not contemplate the construction of the canal by either Government, but, on the contrary, expressly declared that neither the United States nor Great Britain "will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal." No fortifications were to be erected or maintained by either Government in connection with or in the vicinity of the canal, nor was either Government to acquire any rights or advantages for itself or its citizens in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal not enjoyed by the other. Both Governments obligated themselves to protect any persons constructing the canal from "unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever."

Article 5 of this treaty reads as follows:

> The contracting parties further engage that when the said canal shall have been completed they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guaranty are granted conditionally and may be withdrawn by both Governments or either Government, if both Governments or either Government should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon the passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guaranty without first giving six months' notice to the other.

In other words, the United States and Great Britain guarantee the neutrality of any such canal, but such neutrality and equal use are granted conditionally upon equal obligations, and either Government might withdraw from such obligations if those managing the canal should make "unfair discrimination" or impose "oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls."

It will be noted that under article 5 the United States and Great Britain simply provide for securing fair and equal treatment to themselves by those operating the canal. In order, however, that other nations might have the benefit of the canal upon equal terms, but also with equal obligations, article 6 obligated the contracting parties "to invite every State with which both or either have friendly intercourse to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other States may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated."

Article 8 is as follows:

> The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

This, in brief, is the Clayton-Bulwer treaty made in 1850. It is not worth while here to discuss why any recognition was given, if given, to the claims of Great Britain in Nicaragua or the Mosquito Coast country contrary to the Monroe doctrine. Nothing was said concerning such claims in this treaty, but it did recognize for some reason or other Great Britain's interest in the construction of a canal connecting the two oceans, and Great Britain and the United States assumed equal obligations in relation to such canal and were to receive equal treatment. The canal was to be constructed through territory foreign to both of these Governments, and was to be constructed by private parties or companies. Both nations were desirous that such canal should be constructed and were anxious to further such construction in every way possible. The object of this treaty was to promote the construction of the canal by encouraging, assisting, and protecting those who were engaged in the great enterprise and to insure its neutrality wherever located and to guarantee equal treatment by those operating the canal to all nations entering into stipulations similar to those between Great Britain and the United States. The treaty was entered into "to accomplish a particular object"; that is, the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the two oceans, and also to establish "a general principle"; that is, that such canal, wherever constructed, should be a neutral canal as among all nations entering into stipulations similar to those agreed to between Great Britain and the United States.

After the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty various steps were taken and various enterprises inaugurated looking toward the construction of this canal. In June, 1867, after the close of the Civil War, a treaty was concluded between the United States and Nicaragua by which the citizens of the United States were to have free transit over any canal constructed under the authority of the Government of Nicaragua. From 1872 until 1882 almost every possible route across the Isthmus was surveyed by engineers of the United States Navy, and in 1876 a report favoring the Nicaraguan route was made by a commission of military and naval engineers appointed by President Grant in compliance with a Senate resolution. An international congress held at Paris in 1879 decided in favor of the Panama route. In 1884 a treaty was concluded between the United States and Nicaragua by which the United States was to build the canal, to be owned jointly by the two powers. This treaty was never ratified. De Lesseps's attempt to construct the canal at Panama had been a disastrous failure. In 1887 a Nicaragua Canal Association secured from Nicaragua a concession granting the exclusive privilege of constructing and operating a canal. Surveys were made and the line of the canal definitely fixed, and in 1889 Congress granted a charter of incorporation to the company. After the expenditure of about $2,000,000 operations ceased in 1893, owing to the lack of funds and the failure of Congress to guarantee the bond issue. Congress provided for various commissions to report upon the feasibility and cost of constructing a canal through Nicaragua, and these commissions reported favorably upon the Nicaraguan route and made an estimate of the cost of the same.

In the meantime an international commission of experts made a report upon the feasibility of constructing the canal across the Isthmus of Panama and the whole matter was submitted in 1889 to a new commission provided by Congress, which, after a very exhaustive investigation of all the routes, recommended the Nicaraguan route simply on account of the financial difficulties in the way of acquiring the property of the Panama Canal Co. These difficulties were eventually overcome, and Congress finally adopted the Panama route with the understanding that the Nicaraguan route should be reverted to in case a satisfactory title could not be secured to the Panama property and the necessary concessions from the Government of Colombia.

The Nicaragua Canal Association ceased its operations in 1893, and any hope that had existed of any private parties or company constructing this canal was dissipated, and it was generally accepted that if the canal was to be built, it would have to be done by the United States or by some company or association supported by the United States. The people were insistent that the canal be built and, as I already have said, various Government commissions had made investigations and reports and recommendations. There was no thought of the United States acquiring territory across the Isthmus, but negotiations were had looking to concessions to the United States under which the canal might be constructed through the countries granting such concessions.

While but little attention had been paid to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it had never been formally abrogated. Under that treaty the Governments of the United States and Great Britain had declared that neither would "ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control" over any canal constructed across the Isthmus. It had become evident that the United States must construct the canal or guarantee its construction, and in so doing it would be necessary for it to have exclusive control over it. The abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was sought by the United States. That treaty, if it amounted to anything, was solely a hindrance to the construction of the canal. It was of no benefit to England, whose pretensions to the Mosquito coast and Nicaragua at the time had long since lapsed. In consenting to its abrogation England gave up nothing except the pretext of obstructing the building of the canal by the United States if it desired to do so. While some contend that Great Britain made or gave up valuable concessions in the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and while they may be right, I can not myself agree to this. At any rate, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was expressly abrogated by the treaty of November 18, 1901, transmitted by President Roosevelt to the Senate December 4, 1901, and ratified December 16, 1901, by a vote of 72 yeas and 6 nays. This treaty is known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

This treaty was expressly declared in its preamble to be for the purpose of facilitating the construction of the canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route might be considered expedient and "to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention." This treaty expressly superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Article 2 of this treaty reads as follows:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

From this it will be seen that the United States was at liberty, without any possible objection upon the part of Great Britain, to proceed with the construction of the canal directly at its own cost or by gift or loan to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares. Great Britain was relieved of any and all obligations in connection with the construction of the canal and from all obligations for the protection of anyone constructing the canal. She also was relieved from any obligation whatever to protect the canal when constructed or in guaranteeing its neutrality.

The only provision of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that was retained was the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, and that "general principle" was that the canal should be open on equal terms to all nations having equal obligations in connection with the canal and, as the United States assumed all the obligations in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, and protection of the canal, this "general principle" simply meant that under this treaty the United States was to give all other nations equal terms in connection with the use of this canal.

Those contending that this canal under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty must be open to vessels of all nations, including the vessels of the United States, on equal terms, it seems to me, overlook the essence of the "general principle" set forth in section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as well as that the canal "shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford." Keeping this in mind as the essence of the "general principle" referred to, it seems to me to be absolutely conclusive that under the new treaty the only obligation placed upon the United States by this "general principle" was that the other nations of the world and their citizens should be treated exactly alike in the use of the canal.

It is significant in this connection that the original draft of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as transmitted to the Senate by President McKinley, obligated Great Britain as well as the United States to maintain the neutralization of the canal under certain rules prescribed in the treaty, and article 3 provided as follows:

The high contracting parties will immediately upon the exchange of the ratifications of this convention bring it to the notice of the other powers and invite them to adhere to it.

This provision was stricken out in the Senate. In view of the fact that England had bound herself to neutral conduct in connection with the canal, she objected to the release of other nations from these obligations.

In connection with the negotiations with reference to the action of the Senate in striking out this article, Lord Lansdowne submitted a memorandum, under date of August 3, 1901, wherein he said:

The omission of the article inviting the adherence of other powers placed this country in a position of marked disadvantage compared with other powers, while the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war or apprehended war, and while other powers could with a clear conscience disregard any of the restrictions imposed by the convention of 1900, Great Britain alone would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action or from taking measures to secure her interest in and near the canal.

While indifferent as to the form in which the point is met, I must emphatically renew the objections of His Majesty's Government to being bound by stringent rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers. I would, therefore, suggest the insertion in rule 1, after "all nations," of the words "which shall agree to observe these rules." This addition will impose upon other powers the same self-denying ordinance as Great Britain is desired to accept and will furnish an additional security for the neutrality of the canal, which it will be the duty of the United States to maintain.

It will be noted that Great Britain did not feel that she should be bound to neutral conduct in regard to the canal unless other nations also were so bound. This, as I have said before, was the very essence of the "general principle" contained in section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

In regard to the suggestion made by Lord Lansdowne that the canal should be free and open to all nations observing the rules adopted by the United States and Great Britain, Mr. Lowther, in a communication of September 12, 1901, said:

With regard to the changes suggested by His Majesty's Government, Mr. Hay was apprehensive that the first amendment proposed to clause 1 of article 3 would meet with opposition because of the strong objection entertained to inviting other powers to become contract parties to a treaty affecting the canal. If His Majesty's Government found it not convenient to accept the draft as it stood, they might perhaps consider favorably the substitution for the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules" the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and instead of "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation." This, it seemed to Mr. Hay, would accomplish the purpose aimed at by His Majesty's Government.

To this Lord Lansdowne replied, under date of October 23, 1901:

Mr. Hay has suggested that in article 3, rule 1, we should substitute for the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations which shall agree to observe these rules," etc., the words "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules," and in the same clause as a consequential amendment, to substitute for the words "any nation so agreeing" the words "any such nation." His Majesty's Government were prepared to accept this amendment, which seemed to us equally efficacious for the purpose which we had in view, namely, that of insuring that Great Britain should not be placed in a less advantageous position than other powers, which they stopped short of conferring upon other nations a contractual right to the use of the canal.

Article 2 of the original treaty transmitted to the Senate by President McKinley contained this paragraph:

The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, which convention is hereby superseded, adopt as the basis for such neutralization the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal, that is to say:

In line with the suggestions above referred to, in the final draft of the treaty as sent to the Senate by President Roosevelt, and which was finally ratified, this paragraph reads as follows:

The United States—

Not the United States and Great Britain, but the United States—adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say.

In the memorandum submitted by Lord Lansdowne of August 3, 1901, referring to this change, he says:

In form the new draft differs from the convention of 1900, under which the high contracting parties, after agreeing that the canal might be constructed by the United States, undertook to adopt certain rules as the basis upon which the canal was to be neutralized. In the new draft the United States intimate their readiness "to adopt" somewhat similar rules as the basis of the neutralization of the canal. It would appear to follow that the whole responsibility for upholding these rules, and thereby maintaining the neutrality of the canal, would henceforward be assumed by the Government of the United States. The change of form is an important one; but in view of the fact that the whole cost of the construction of the canal is to be borne by that Government, which is also to be charged with such measures as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder, His Majesty's Government are not likely to object to it.

From these negotiations and from the nature of this treaty as compared with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it is clear that Great Britain recognized that the "general principle" of section 8 of the Bulwer treaty under the new treaty simply imposes upon the United States the obligation to treat all the other nations of the world equally and without discrimination in the use of the canal. The United States was not only to build the canal or to see that it was built, but the United States alone was obligated to protect it and to maintain its neutrality. England was relieved of all obligations and responsibilities, as well as other nations.

That construction is also borne out by the treaty negotiated between this Government and the Government of Colombia after the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into. In article 17 of that treaty it is provided that the vessels, troops, and munitions of war of Colombia shall go through the canal without charge. It reads:

The Government of Colombia shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels, troops, and munitions of war at all times without paying charges of any kind. This exemption is to be extended to the auxiliary railway for the transportation of persons in the service of the Republic of Colombia or of the Department of Panama, or of the police force charged with the preservation of public order outside of said zone, as well as to their baggage, munitions of war, and supplies.

Why was that provision put in the treaty with Colombia? I believe it was placed there because under article 23 it was the duty of Colombia, in case there was trouble on the canal, "to provide the forces necessary for such purpose." Article 23 reads:

If it should become necessary at any time to employ armed forces for the safety or protection of the canal, or of the ships that make use of the same, or the railways and other works, the Republic of Colombia agrees to provide the forces necessary for such purpose, according to the circumstances of the case; but if the Government of Colombia can not effectively comply with this obligation, then, with the consent of or at the request of Colombia, or of her minister at Washington, or of the local authorities, civil or military, the United States shall employ such force as may be necessary for that sole purpose; and as soon as the necessity shall have ceased will withdraw the forces so employed. Under exceptional circumstances, however, on account of unforeseen or imminent danger to said canal, railways, and other works, or to the lives and property of the persons employed upon the canal, railways, and other works, the Government of the United States is authorized to act in the interest of their protection, without the necessity of obtaining the consent beforehand of the Government of Colombia; and it shall give immediate advice of the measures adopted for the purpose stated; and as soon as sufficient Colombian forces shall arrive to attend to the indicated purpose those of the United States shall retire.

That is for the purpose of preserving peace and order and protecting the canal. So that was in line with the general principle of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that the nations with equal obligations should be treated equally with reference to the use of the canal.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMMONS in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If the view so often expressed here by Senators is correct, that our Government can not permit the free use of the canal by our own vessels or vessels flying our flag because it is barred from so doing by the clause of the treaty providing that all nations shall have the equal use of the canal, giving to that clause the construction that the expression "all nations" includes the Government of the United States, does not the Senator think that that same clause would have barred us from making the treaty we did make with the Government of Colombia, and have we not already violated it?

Mr. JONES. I think so, Mr. President. By no possible construction can it be held that the United States would be violating the "general principle" by giving a preference to her own citizens and vessels in the use of the canal constructed under her "auspices." On the contrary, such preference is expressly authorized by this "general principle," as under it Great Britain and the United States were not bound to allow the use of such canal on equal terms to any except those who would join with them in affording protection to the canal or those who would assume equal obligations with the United States and Great Britain.

It is contended, however, that rule 1 of article 3 prohibits us from giving any preference to our own ships. It must be borne in mind that the rules adopted as the basis for the neutralization of the canal are rules adopted by the United States to insure the neutralization of the canal. It seems to me that in the discussion of this provision in the treaty that point is overlooked. We simply quote the language of the rule itself without quoting the preamble to it, that it is a rule adopted by the United States. They are not rules adopted for the United States or to govern the United States, but they are rules adopted by the United States to be observed by other nations in the use of the canal consistent with its neutrality.

The United States says, not to herself but to the nations of the world, "You may use this canal if you observe these rules."

Rule 1 is as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised, nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

It is plain to me that this rule refers to nations other than the United States. The United States stands on one side as the maker of these rules. The other nations of the earth are those who stand on the other side and who are to observe the rules and for whose observance the rules are made. This is the natural and ordinary construction to give to this language in connection with the preceding declaration that the "United States adopts" these rules.

The owner of a ferry promulgates rules for the use of his ferry to be observed by his passengers, not by himself, and when he says that "all persons observing these rules may pass his horses and cows over this ferry" no one would understand that the terms "all persons observing these rules" includes himself and that he would charge himself for crossing his horses and cows on the ferry. If the owner of certain lands puts up a sign "All hunting on these premises is prohibited," no one would contend that he could not hunt thereon. So it is with the language of this rule.

It is a rule made by the United States for and under which all other nations or "all nations," if you please, "observing" the rules shall be admitted to the use of the canal, so that when the United States says that the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules it is the same as the ferryman saying that "all persons paying him 25 cents" will be transported across the stream on which his ferry operates, and there is nothing in the world that makes it a discrimination against any of these nations to permit our vessels to go through the canal free, while they pay, any more than it would be for the ferryman to carry himself across without charge.

This rule simply says that all those nations observing the rules laid down by the United States will be treated without any discrimination the one against the other. This is in harmony with the "general principle" contained in section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The United States is the only nation upon which any obligations are imposed in connection with the construction, operation, protection, and maintenance of the canal. All other nations are free from any obligations of any kind, and according to that "principle" the nations without obligations are to be treated alike, while the nation with obligations may receive different treatment.

It seems to me that there is no room for argument and no room for construction. The language is plain and the meaning is clear, and there is not an American citizen with average intelligence who will take any different view as to the obligations and as to the rights of the United States in this respect. While the meaning of this article and of this rule must be arrived at from the language used, the construction that I have given to it is confirmed by what would result from any different construction. If we are to hold that the United States can show no preference to its own vessels, then we must say to the people of this country that their money has built the canal; they must maintain it and operate it at their own expense; they must protect it from disorder, from lawlessness, and from damage; they must maintain its neutrality at the possible expense of much blood and treasure; and, notwithstanding all this, the vessels of war of the United States can not go through the canal except upon the same conditions, with the same restraints, and the same charges which the vessels of war of any other nation must bear and pay, and that the vessels of citizens of the United States can not go through the canal without paying the same charges that are paid by the vessels of the citizens of other countries who have no obligations and who have been to no expense in connection with the canal. If any other construction is advocated, we must admit to our people that the President of the United States, who made this treaty, and the Senators who ratified it, had no regard for the rights and interests of the people of the United States in framing this treaty. This I will not admit.

A further examination of these rules makes it certain that they were adopted by the United States for the observance of other nations. It is said that the canal "shall never be blockaded." The United States would never blockade its own canal or the canal or ports within its control. This can mean nothing except that the canal shall never be blockaded by nations other than the United States; in other words, by "those observing these rules."

Again, it provides that "vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual, except so far as may be strictly necessary, in the canal." Does anyone suppose for a moment that a war vessel of the United States going through the canal could not revictual to any extent desired, even though the United States might be at war with some other nation? Is it possible that there is territory under the Stars and Stripes in which our war vessels can not stop to revictual? I can not think so. Our people will never admit it.

It is further provided that "the transit of such vessel through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service."

This clearly refers to nations at war with nations other than the United States. The regulations in force would be regulations made by the United States for the purpose of governing the passage of ships of belligerent nations through the canal. It is ridiculous to suppose that a war vessel of the United States would have to pass through the canal any more rapidly or expeditiously than the United States itself would desire.

Again, it is provided "no belligerent shall embark or disembark troops in the canal." It also is provided in rule 5 that—

Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters—

Referring to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end, and which are owned by the United States—longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible.

Were these rules made to apply to vessels of the United States? Must our war vessels leave our own territory within 24 hours? If so, where will they go? It is too plain to admit of argument that these rules were not made by the United States to govern themselves, but were made to be observed by the nations that were to use the canal on terms of equality. It is unthinkable that we would agree to a treaty that required our warships to leave our own territory within 24 hours, and yet that is what we have done if any other construction is given to this treaty.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, referring to the matter of the landing of troops, the Senator is aware, of course, that, as a matter of fact, we are now constructing barracks and expect to maintain on the Isthmus and along the canal some two or three thousand American soldiers all the time.

Mr. JONES. Certainly; and we expect and have voted to fortify the canal, and England has not made any objection.

Mr. MASSEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. MASSEY. I merely want to interject the remark that we are fortifying it for offensive and defensive purposes, so far as this Government is concerned.

Mr. JONES. Certainly; we are dealing with it just as if it were our own, as indeed it is.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made before we acquired title to the Panama strip. The Senator's position, as I understand, is that we have the right to fortify the canal and to blockade it, as we see fit.

Mr. JONES. We have the right to do with it as we please. The provision against blockading does not apply to the United States, because no Government would blockade its own ports.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well. In other words, we have the right to control it. When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was before the Senate for consideration, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] offered the following amendment:

It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

I take it there is nothing in this proposed amendment which would be inconsistent with the position now taken by the Senator from Washington. It certainly would have added to the clearness of the contention which the Senator is now making. Can the Senator explain why, in view of at least a certain amount of obscurity which there is in the treaty, this proposed amendment was defeated?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not concede that there is any obscurity in it. It is just as plain to my mind as it is now worded as it would be with that language in it. I have no doubt that those amendments were voted down by the Senate on the theory that the treaty was plain and that we had that right already, just the same as in the matter of fortifications.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Confirming the view of the Senator from Washington, the statement has been made repeatedly during the discussion of this bill that the amendment referred to by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] was voted down at the time under the belief that there was no need of amplifying the language of the treaty; that the treaty as it stood was susceptible only of the interpretation that is now being argued for by the Senator from Washington. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has stated during the discussion that when he reported the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was his belief that the provisions referred to respecting the rules that were to be observed by all nations were rules that were not intended for the control of the United States; that it was the United States that prescribed the rules which were to be observed by all foreign powers that sought the use of the canal upon the terms prescribed by this country, the country that built the canal.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, that is my position exactly. I do not think that we have any right to infer because certain amendments were offered and voted down, that they were voted down because of opposition to the substance of the amendments themselves. I would prefer, where no record was made, to infer that they were voted down, because they were not considered at all necessary, but that the same ground was covered by the treaty itself. I can not in fact conceive, Mr. President, why any Senator should vote against those amendments unless he thought that the treaty as it was then worded accomplished that very purpose. To think otherwise would be to reflect on his intelligence and patriotism.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to state that Senator Davis, of Minnesota, was at that time chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was, as is conceded by all, an authority on international law, and took the view stated by the Senator from New York and that stated by the Senator from Washington. There is no question about it, that the rules we did make were to govern other nations than ourselves.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it seems to me it would be a great reflection upon the intelligence and patriotism of Senators who voted against those amendments to accept any different construction.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Another thought has occurred to me, Mr. President, in reference to that proposition. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas at that time had prevailed, it would certainly have excluded the other proposition, namely, the right of the Government to admit its own vessels engaged in the foreign trade through the canal without toll. It would, then, in that case, be recognized as having limited the power of the United States simply to vessels engaged in its coastwise traffic and have excluded those engaged in the foreign trade.

Mr. JONES. But why multiply words? The treaty is plain. Its purpose is clear. There is no ambiguity about it. The canal is to be built under "the auspices" of the United States. It is to assume all the obligations in connection with the canal—to pay the money, to bear the cost, to protect it, to insure its neutrality—and the nations of the world, who have been to no expense and who are under no obligations with reference to the canal, will be treated impartially and without discrimination if they observe the rules prescribed for them by the United States. That is all there is to it. That is our agreement.

If this canal had been constructed under the "auspices" of the United States, as contemplated when this treaty was entered into, it is clear to me that it would be at perfect liberty to give a preference to its own vessels and citizens using the canal, and we might well stop here upon this proposition. There is another phase of it, however, which appeals to me.

When this treaty was entered into there was no thought upon the part of anybody that the United States would acquire the title to and sovereignty over lands on the Isthmus through which the canal could be built. This treaty was made on the basis that the United States would secure concessions of some kind through the territory of the Central American States in accordance with which it would put in the canal or see that it was constructed. Negotiations had been had from time to time with Nicaragua, and negotiations were even pending with Colombia at the time the treaty was made for such concessions, and, under date of January 23, 1903, President Roosevelt transmitted to the Senate a treaty made with the Republic of Colombia under which the United States was given "the exclusive right for a term of 100 years, renewable at the sole and absolute option of the United States for periods of similar duration, so long as the United States may desire, to excavate, construct, maintain, operate, control, and protect the maritime canal, with or without locks, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean to and across the territory of Colombia," and for this purpose the Republic of Colombia granted to the United States for the term of 100 years, renewable as above provided, the use and control of the territory along the route of the canal 5 kilometers in width on either side of the same. This grant, however, amounted to nothing more than a perpetual lease, and was granted upon the conditions set out in the treaty. The United States bound itself to pay Colombia $10,000,000 on ratification of the treaty and an annual payment of $250,000 during the life of the treaty, beginning nine years after its date.

It was expressly provided in article 4:

> The rights and privileges granted to the United States by the terms of this convention shall not affect the sovereignty of the Republic of Colombia over the territory within whose boundaries such rights and privileges are to be exercised.
> The United States freely acknowledges and recognizes this sovereignty and disavows any intention to impair it in any way whatever or to increase its territory at the expense of Colombia or of any of the sister Republics in Central or South America, but, on the contrary, it desires to strengthen the power of the Republics on this continent and to promote, develop, and maintain their prosperity and independence.

When this treaty was negotiated no thought was entertained of acquiring the title and sovereignty to the lands through which the canal was to be constructed.

The canal, however, was built under conditions never contemplated by anyone at the time of the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The essential conditions underlying the treaty are entirely lacking. The canal was to have been built under concessions secured from other countries when using foreign territory. It has been built, however, through territory owned by the United States and over which the United States has full sovereignty. The canal is the actual property of the United States, built in and through the territory of the United States. We own a strip of territory across the Isthmus of Panama 10 miles wide, acquired from the Republic of Panama by a treaty concluded November 18, 1903, ratified by the Senate, and finally proclaimed February 26, 1904. By this treaty—

> The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed, the said zone beginning in the Carribean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the zone above described, shall not be included within this grant. The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise.
> The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described, and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco.

As showing beyond question the absolute character of the grant and the transfer of sovereignty from Panama, article 3 of the treaty reads as follows:

> The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

In other words, the United States is, by the express terms of the grant, made the sovereign and proprietor of the land through which and in which the canal is built. These 10 miles across the Isthmus of Panama are the territory or property of the United States. As such, its control and its use is a matter of domestic concern with which and about which no foreign nation can interfere.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not contemplate, and could not contemplate, this state of affairs, and even if under the terms of the treaty the United States would have been prohibited from giving a preference to its own vessels if the canal had been constructed under the conditions contemplated by the treaty it can not apply to the present situation and to its rights in its own territory.

As I have said before, it would be beyond the power of the President and the Senate by treaty to prescribe rules and regulations with reference to the use or in respect to the property or territory of the United States. That can be done only by Congress. What they could not do they will not be presumed to have attempted to do, and this, in my judgment, is a conclusive argument against the contention that under the treaty the United States is prohibited from giving a preference to its own vessels passing through the canal.

Hon. Hannis Taylor, a high authority on international law, writing to the Washington Post under date of July 24, 1912, states that under international law—

> It is well settled that a treaty becomes "voidable," not void, whenever a change has taken place in the fundamental conditions existing at the time it was made. Hall, the highest English authority on international law, has thus stated the matter:
> "SEC. 116. The principle which has been mentioned as being a sufficient test of the existence of obligatory force or of the voidability of a treaty at a given moment may be stated as follows: Neither party to a contract can make its binding effect dependent at will upon conditions other than those contemplated at the moment when the contract was entered into, and on the other hand a contract ceases to be binding so soon as anything which forms an implied condition of its obligatory force at the time of its conclusion is essentially altered. If this be true—and it will scarcely be contradicted—it is only necessary to determine under what implied conditions an international agreement is made. When these are found the reasons for which a treaty may be denounced or disregarded will also be found."
> In my own work on international law I have stated the matter in this way: "After the validity of an international agreement has been firmly established by the concurrence of such antecedents it may become voidable through the operation of subsequent events, which might not have such an effect in the case of private contract. So unstable are conditions of international existence, and so difficult is it to enforce a contract between States after the state of facts upon which it was formed has substantially changed, that all such agreements are necessarily made subject to the general understanding that they cease to be obligatory as soon as the conditions upon which they were executed are essentially altered. In 1870, when Russia determined to repudiate some of the vital provisions of the treaty of Paris relating to the Black Sea—by which she had been fettered at the close of the Crimean War, and which her subsequent development had rendered unbearable—she rested her case, in part, upon that ground in the circular 'addressed to the powers asserting that the treaty of March 30, 1856, had not escaped modification to which most European transactions have been exposed, and in the face of which it would be difficult to maintain that the written law founded upon the respect for treaties as the basis of public right and regulating the relations between States, retains the moral validity which it may have possessed at other times.'"
> The two great humiliations to which Russia had been subjected by the treaty of 1856 consisted of the forced surrender of her protectorate over the Eastern Christians and of the abrogation of her rights to keep war vessels in the Black Sea and to maintain naval arsenals on its coasts. So keenly did Russia feel the restraints placed upon her sovereignty by the stipulations last named that the moment the ally who had aided England in imposing them upon her was stricken down she notified the other signatory powers, in a circular issued in October, 1870, that it was impossible for her to be longer bound either by the objectionable articles of the treaty of 1856 or by the convention of the Straits, really a part of it. To save appearances England deemed it best to call a conference in which the demands of Russia could be duly ratified. The representatives of the powers, who met in London in January, 1871, after declaring that no State can break or modify a treaty without the voluntary assent of the other contracting parties, finally annulled, on March 13, articles 11, 13, and 14 of the treaty of Paris, while Russia and Turkey, by a separate agreement, abrogated the special convention made between them at that time as to the size and number of armored vessels the two riparian proprietors might maintain for police purposes.
> The radical change wrought in conditions existing at the time of the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty by the transformation of the Canal Zone from foreign territory into domestic territory of the United States beyond all question renders the treaty "voidable" at the instance of the United States, under the principles of international law stated above. Apart from our peculiar position and rights under the Monroe doctrine, how can we permit the European powers so far to interfere with our domestic affairs as to dictate the regulations to be made of the tolls to be charged in a domestic waterway built exclusively with our money and within our own territory? Certainly no patriotic American statesman or publicist should ever consent to the submission of such purely American and domestic interests to the arbitrament of The Hague tribunal, which will always be dominated by European jurists naturally hostile to us on questions of that character.

This treaty does not apply to the canal as constructed. If we had acquired the 10-mile strip we now own, the treaty would never have been entered into. We would have gone on and built the canal without consulting any other nation on earth. If we want to build another canal or promote its building through foreign territory this treaty would apply, but so far as the canal is now built is concerned it is just as if the treaty had never been made.

But, in any event, under the plain terms of the treaty we are not prohibited from giving a preference to our own ships, and by reason of the changed conditions not contemplated in the making of the treaty by which the canal is our own absolute property, constructed in and through our own territory, the treatment of our vessels is a purely domestic matter, with which no other nation has any concern and with which we will tolerate no interference whatever upon the part of any other government. We may quibble and split legal hairs all we please here, but the people of the country know that this canal is ours, that it passes through our territory; and they know that, being ours and passing through our territory, we can use it as we please and permit its use to our citizens upon such terms as we see fit to impose, and they will brook no interference with our rights in this respect by any nation on earth.

Mr. President, foreign countries never hesitate to protect their own. Foreign statesmen deem it their duty to promote the interests of their own citizens rather than those of other people. They assert their own claims rather than the rights of others. We will do likewise. We will observe our treaties with scrupulous honor, but we will insist upon our rights with unyielding firmness. The title to our territory, the integrity of our sovereignty, will be maintained at any cost. The American people will be fair, just, and impartial toward the nations of the earth, but interference in the control of their domestic affairs and their treatment of their own people will not be tolerated. When we surrender to a foreign power the right to determine the treatment we shall accord to our own citizens, then we have surrendered the Nation's strength and we will become a "hissing and a byword" among the nations of the earth.

If we have the right to relieve our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls, as I am firmly convinced we have, should we do it? It has been our policy to relieve domestic commerce from restrictions and burdens rather than to increase them. At one time tonnage taxes were imposed, but in their imposition our own vessels were always favored as against foreign ships. Now no tonnage duties are imposed on vessels in the coastwise trade. These burdens were not removed for the sole purpose of benefiting shipping, but more for the benefit of the people, because such taxes were a greater burden on the consumers than they were on shipping.

To impose tolls on our coastwise trade passing through the canal is to discriminate in the coastwise trade. It is claimed that about 10 per cent of our coastwise trade would pass through the canal. This would pay tolls. The other 90 per cent will be entirely free. While this 90 per cent does not go through the Panama Canal, it goes on rivers and into harbors and through canals upon which the Government has just as surely expended hundreds of millions of the people's money. I can conceive of no reason why tolls should not be charged on these rivers, at these harbors, and in these canals that does not apply to the Panama Canal. We can not afford to begin now the policy of discriminating in our coastwise trade. Millions have been spent at the Soo Canal; 50,000,000 tons of commerce pass through it in a year without the payment of a dollar of toll. Why? Because it is and has been our policy for many years not to impose such burdens on domestic commerce. It is said that to remit the tolls on the Panama Canal would be a gift to shipping.

Is this a gift to the shipping interests of the Great Lakes? No; because if tolls were levied, it would be a legitimate charge against consumers. No; it is in the interest of the people, of the consumers and producers of the United States, of the Middle West, and the East that no tolls are charged. No; it is rather in the interest of the whole Nation, because the whole Nation is benefited thereby. The Soo Canal is a great national work. While it may be of special benefit to certain sections of the country, it is of benefit to all. It was put in by the Nation's money, and it is a narrow view that sees no benefit except to the immediate territory served. The people of the Pacific coast did their part toward paying the cost of this improvement, as well as the cost of improving the harbors of the Atlantic and the Gulf and the rivers of the East and the great Middle West. We are glad to do it, because these are great national works of national benefit.

The Panama Canal is a national work and a national benefit; the more nearly national of any work ever undertaken by the Government. Why should not the domestic commerce passing through it also pass through free the same as it does through the Soo? If we impose tolls on the commerce passing through the Panama Canal, what objection can be urged against imposing taxes on the commerce through the Soo? Freedom of domestic commerce is a national policy and was placed in the statute law in 1884, when it was provided—

> That no tolls or operating charges whatsoever shall be levied or collected upon any vessel or vessels, dredges, or other passing water craft through any canal or other work for the improvement of navigation belonging to the United States.

This law applies to the Panama Canal unless repealed. It was enacted as a wise governmental policy. Its wisdom has never before been questioned, and I submit that it is unwise, unjustly discriminatory, unpatriotic, and un-American to single out this, the greatest of American internal improvements, and the American commerce that may pass through it, and impose upon it a burden that is not borne by commerce passing from port to port under similar conditions.

We have boasted of the freedom of our internal trade. To this freedom we have attributed much of our wonderful growth and development. No partisan differences have arisen as to the wisdom of this policy. The products of the East and of the West, of the North and of the South, go to any port of our great country untrammeled and unvexed by governmental tolls, taxes, or exactions. Under this powerful stimulus great cities have been built, vast sections of the country have been populated and cultivated, heavy forests have been leveled and given place to fruitful farms and prosperous homes, deserts have been reclaimed, and the fertility and energy of the ages have been turned into wealth for the happiness and comfort of thousands. The continent has been crossed, rivers have been spanned, mountains have been tunneled, and great transportation lines constructed from coast to coast. Under its benign influence billions of wealth have been created, millions of people have been attracted to our shores, and the greatest commercial and national development of the world's history has been attained in a little more than a century of time. Under this influence the development and civilization of the Pacific coast have made the Panama Canal a military, commercial, and national necessity, and it would be nothing short of national folly to impair the effectiveness of that canal by the imposition of financial burdens.

What is the objection to free passage of American ships through the canal? This: It is urged that to relieve shipping of these tolls amounts to a gift to them, and that this is unfair to the American people, who have built the canal; and it is pointed out that $400,000,000 of the people's money will be expended in the construction of the canal and that it will cost from ten to fifteen million dollars each year to maintain it; and the question is asked, Why should the people bear this burden? Why should not the ships passing through the canal bear their share? If the ships use the canal why should they not pay for it? It ought to be a sufficient answer to say that if payment is exacted of the ships passing through the Panama Canal why not from ships at the Soo, on the Mississippi, on the Columbia, on the Ohio, at New York, Galveston, and all other ports which have practically been made by the people's money and for which we appropriate each year for maintenance and further improvement millions of the people's money? No suggestion is made, however, that this should be done, or that the law to which I have referred should be repealed, and I venture to say that if it were proposed to impose tolls on the ships passing to these ports through the canal and on these rivers there would be determined opposition to it; but just as sure as tolls are imposed upon American ships passing through the Panama Canal so sure has the end come to the free passage of ships through domestic ports and channels of transportation made and improved by the people's money, and those who favor the imposition of tolls at Panama might just as well understand now that they will have to face that proposition.

I do not favor no tolls at the Panama Canal as a special benefit to shipping. It is significant that those interested in shipping transportation who appeared before the committees when hearings were held did not attach very much importance to the question as to whether shipping should be free or not. This indifference, in my judgment, came from the fact that in the end the shipowners would not pay the tolls. They would pass them on to the consumers as they do other operating expenses. This is the very reason why I am opposed to imposing tolls, and it lies as the basis for the law to which I have called attention. I oppose these tolls in the interest of the people, of the consuming public, who, in the end, must pay them, and not in the interest of shipping.

If I believed the burden of paying the tolls ended with the shipowner, I would not be so much opposed to levying tolls; but I do not believe it. The business interests of the country do not believe it. They know that it is a burden on them and upon their consumption, and this is the reason why they are almost universally against it, and this is the reason why, in 1884, we enacted the law relieving all domestic commerce from these burdens.

One great object in the construction of the Panama Canal, aside from its military benefit, was to secure the shortest possible unobstructed water route from coast to coast in competition with the transcontinental railroad lines; not to destroy them, but to regulate and control their rates. Such a controlling influence is very desirable and of the greatest benefit to the people of every section of our great country. The ideal water route would be secured by leveling the Isthmus of Panama so as to allow the ocean waters to go over it of sufficient depth to float the largest ships. This we can not have, and the nearest to it is a canal with the fewest and lightest possible burdens.

Why should we impair this competitive agent by imposing burdens upon it at the very beginning? Why not give it a fair test—a fair trial—and see just what the effect of its competition will be on railroad rates?

I believe, and I think the country believes, that water transportation is far cheaper than railroad transportation and that water competition will do more to lower and maintain railroad rates at a just level than any other influence that can be brought to bear. Let us give it a fair test and see whether or not this is true. If it does not bring about the result expected we can then impose such burdens as we think the traffic will stand without passing them on to the people.

Levy tolls on American shipping passing through the canal and you impose just that much of a tax, not on the shipping, but on the people of the country, on the consumers of products carried through the canal just as the consumers of products carried on the railroads pay the freight. You may argue all you please that these tolls would be so small that if distributed to the pound and the ton they would be so light that no one would feel them and the same would not be collected from the people, but we know that in the year's business they will be collected from the consumers just the same as any other legitimate expense.

But this is not all. Every burden by way of tolls placed on this competitor of the transcontinental railroads diminishes the efficiency of that competitor just to that extent. This, it seems to me, is axiomatic. Do the people of the country want the efficiency of the competitor they have created at such a tremendous cost diminished by the imposition of tolls? I can not think so. Again, and this to my mind is the most important consideration in connection with the question of levying tolls, all tolls laid on the competitor of the railroads enables the railroads to maintain their rates at a higher level than they could if there were no tolls. This is certainly true if the Panama Canal is a real competitor with the railroads. How much higher the railroads could maintain their rates no one can tell. It probably would not be the amount of the tolls per ton but in the aggregate it doubtless would amount to far more than the aggregate of the tolls collected on the Isthmus. We know this, too, that a tax levied on a competitor is often made an excuse for charging more by the nontaxed competitor on his products than he otherwise would charge, and oftentimes an excuse for charging a greater amount even than the tax itself.

To levy tolls on domestic ships going through the canal is to make the people pay not only these tolls in the increased cost of the things they buy transported by the ships, but it also will make them pay a far greater amount in freight rates to the railroads of the country. This is not only true as to the coast-to-coast business, but it also will be true of the interior business of the country. Water routes from coast to coast affect the railroad rates far inland, and the more effective the coast-to-coast competitor the farther inland will railroad rates be affected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some years ago I spent a delightful hour watching American shipping go through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, which, I assume, goes through free of toll. I noticed what is well known to most people, that the Canadian Government has built a parallel canal to ours, through which Canadian ships also go free.

Mr. JONES. I think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that Canadian canal had not been built, would we have exacted tolls from the Canadian shipping if it had passed through our canal?

Mr. JONES. I should think so, unless some other arrangement were made by the two Governments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the Canadian shipping have passed through our canal free of toll?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Our treaty with Canada provides for the free mutual use of international waters and of Lake Michigan by the signatory nations. Under it the Sault Canal, the Welland Canal, the St. Clair Canal, and the St. Lawrence Canals are open to the boats of both countries. Part of these waterways are wholly in American territory and some are entirely in Canadian territory, and the treaty gives the benefits of navigation in all four to both countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. So there was reciprocity as between the two countries?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There was.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then we would get a quid pro quo for any benefit we might give the Canadian shipping. I simply wanted to clear that in my own mind, because I did not know exactly what the rules were there. I very strongly sympathize with the position the Senator has taken and is so ably advocating to-day, and I will join with the Senator in endeavoring to get our vessels through the Panama Canal free. I think we ought to legislate in that direction, and not burden our American shipping on the ground that we are tied up by some treaty that never would have been made had the same conditions existed at that time as existed when the canal was built.

Mr. JONES. Knowing the broad and patriotic view the Senator from New Hampshire takes with respect to all great problems, I was satisfied that he would take that position in reference to this matter.

So, as I view it, if we should levy $1,500,000 annually as tolls on American shipping going through the canal this would be paid in the first instance by the shipping interests and, if it stopped there and if they alone bore this burden there could not be much objection to it, but it would not stop there for at the end of the year they will have collected from the people of the country this $1,500,000. The people will have paid it. In addition to this the railroads of the country will have been enabled to collect from the consumers of the products transported by them many times $1,500,000 in additional freight rates that they have been enabled to collect because of the imposition of tolls on their competitor through the canal. The business interests of the country know this and they look to us to relieve them from this burden. The railroads are not to be condemned for taking advantage of such a situation. They are not to be condemned for looking with apparent indifference upon our attitude upon this important question, although I am satisfied that they are doing all that they can to encourage the sentiment favoring the levying of tolls. We, as the representatives of the people, ought to be condemned, in my judgment, if we allow this burden to be placed upon the people of the country by our legislative action. We should not permit the charge that we are favoring the shipping interests at the expense of the Federal Treasury to swerve us from what we believe to be for the real and lasting benefit of the people of the country.

And right here, as I have done before, and as I expect to do at every opportunity, I want to refer to the intolerant spirit that sees wrong motives in everyone who does not agree with us. I note on the part of those who are in favor of free tolls the charge and suggestion that those opposed to free tolls are the tools of the railroad interests of the country. Their motives are questioned, and the impression is given to the people that the Senators and Representatives who are opposed to free tolls are willfully and purposely working for the railroad interests. This is not true. Their motives are just as honorable and just as patriotic as are the motives of those who favor free tolls. They believe their opposition is in the interests of the people, and any suggestions to the contrary are wholly unfounded and unjust. On the other hand, I note that it is charged that those favoring free tolls are working for the benefit of the shipping interests and the suggestion is made to the people that these Senators and Representatives are disregarding the interests of the people and are purposely aiding and promoting the shipping industry to the detriment of the people's good. This is unfair, unjust, and unwarranted. The differences on this great question are honest differences upon the part of Representatives and Senators who are all reaching for a common goal, and that is legislation which will be of the greatest good to their people and their country. I am for no tolls not because this will benefit shipping, not because it will injure the railroads, but because it will benefit the people and I believe this is the motive actuating every Senator in his action on this bill.

The levying of tolls will decrease the use of the canal to a greater or lesser extent; how much no one can say. The people want the greatest possible use made of it. We can get this only by relieving the shipping of all possible burdens. The greatest possible use of the canal by domestic shipping means the greatest possible influence toward lowering railroad rates. It is contended by some that if tolls are charged on American ships no ships will be built to use the canal. This statement I believe to be too strong. There will be no inducement to build ships for the foreign trade but there may be, and doubtless will be, business sufficient to induce the building of additional ships for the coastwise trade. I have no doubt, however, but that no tolls will mean the building of many more ships than would be built if tolls were levied. If this is true, it would be a great national benefit in the employment of additional labor in American yards at American wages and more happiness and comfort in American homes.

We ask no favors, but we do ask that the policy of more than a quarter of a century toward our domestic interstate commerce in our rivers, harbors, and canals be applied to our domestic commerce through our canal across our territory on the Isthmus of Panama. We ask that no toll gatherer be stationed at the portals of this the greatest of all national works to halt and burden our own ships seeking to use our national waterway, and especially those going from one American port to another loaded with American products for American consumers. We ask that this great competitor of the transcontinental lines be unfettered and untrammeled to do the great work of lowering and controlling rates in the interest of the great American consuming public. We ask that its cost and expense be borne by the Nation, as the cost and expense of all similar works are borne in order that all the people of the Nation may receive the blessings and benefits that we expect to flow from it. We ask that the flag of our country may mean the same on all American ships passing through this canal that it means on an American ship in any other American waterway—equal opportunity, equal rights, equal benefits, equal treatment to all our people and to every section of our beloved land, and no interference by any foreign power.

The other important question in this bill is the one as to whether or not we should exclude railroad owned or controlled ships from the canal. They are deserving of fair treatment and just consideration, the same as any other great business. They have been a tremendous influence in the wonderful development of our country. They have had much to do with producing the civilization of which we are so proud and are lasting monuments to the nerve, confidence, ability, and genius of American enterprise. They furnish to-day a service that is keeping pace with the demands of a rapid-living people, and nowhere in the world are accommodations so excellent, the service so perfect, or the rates so reasonable as in the United States.

The railroads are quasi public agencies. They perform governmental functions, and as such they should be confined to the purpose for which they are built, to wit, the transportation of passengers and freight on land over the lines constructed and operated and under Government supervision and control. While owned and operated by private individuals they secured their franchises through the Government, State or National, for a particular purpose, and they ought to be restricted in their operations to the particular service for which they are organized.

Because of the abuses which have grown out of their engaging in other than transportation business legislation has been enacted to eliminate their ownership and dealings in commodities in conjunction with their transportation business, and such legislation has met the approval of the people. Railroads are operated by men moved by the same purposes and impulses as dominate those engaged in other enterprises, and it is not to be wondered at that they strive to monopolize transportation. It is natural that they should seek all the business and profit possible. They are big enterprises and big men, powerful men, domineering men, and they bend their energies to securing the profits that accrue to the business and also keenly enjoy the feeling of conquest that comes from the overthrow of a rival competitor.

It has been the policy of the railroads in the past to stifle, control, and to minimize water transportation. As a result transportation on our rivers has practically disappeared. In many cases it has been driven out of existence by the cutthroat rates made by railroad lines for that very purpose. So often had this been done that two or three years ago legislation was enacted to prevent it. It also is generally known that the principal steamship lines of the Great Lakes and the Atlantic and Pacific coasts are to-day under the control and operated by railroad lines, and the result is that there is no great difference between the rates charged by the railroads and those charged by the water lines for the same service. This result has come about not by the reduction of railroad rates but by the raise of water rates.

In the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in the case of the Jennison Co. et al. v. The Great Northern Railway Co. et al., rendered March 15, 1910, and involving rates on the Great Lakes and corresponding railroads, the commission says:

> Certain railroads with lines reaching from Chicago to the seaboard, or from Buffalo to the seaboard, own and control practically all of the railroad mileage between Chicago and the seaboard, and also own or control all of the regular lines of package-freight-carrying boats on the Great Lakes. Therefore practically all of the tonnage of wheat and wheat products that is transported either all-rail or lake-and-rail, or rail-lake-and-rail from Minneapolis or Duluth to the seaboard or to New England is transported in whole or in part by these carriers.
> Prior to the absorption of the lake lines the rail-lake-and-rail and lake-and-rail rates on flour had fluctuated considerably, but, in general, the rail-lake-and-rail rate was a well understood and established differential of 5 cents per 100 pounds under the all-rail rate. Early in 1898, after the railroads had secured control of most of the lake lines, that differential was narrowed to 3 cents by increasing the rail-lake-and-rail rate, and in April, 1902, after the railroads had completed their control of the lake lines it was narrowed to 2 cents by another increase in the rail-lake-and-rail rate. Sixty-five per cent of the product of the Minneapolis mills that goes to the territory east of Buffalo or Pittsburgh is shipped rail-lake-and-rail.

* * * * * * *

In 1900 the rate on flour via lake and rail from Milwaukee to New York was 24 cents per barrel, and in 1907 it had been increased to 31 cents per barrel, while during the same period the rate on wheat via the Lakes from Milwaukee to Buffalo was reduced.

* * * * * * *

The traffic manager of one of the defendants herein expressed the opinion that 3 cents per 100 pounds would be a fair difference between all-rail and rail-lake-and-rail rates on flour, and admitted that, because of common ownership between the all-rail and lake-and-rail carriers, if a 5-cent differential were agreed upon it could be maintained. Another traffic officer of one of the defendants expressed the opinion that a differential of 2 cents is not sufficient.

This is sufficient to show what has been done on the Great Lakes.

I also desire to call your attention to the statements made by Hon. J. N. Teal, of Portland, Oreg., before our committee. Mr. Teal represented the various organizations and business interests of the Pacific coast and has given special attention to the matter of railroad and water rates. He says:

Let me give you an illustration in which I have said I am interested. I may not be able to speak about it understandingly, but I can speak feelingly, because I have helped pay for it. We have on the Columbia River a boat line that was started by the people for the purpose of operating on the Columbia River. Upon one bank of that river runs the O. W. R. & N. Railroad and on the other bank the Spokane, Portland & Seattle Railway. The latter railway company also operates a boat line upon the same river between Portland and The Dalles in competition with itself and in competition with this boat line. Let me show you the result when you are operating against this kind of a proposition. You have a railroad owning a boat line, or rather two railroads owning a boat line—the Great Northern and Northern Pacific—with an income of not less than $130,000,000 or $140,000,000 a year, and, on the other hand, you have a boat line operating on the same river simply to get the traffic and to get it on reasonable terms. I will submit to the committee that if rates are put so low as to be nonremunerative and the railroads lose $100 a day running their boat line on that river they could take this insignificant sum out of their $130,000,000 or $140,000,000 and not miss it. On the other hand, suppose some steamboat company or some small organization that is trying to operate a legitimate line has to go down into its pocket every day and dig up $100 to meet the deficit, how long would it last? When this boat line was started, in 1905, the rate on cement to The Dalles was 10 cents per hundred and the rate on cement to Salida was 13 cents. The rate to The Dalles has been reduced to 6¼ cents by rail, and the railroad boat line has hauled it as low as 4 cents per hundred to The Dalles, or 80 cents a ton. If you gentlemen understood the river as some of these Senators do, you would understand what these rates mean; but this is the kind of competition you meet in attempting to establish boat lines all over this country.

Dr. Johnson stated that he was not familiar with the fact of boat lines being operated in competition with railroad lines, but from the report of the Union Pacific Railroad Co. of 1911 it appears this railroad company owns all of the stock of the San Francisco & Portland Steamship Co., which is a steamship company operating between Portland and San Francisco. The report further shows the ownership of the steamships by the Union Pacific and an explanation that they are operated by the San Francisco & Portland Steamship Co. between San Francisco and Portland, the charter for which has not yet been agreed upon. You are familiar with the fact that the Southern Pacific Co. operates a line of railroad between San Francisco and Portland, and that the Southern Pacific and the Union Pacific Railway Co. are closely merged and affiliated institutions, and I give you that simply as illustrative of the situation.

Mr. Teal also submitted a letter from Mr. E. W. Spencer, from which I quote—it may be stated that Capt. Spencer was in the steamboat business on the Ohio River as well as the Columbia River and other rivers of the West for many years:

A subject of legislation which is of very great importance to the independent transportation interests is that which would tend to prohibit the ownership of steamboat and steamship lines by the railroad interests where there is any competition whatsoever between rail and water transportation. The railroads of the United States owe their very existence to the right of eminent domain. This right was granted them by their customers, the shippers, and has been usurped by them and used by the larger interests to throttle small independent railroads and water transportation facilities, to the detriment of the shippers.

During the 38 years that I have been interested in water transportation in the Pacific Northwest my experience has been that wherever a good paying line of steamers has been established that the railroad companies and those interested with them have inaugurated rival and competing lines of steamers, and the competition thus begun has always tended to the depletion of the financial interests of the weaker water lines and to their utter extermination.

Thirty years ago there were plying on the Willamette River from Portland to upper Willamette Valley points, such as Salem, Corvallis, Dayton, Eugene, and intermediate points, nine steamboats. Those interests, now represented by the O. W. R. & N. Co., inaugurated steamers in competition with the established steamboat lines and the O. & C. Railroad Co., later the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. Later the O. W. R. & N. Co. and their connecting steamer lines were absorbed by the same interests that absorbed the Southern Pacific. Since that time the ruinous rates put into effect by the railroad interests have driven these steamers out of the profitable business of the Willamette Valley, until now there are but two craft plying on the Willamette River, and these are giving very poor and infrequent service. This state of affairs exists, in spite of the fact that the Willamette Valley has been developing year by year and is one of the largest producing sections in the State of Oregon. No other reason can be attributed for the cessation of water transportation on the Willamette River than that of railroad-owned steamboats. No small operator can afford to install a steamboat line in competition with the railroad interests on this river without it resulting in crippling him financially and in accomplishing his utter ruin. The vast wealth behind the railroad interest is too strong to buck against.

In this same vein can be cited my own personal experience on the Columbia River between Portland and the head of navigation for vessels plying out of Portland on the Columbia River, namely, The Dalles. In 1903 I inaugurated service between these points by placing the steamer Charles R. Spencer on the run. A fight was immediately commenced by the Regulator Line, who had theretofore been more or less intimately connected with the O. W. & N. Co. through traffic agreements. When the Great Northern interests commenced to build their road down the north bank of the Columbia from Spokane to Portland they secured a controlling interest in the Regulator Line. The river transportation, both as to freight and passengers, could be carried profitably at a less rate than the railroad company were charging for the same business. When the North Bank Railroad was placed under the control of the operating department the steamboat line, which had been used for the construction of the road, was utilized to drive the remaining vestiges of river competition into oblivion. I contended against these odds until the summer of 1910, when I was forced by the utter lack of returns in a financial way to withdraw from the business and to sell the steamer. Since that time this same line of steamers has been running in opposition to the Open River Transportation Co. This company was formed and promoted by the business men of Portland and the Columbia River Valley to utilize the natural advantages afforded by the Columbia River for the transportation of farm products and farm supplies to and from Portland and upper Columbia Valley points in connection with the State Portage Road, built by the State of Oregon around The Dalles Rapids, from the Big Eddy to Celilo. This road was originally built by the State of Oregon to assist water lines in transporting freight in direct competition with the railroad companies and has since been extended to The Dalles, Oreg., because of better connecting facilities. At the completion of the Celilo Canal, now under construction around The Dalles Rapids, this portage road will be abandoned.

If the competing lines of railroads, one the O. W. R. & N. Co. on the south bank of the Columbia River, and the other the Spokane, Portland & Seattle Railroad, a child of the Greath Northern Railroad, on the north bank, are permitted to own and operate steamboats in competition with those operated by local companies, there can be but one result: The present company, which is fighting for its existence, will be driven from the river and will retire a financial wreck. Railroad-operated steamboats will then begin to curtail their service until it will become so inadequate and such poor accommodation to the farmers in the upper Columbia River Valley that rather than be subjected to the delay in transportation and infrequent service they will ship their goods by railroad at much higher rates. When this result has been accomplished, and it will not take a great period of time, the railroad-owned steamers will be tied up somewhere in winter quarters and they will not be brought out and again placed in operation until some private steamboat interests again have the nerve and audacity to reestablish a new line of steamers. At that time the railroad-owned steamboats will again be brought into operation and but for the one proposition—to drive out honest and legitimate competition.

It appears that this control is so complete on the Atlantic coast that the business and the territory are divided or distributed so that the boats of one line stop at one port and the boats of another line pass that port by and stop at another terminal, so that there is absolutely no competition.

With these conditions known to all we face the question of allowing railroad-owned ships to pass through the canal or to exclude them. I do not like to exclude an American ship from the canal, however owned, but I do not want to see one of the prime purposes of the canal throttled. We have always looked upon the canal, when constructed, as a great regulator and leveler of railroad rates. We have expected it to be the one great free highway of commerce, safe from railroad control and domination. The people of this country are almost universally against its use by railroad owned or controlled ships. The business interests generally and those directly connected with the business of the canal are especially for their exclusion. The people who are to be served are for their exclusion, and the sections of the country directly affected are for such exclusion. On a matter of this kind I am willing to accept the judgment of the people. I have great confidence in the wisdom of the ultimate aggregate judgment of the people of the country and believe in enacting it into law. I wish the railroads had not given the people cause to feel this way toward them, but they have. The people are satisfied that the construction of the canal across the Isthmus was delayed many years by great railroad influences. They now fear that this great work, being about accomplished, that these same influences are seeking to control it. They do not want this done and, in view of their influence on other waterways, and in view of the almost universal sentiment of the country, I feel that we should keep the Panama Canal as free from railroad influence as we possibly can by legislation.

I shall take this course, not in any special antagonism to the railroads of the country, but giving them full credit for being the greatest agency in the building up of our splendid civilization and for doing more to bring all the people the many comforts and blessings and the great prosperity they now enjoy than any other agency. I believe it is for the best interests of the people as a whole that they should be excluded from the canal. This should be done now. If we wait until they build their ships, establish their service, and secure their business, we will not exclude them except after a tremendous struggle, if at all. We know what influences can be brought to bear, what arguments advanced, and what fears aroused against a disturbance of established conditions. It would take a political revolution to do it. There is no business to be disturbed now, no property values to be impaired, and no injustice will be done.

It is urged that if we do not let railroad ships pass through the canal the waterway will be idle. I do not believe this. The very moment we decide that such ships can not go through the canal in the coastwise trade independent capital will begin to prepare to handle the business between the two coasts that all know will be waiting the opening of the canal. The present coastwise business will not be disturbed by the withdrawal of the ships now engaged in it, and our shipyards will be put to work to build the ships to carry the traffic that all well know to be waiting. If we allow railroad ships in the canal many of those now in the coastwise business will go into this trade and the present service will be lowered and allowed to deteriorate. By excluding them we will induce more shipbuilding with all that that means in the employment of American labor and the purchase of American supplies.

I realize that we may not be able to keep the railroad-owned ships of Canada from the canal. I wish we could and hope we may devise some way to do it; but these ships will not act in conjunction with the railroads of this country, and they will be more active competitors with our railroads than their own ships would be, and so this may not be entirely bad. That is one of the evils we may have to bear and may offset some of the disadvantages that some seem to think Canada will be under by reason of free tolls.

I know of but four railroad-controlled ships that are now proposed to be built—the Pacific Mail, controlled by the Southern Pacific, under the advice of Mr. Schwerin, who says it wants to build four steamers for the transoceanic trade, with the privilege of doing some coastwise business. This proposal is attractive to me. I admire the ability, energy, enthusiasm, and patriotism of Mr. Schwerin. I believe he is sincere in his patriotic purpose to fly the American flag over these vessels in the foreign trade. I do not believe, with some, that he has an ulterior motive. I can appreciate the patriotic pride of a man like him in being instrumental in having constructed four great steamers to fly the American flag across the seas in foreign ports, bearing from our shores the products of our farms and factories. I would vote for it in a minute if the ghosts of throttled water lines did not come before me from the rivers and lakes and harbors of my country and protest against it.

I hope we may shut out the railroad ships, and I earnestly hope that the Pacific Mail will separate itself from the Southern Pacific and that Mr. Schwerin can get the money to build these great ships and see the American flag flying at their mastheads in oriental ports.

If Congress decides now that railroad-owned and railroad-controlled ships can not use the canal, I believe money can be secured for the building of these four ships as well as others that may be needed in and demanded by the business that will desire to use the canal. Do I know where? Of course not. But Capt. Dollar, an experienced shipping man, said in his testimony before us:

Senator BRISTOW. Suppose that the railroads were not permitted to have any steamship that used the canal and it was left open free from competition with the transcontinental railway companies' ships, do you think there would be a traffic developed, so good a traffic, that it would insure the investment of money in ships to handle the business via the canal?

Capt. DOLLAR. Yes; I feel quite sure of it.

Senator BRISTOW. It has been said to us here by a number of persons that unless the railroads build these ships nobody else would build them, and that the canal would not be used by anybody else.

Capt. DOLLAR. If I had a certainty, or even a prospect, of bucking up against the railroads there, I certainly would not build any ships. If I had a fairly good certainty of getting a square deal, I would not hesitate to build ships for that business.

Senator BRISTOW. Then, as a shipowner and an operator and builder of ships, you would not want to get up against such competition as railroad-owned steamship lines could give you in this coastwise traffic; you would not want to risk your capital in that enterprise, would you?

Capt. DOLLAR. No, sir. That is the sentiment of all shipowners with whom I have come in contact. Other than the ships nowadays constructed for the American-Hawaiian Line, there are no ships being built to engage in the canal traffic.

Senator BRISTOW. Your opinion is, then, as I understand it, that if it were known that the railroads would not be permitted to engage in that traffic, and that it would be free and open to steamship men to use, that steamships would be built and put in there by others?

Capt. DOLLAR. I think so, sir; there are a great many ships building now to engage in the coastwise trade on the west coast of South America—there are quite a number of ships being built for that trade.

Mr. Evarts, who appeared in behalf of the Pacific Mail, and who is the counsel of the Southern Pacific Railway Co., made this significant statement before the committee:

If the canal is not regulated, the real danger will not be that ships owned by railroads are going to stifle competition in the canal and drive out other business. If unregulated, the danger will come from the aggregations of foreign capital now engaged in shipping, that are now waiting and considering and preparing and planning to go into the canal. These foreign lines are backed by enormous amounts of capital. Their ships for the coastwise trade will be built in this country, of course, and put in the name of an American, but they will be to all intents and purposes foreign ships. It may be a fact, not perhaps important here, but yet one of general interest, that when there was a likelihood of the subsidy bill being passed by Congress the foreign shipowners sent to the shipyards of America and asked, with no conditions or anything: "How soon can you build us 20 ships?" That was from one line. If canal traffic is left unrestrained the danger of stifling competition in the canal will not come from American railroads, but from foreign capital.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire information. Will the Senator, as briefly as may be, state precisely what harm is to come from permitting so-called railroad-owned ships passing through the Panama Canal? The people of the country, the men and women of the country, own these railroads. What harm exactly is to come? The Senator speaks of throttling competition. Are they going to reduce rates to a nonproductive point and thus make it impossible for private-owned ships to profitably navigate the canal, or what are they going to do? What is the danger?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I thought I had pointed out some of the dangers that I apprehend. One is, of course, as I said, based on the experience we have had in reference to water lines of transportation and what heretofore apparently has been the policy of the railroads. Congress became so convinced of the policy of the railroads in this connection that we put a provision in the last railroad bill to prohibit them from cutting rates for the purpose of destroying water competition. They—the railroads—have cut rates to destroy water transportation, and when that was done they have put rates back to what they thought the traffic would stand.

The fear is, also, as stated here by Capt. Dollar, that if we allow railroad-owned ships to go through the canal independent shipping interests will be afraid, to put it that way, to build ships for that trade, that it will prevent the establishment of new lines for the operation of independent ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want that particular point clear. The danger that is in the Senator's mind and in the minds of those who agree with him, including Capt. Dollar, is that the railroads will reduce rates to a point so disastrous that private-owned ships will not be able to compete with them?

Mr. JONES. No; if the Senator will permit me, that was not exactly the point I made. The point was that if we allow railroad-owned ships to go through the canal, independent shipping, because of their experience heretofore, will not be constructed to engage in that trade. Possibly they will be afraid to do it because they will fear that rates would be put down and drive them out. The reduction of rates under such conditions would be only temporary. When the independent ships are driven out the rates would be again raised. If we had assurance that the rates would be kept down, I would not worry much about the railroad-owned ships going through.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the suggestion I made is in strict accordance with the view the Senator holds, that the only danger to the independent shipping interests is that railroads will navigate their ships through the canal at a cheaper rate than private parties can do. The building of ships I do not think enters into the computation. The railroads will build just as many ships, if the trade demands it, as private interests will. So I do not think that would make any difference.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In that connection, may I ask the Senator from Washington, can he conceive of any reason a railroad company would have in constructing boats to run through the canal to compete with themselves, to take their own business away from them, unless it was eventually to help the railroads by destroying competition?

Mr. JONES. I can not myself conceive of any different purpose from that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wanted to get a clear idea of what the contention was. This matter of railroad-owned ships, I confess I have not made a study of at all. If there is a reasonable fear that it will operate to stifle competition and destroy private enterprise, of course I am against it, but I want to get the Senator's view, because he has given it close study, I have no doubt.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. With the permission of the Senator from Washington, if when we get to section 11 the Senator from New Hampshire will be patient enough to listen to a few remarks that I hope to make on it, I believe I can convince him that the danger which the Senator from Washington anticipates will be very limited. I shall certainly be very glad to submit some facts to him along that line.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Kansas can go into the details in that matter much better than I can.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will anticipate listening to the Senator from Kansas, who is always entertaining and instructive.

Mr. JONES. I expect to go more into details myself when we come to consider section 11 of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On page 575 of the hearings before the committee the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] asked Capt. Dollar:

> Are you familiar with section 11 of the House bill now under discussion?
> Capt. DOLLAR. I have glanced through it, but I am not very familiar with it.
> Senator BRISTOW. Do you favor it or not?
> Capt. DOLLAR. That provides, does it not, for the Interstate Commerce Commission regulating it?
> Senator BRISTOW. It prevents the railroad-owned ships from using the canal, and provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall determine whether or not it is a competing ship.
> The CHAIRMAN. It prevents any railroad from being interested in any steamship which does or may compete with it.
> Senator BRISTOW. And permits the commission to determine whether or not that railroad ship is a competitive steamship line with the railroad's rail; that is it.
> Capt. DOLLAR. I would be in favor of regulating it. I do not think it would be right to cut them out altogether. I think they have just as much right to run boats through there as I have, provided they do not run all competitors off the route.

So he is in favor of regulating them and letting them go through.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the chairman of the committee will, when we get to section 11, bear with me, I hope to show that what Capt. Dollar anticipated would inevitably and surely happen; that is, they would all be run off except those that conformed to the demands of the railroad lines.

Mr. JONES. Of course, it has been my observation that where a man is on the witness stand before an investigating committee any considerable length of time upon a very particular and complicated matter we can find something in his testimony somewhere to sustain almost any position anyone desires to take. But the statement I read from Capt. Dollar awhile ago in reference to his views in regard to whether new ships would be built or not was right in line with Capt. Dollar's business experience, and I believe the statements I read as given by him show a just ground for fear as to the effect of the railroad-owned ships. But that is a matter, as I said a moment ago, in regard to details that I expect to go fully into when we get to the particular section. I am simply summing up my general views in reference to the matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me if I thought a witness would take almost any position anybody wanted I would not cite him as a very high authority on any point.

Mr. JONES. I did not intend to convey that impression at all. I think the Senator understands what I meant to convey with reference to the testimony of witnesses. You can take a detached statement from a witness's testimony and construe it to support almost any particular contention you may desire. A careful examination of the statement from Capt. Dollar is not in any great conflict with what I read, if carefully considered. The statement which I have just referred to from Mr. Evarts is a statement from a man who should know what he is talking about.

If foreign capital is ready to build ships and operate them in our coastwise trade, and should do so, it would have to build the ships in American shipyards, out of American materials, and with American labor, and operate them under American laws and conditions. While I would prefer American capital, I do not see very much objection to the use of foreign capital in this country for this purpose. In fact, it simply adds that much more capital to our own wealth and, as it must be used in accordance with our laws and our labor and industrial conditions, it is a benefit rather than an injury. If foreign capital is ready to be invested under these conditions, why can not American capital be secured? The same intelligence and business capacity that would use foreign capital advantageously certainly can be relied on to use home capital under exactly the same conditions and for the same purpose profitably.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would suggest to the Senator that foreign capital is solicitous to construct our railroads for us, and probably the road which Mr. Evarts represents has millions of foreign capital invested in it. Why should not foreign capital likewise be invested in steamship lines as well as in railroads?

Mr. JONES. I think that is true, especially when they operate in our coastwise trade and under coastwise conditions.

Mr. BRISTOW. And under American laws and by American seamen.

Mr. JONES. Yes. If we can get that additional capital added to our own capital, it will be used largely in the employment of American labor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does anybody object to that? Certainly I do not.

Mr. JONES. No; but I am simply presenting that to rebut the proposition that if the railroads are not permitted to construct ships to go through the canal there will be none constructed. To exclude railroad ships does not mean an idle canal. Ships will be built, the canal will be used, business demands will be met, the free use of the canal and American capital, energy, and industry, independent of railroad domination, will stimulate our shipbuilding industry, furnish employment to thousands of American workmen at good wages, increase the market for American products, promote great steamship lines from coast to coast, and reduce and hold railroad charges at a lower rate, lessen the burdens to our consumers, develop and build up the business, cities, and civilization of the two coasts, and relieve the interior of many exactions now borne by it and fulfill the hope of our people that this stupendous enterprise would be the most beneficial triumph of war or peace.

Mr. President, this is the most momentous legislation of this Congress and of many years. We must assert our right to develop with our own, for our own as we deem wise and proper without interference by any foreign power. We must deny the right of the treaty-making power to surrender to any other nation the right to control the use we shall make of our own property or the treatment we shall accord to our own people. The flag which flies over the Panama Canal must mean there the same as it does in any other Territory of the Republic. No toll gatherer should stand at its portals and exact tribute from American ships and American commerce any more than at the entrance of any other Government work. This greatest of all national undertakings must be kept free from railroad control and preserved as the most efficient defender of American enterprise and American business from monopolistic exactions. Built by American capital, completed by American energy and pluck, operated and controlled by the American Republic, with justice to our own people and impartiality toward all nations, this greatest achievement of the ages will glorify us and bless all mankind.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not know of any other Senator who wishes to make an address on this subject at this time. Therefore I assume we shall very shortly proceed to vote on the amendments to the bill. I do not think, with the present slim attendance, we ought to attempt that, and I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Sanders
Bacon	Crawford	McCumber	Simmons
Bailey	Culberson	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Smith, S. C.
Bourne	Cummins	Massey	Smoot
Bradley	du Pont	Myers	Sutherland
Brandegee	Fletcher	Nelson	Thornton
Bristow	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Townsend
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Warren
Burnham	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Wetmore
Burton	Jones	Perkins	Williams
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pomerene	Works
Clapp	La Follette	Root

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-one Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what was the last amendment which the Senate agreed to yesterday before adjournment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a pending amendment, which the Secretary will state.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let it be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending question is on the amendment offered by Mr. CUMMINS to the amendment of the committee, on page 4, line 20, after the word "reorganized," to insert "and who shall have sole control of the maintenance and operation of the canal," so that if amended it will read:

To reduce the membership of the commission to three, one chosen from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who shall be president of the commission as so reorganized, and who shall have sole control of the maintenance and operation of the canal——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was laboring under the impression that the amendment to the amendment just stated by the Secretary had been agreed to. If not, it is perfectly satisfactory to me and, so far as I can do so, I will accept it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary again stated Mr. CUMMINS's amendment to the amendment of the committee on page 4, line 20.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment proposed by the committee. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The Chair would suggest that on page 4, line 21, after the word "Tropics," the comma should be changed to a semicolon. Without objection, that amendment will be made. The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may be allowed to make a suggestion, I would say that I think it will facilitate matters if the other amendments proposed by the committee may be considered and acted upon. Then I will state that I offered yesterday, and had printed, an amendment proposing to restore substantially the House provision instead of section 4, the House provision being the scheme of one governor for the canal and the Canal Zone, and the Senate provision being a scheme for a commission of three to govern the zone. I think most people will agree if we are to have a commission of three, as provided in the Senate amendment, that the committee amendments indicated here should be agreed to. If there then be other amendments, of course, they may be proceeded with. Then I shall offer my amendment as a substitute for the section.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Connecticut now proposes to offer the House provision for the Senate amendment. Is that what I am to understand?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator do that as for the committee?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not at all. The majority of the committee proposed the amendment which is indicated in the bill. I was one of the minority who voted against it. The amendment as proposed by the committee is now being perfected as in Committee of the Whole of the Senate. After it is perfected, I am going to offer, on my individual responsibility, an amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not know whether the Senator from Connecticut was offering the amendment for himself or for the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no, Mr. President; I was not offering it for the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to say, as a member of the committee, that I had no notice of a recession from our original amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Since the committee reported the bill with amendments, there has been no meeting of the committee and no understanding that anybody has authority to speak for the committee further than as indicated in the Senate print of the bill, as I understand the situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is now pending no amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not to the committee amendment, but there are committee amendments pending to the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Connecticut does not want those amendments adopted before the substitute is offered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from New Hampshire says sotto voce that I did not ask that the committee amendments be adopted at the present time, but I suppose, under the ruling of the Chair yesterday, that after section 4, as it is printed in the bill, has been perfected by the adoption or rejection of the committee amendments, it would be in order for me to present the House provision as a substitute for the whole section. If I am in error about that, I should like to be corrected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now suggested by the Senator from Connecticut——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand the parliamentary situation. The subject before the Senate is the House bill, and this is an amendment of the committee to the House bill. I understand the Senator from Connecticut now proposes to offer an amendment in place of the Senate amendment. That seems to me to present rather a remarkable parliamentary situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Connecticut proposes to substitute a new section for the entire section. Is the Chair correct?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. After the House text has been modified to suit the views of the Senate by the adoption or rejection of such amendments as the Senate chooses to put upon the section, I propose to offer the House provision as a substitute for the section as amended by the Senate, if that be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would inquire of the Senator from Connecticut whether the amendment which is proposed is identical with the House provision?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it is not identical. There were some changes made in it yesterday. It is printed here.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Kansas will pardon the Chair a moment, as a parliamentary inquiry has been made, the Chair would hold if the amendment were identically the same, that simply voting against the committee amendment would be the same thing as voting for the House provision, but if it is not identical, then the motion of the Senator from Connecticut will be in order after the section has been perfected.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the question before the Senate was the Senate committee amendment to the House provision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly; and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] will not offer the amendment which he proposes until the Senate has first acted upon the amendments proposed by the committee. They have not yet been completed.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to state that in section 4 there are two distinct propositions: One is that the present commission shall be abolished whenever the President sees fit to do so; and the other is, that the present commission shall remain intact until the construction of the canal is completed. The Senate yesterday passed upon that proposition, and so amended section 4 as to provide for the continuance of the present commission until the construction of the canal has been completed. We are now considering an amendment which provides that after the canal is completed it shall be operated and the Canal Zone shall be governed by a commission of three, instead of by a single governor. The amendment contained in the words "as now constituted," in line 9, page 4, and the italics from line 18, on page 4, down to and including the words "the canal," in line 6, on page 4, is the amendment that is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment before the Senate, as stated on yesterday, includes as a part of the general amendment, the amendment on line 9, page 4, striking out the word "unnecessary" and inserting the words "as now constituted," and the amendment striking out the words beginning with the word "by," in line 9, down to the word "canal," in line 18, and inserting the words in italics from line 18, page 4, to line 6, page 5, as it has been amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The question now is upon agreeing to that amendment as amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, being a member of the committee and not having been able to be at the sessions very regularly on account of other business claiming my attention, I confess I do not exactly yet understand this matter, and I want to make some further inquiry. I understand that the Senate committee recommends as a substitute for the House plan of a single-man government in the Canal Zone the continuance of the commission after the canal is completed, but reduces the commission to three from the present number. Now, the Senator from Connecticut proposes to substitute for the commission provided for in the Senate amendment the House plan.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee, who is opposed to the committee amendment, has announced that if the Senate sees fit to support the committee amendment and incorporate that amendment in the bill, then he proposes again to try to defeat the wishes of a majority of the committee by offering to substitute practically the language which the committee has rejected and which, if the Senate sustains the committee, the Senate will have rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly.

Mr. BRISTOW. But the question now before the Senate is whether or not the amendment recommended by the committee shall be incorporated in the bill, and that is what we are now to vote upon.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are not voting, then, on the proposition of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not yet offered any proposition, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, without desiring to take up the time of the Senate unnecessarily, it seems to me, if we have the welfare of the administration of the Canal Zone in view, we ought to retain the provision of the House bill for one head instead of three. To-day, before the session opened, I saw a gentleman upon whom I rely who is familiar with conditions in the Canal Zone, and he informed me that there has been more or less friction—mild, it is true, but nevertheless friction—existing between Col. Goethals, the head of the commission, and the head of the sanitary department. With three coequal heads the unity and balance of the administration will be destroyed, whereas with one head, as the House proposes, there can be easily appointed under him a man to take charge of the sanitary affairs, and as for the civil business there is no occasion for any commissioner, because all the civil business that is necessary to be transacted can be transacted through the courts. To provide three coequal heads to manage the canal I regard as a very dangerous experiment. I have no interest in saving any of these commissioners, in having them keep their places. I do not care whether they are turned out of office or not; the main thing is the welfare of the canal.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if the present commission as organized has not done good work?

Mr. NELSON. In a way they have done good work, but the only two men who have done any special work are Col. Goethals, the head of the engineering department, who has had charge of the construction of the canal, and the man who has been at the head of the sanitary division. Outside of those two, if you can point to anything extraordinarily good that has been accomplished by the commission I should like to be informed what it is.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I resent what the Senator from Minnesota has said. While I would not detract in any way from Col. Goethals, because I know he is a man of great ability and a great executive officer, the men who are building that canal are Col. Sibert, from Alabama, who has had charge of the construction of the Gatun Dam and the locks on the Atlantic side; Col. Williamson, a Virginian, who has had charge of the lock construction on the Pacific side; Col. Gorgas, also of Alabama, who has had charge of the sanitation of that canal, one of the greatest physicians in the world, who will go down in history as one of the greatest men of his time; and the man who is in charge of the work on the great Culebra cut, Col. Gaillard, of South Carolina.

I say that the cause of the friction which has been referred to is that the officers have not been called together, but have submitted to one-man power there. There have been too many commissioners. I believe in dividing these powers. With the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, giving an engineer of the Army charge and control of the mechanical part of the canal itself, let us have a civilian who will manage the financial part of it, the schools and matters of that kind, and a man like Dr. Gorgas in charge of sanitation, through whose efforts the building of the canal had been made a success. I heartily indorse the amendment of the committee which provides for a commission of three. I do not believe in one-man power; I do not believe in having a dictator on that Isthmus. As I have said, I think the powers ought to be divided, but the commission ought to act under the President of the United States.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I also desire to resent the statement which has been made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. In the first place, I will indorse the remarks made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and I will add to them that the man who has been and now is at the head of the civil government in the Canal Zone has fully and ably discharged every duty imposed upon him. Under his management educational interests have been given great impetus and force; roads have been constructed; the police system in the cities properly attended to; and all the various other duties growing out of the civil administration of the zone have been satisfactorily and efficiently performed. I believe that with the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Iowa there can be no friction among these men. A civil engineer is to be appointed president of the commission and is given complete power in the management and control of the canal. While I have great admiration for the ability of Col. Goethals, I do not think that what he knows about running civil government, if published, would constitute anything like as large a book as Greeley's Almanac; and if he were to publish what he knows about sanitation it would be even a much smaller document.

I do not believe in making the civil power subordinate to the military power. I do not believe in a military satrap. Experience has taught us that men who are Regular Army officers exercise a species of tyranny that is exercised by few other men. If Col. Goethals is to control the canal, that should be the end of his power; but to allow him to control the sanitation would be ridiculous, because he has not shown himself to be possessed of any ability in that respect; and to allow him to control the civil government would be, if possible, more ridiculous and would result only in failure.

We were told yesterday that there were but two cities in the zone. In addition there are various towns in the zone lying along the railroad and along the banks of the canal from Colon to Ancon. These towns and cities have to be policed, not by military officers but by the civil authorities.

I think it would be a grave mistake to undertake to consolidate all power in one man. It would lead to misgovernment in the zone. I quite agree with the distinguished Senator from North Carolina in saying that the government there ought to be divided, the president of the commission, of course, having supreme control of the management of the canal.

Another matter to which I call attention is that some of these commissioners have been working on the canal for years. The language of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, as I understand it, is:

> That when in the judgment of the President the construction of the Panama Canal shall be sufficiently advanced toward completion to render the further services of the Isthmian Canal Commission unnecessary, the President is authorized, by Executive order, to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. President, every member of that commission should be allowed to hold his office until the canal is completed. Every one of them should be permitted to reap the distinction he has justly earned in connection with this great work. A portion of them should not be turned out and this canal turned over for the glorification of one individual; and I believe that when the canal is completed and a government is established there permanently, the departments should be retained as provided in the Senate bill.

Now, as this amendment has been reported by the committee, why should the Senate repudiate it and adopt the substitute provision which will be offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and which is substantially the provision of the House bill? This matter has been discussed and this amendment is about to be voted upon. It has been improved by the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and the House proposition has been rejected by a majority of the committee. I see no good reason for repudiating the action of the Senate committee, and I hope it may not be done.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the canal and the Canal Zone up to the present time have been managed and governed by a commission. We have heard from time to time that there was more or less friction down there, as there is apt to be when there is a partition of duties and of power; but, notwithstanding that slight, incidental, and, I think, necessary friction, the work has gone on admirably under the present commission. I doubt very much whether any similar work was ever more successfully prosecuted and more speedily brought to completion than this will be some time during next year.

Now, the provision which the committee has adopted as an amendment to the House bill is not to go into effect until the canal is completed. At that time the number of commissioners, according to the Senate committee amendment, will be reduced to three. The present head of the commission will continue to be the head of the smaller commission, who are to manage this zone after the canal has been completed and is open. I understand it is expected that Col. Goethals will continue to be chairman of the commission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Col. Goethals told me down on the Isthmus that under no possible circumstances would he take the government of the zone after the canal is completed; that he was nearly crazy with the responsibility and the efforts he had made there; and he proposes to go abroad and stay for two years and try to recuperate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very sorry to hear that. So much the worse, however, because if Col. Goethals, who has proved his capacity and his fitness for control and administration, is to retire, then, if we are to have but one man in control of the zone, it is likely that he may be an inexperienced man.

Mr. President, the Government business on the Canal Zone naturally subdivides itself into three parts. After the canal is completed it will require supervision by capable engineering upon it, and it will be an important part of the Government business down there to look after, care for, govern, supervise, and control the canal proper. But there is a strip of country on either side of the canal which belongs to the Government of the United States, 5 miles in width on either side. There are towns already located on the line of the canal. There are people living along the line of the canal. The population will increase from what it is to-day. I am not able to state how many people are living there to-day, but a considerable number are living there and a considerable number will continue to live there. It is necessary, therefore, that there shall be inaugurated upon that canal a civil government. We have provided for the establishment of courts; we have provided for the appointment of magistrates; we have provided for a system of laws for the government of the people who are to live along the canal. This is a part of the business of the United States Government upon the canal, and is wholly separate and distinct from the management of the canal considered as an entity.

Then, Mr. President, there is another important work that the Government has to do there in order that this enterprise may be carried to its fullest potentiality and in order that the canal may be continued in a sanitary and habitable condition, and that is that the work of sanitation which was commenced and has been prosecuted with such marvelous success by Col. Gorgas shall continue. This part of the business is of itself of great importance. The work of sanitation in the climatic conditions which exist down there is a work of tremendous consequence in connection with the success of the canal and the health of the people who live along the canal. So, naturally, the management of the canal divides itself into three parts—one the management of the canal, the other control of the civil government, and the third the sanitation of the Canal Zone.

The committee having this matter under consideration, feeling that it was not necessary to continue the present large commission, thought it was wise policy to reduce the number to three—one to control the canal, who is at the head of the commission, another to have charge of affairs connected with the civil government of the Isthmus, and the third to have control of the great and important work of sanitation in the Canal Zone.

Now, Mr. President, it is proposed to place the control of the civil government of the zone in whose hands? Let me read from the provision:

> To reduce the membership of the commission to three, one chosen from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who shall be president of the commission as so reorganized.

Mr. President, if we have one manager down there he will be a civil engineer and nothing else but a civil engineer. If he were to be of the high grade of Col. Goethals that would help the matter, but we are told that Col. Goethals is to retire; and we are to place, according to the House provision, the whole interest of the government of the canal and the people and the sanitation of that Isthmus under the control and the sole control and management of an Army engineer.

Mr. President, I have the highest respect for the Army engineers of this country. They are generally able and highly educated men. They have done their work magnificently in whatever line they have been required to perform work for the people and the Government. But the last thing that I want to see in this country is a civil government anywhere where the flag of the United States floats under the control of an Army engineer. That is one reason why I am opposed to this government by one man, this single head, this absolute control in one man. I know under the circumstances and conditions that that man will be an Army engineer, and he is, I hold, utterly unfit by reason of education and training to perform the functions and duties that pertain to civil government. There is to be a civil government of importance there. The people upon that Isthmus will multiply. There are a great many of them there now. There will be prosperous towns, and possibly cities, along the Isthmus who are to be governed, and I want them to be governed, as has been the custom of the Anglo-Saxon race from the beginning, not by a man of military training, of military experience and instincts, beginning, as they do, with an arbitrary disposition, but I want them to be governed by a man trained in the affairs of civil government.

I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, to vest what you might call the chief power in the hands of one man, but with three great departments of momentous interest to the Government, some of business, some affecting the life and liberty in the citizen, some affecting the health of the citizen, I want each one to have a fit representative in its control.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am opposed to the House proposition to turn over all these great interests to one man, and that man an engineer of the Army.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I can not refrain from speaking a word in behalf of the engineers who have devoted the best years of their life to the work of the construction of this canal. I would not take from Col. Goethals any of the honor that he so richly deserves. I am glad the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] did not refer to Col. Gorgas as one of the men who had contributed nothing of consequence to the construction of the canal. As I said yesterday, Col. Gorgas was assigned to the Isthmus of Panama when we first took possession of the strip and began our work. He has been there in charge of the sanitation down to the present time, and no criticism has ever been offered against him to my knowledge.

But I want to speak specially in behalf of the men who have been in charge of these divisions, whom the Senator from Minnesota thinks have contributed nothing to the construction of the canal. Col. Sibert has been in charge of the construction of the Gatun Dam, which is the greatest enterprise of its kind that mankind has ever undertaken, and it will soon be completed and stand as a monument to his energy and genius. I want to speak a word in behalf of Col. Hodges, who, I am told, is the best-equipped man in regard to canal locks probably that there is in the United States. He was selected by President Roosevelt because of his great ability demonstrated in the line of duty as an Army engineer. I want to speak a word in behalf of Col. Gaillard, who has had charge of the excavation at the Culebra Cut, and the work of organization and the detail over which he has authority and supervision have been performed, I might say, without fault.

It is unfortunate that remarks were made in the United States Senate which intimated that these men, who have devoted the best years of their lives, have not contributed anything commendable in the construction of this great enterprise. It is not the man who is in the limelight who always deserves the greatest credit. I care not how great a man may be, unless his immediate subordinates, his lieutenants, are equal to the task imposed upon them, the man in charge will fail.

I have no sympathy with the spirit that seems to prevail now in some quarters that it is desirable to get rid of these men who have devoted years in that climate to this work as quickly as possible. If there is any friction there I am certain that they are not to blame for that friction. If there is any friction there it is because some men are desirous of having their own way about some detail matters when probably it is not best that they should.

What we ought to do is to preserve the condition as it is, not to do anything that will in any way humiliate the men who have done such fine work, but to contribute as much as we can to their honor, and credit them with the achievement that they have worked out.

I trust that the amendments submitted by the committee will prevail, because I am not in favor of establishing a bureaucracy in any of our possessions. I know that fundamentally the judgment of three men is better than one on any proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee as it has been amended.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was trying to prepare a substitute for the amendment, and I suggest to the chairman of the committee that this matter be passed over temporarily and some other part of the bill taken up, and that we return to it a little later.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did the Senator from Missouri address an inquiry to me?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not hear it.

Mr. REED. I was asking if this particular clause which is now under discussion could not be passed over temporarily and returned to later, and other parts of the bill taken up. I desire to draw a substitute for it and submit it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would hesitate to agree to that proposition unless the Senate voted for it. We have been on this matter now for two afternoons. The other parts of the bill are just as important as is this. If the Senator desires to prepare a substitute I will say to him he was not present when I said I am going to offer a substitute, and if that is agreed to, or whether it is or not, the Senator will have plenty of time before the bill goes into the Senate to prepare his substitute and offer it. As we go along I should like to feel that what is behind us is behind us. I suppose the Senator could move to reconsider later on and offer his substitute. I should like to have a vote on this matter if no Senator cares to speak further on it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Missouri can give notice that he will offer his amendment in the Senate.

Mr. REED. Of course I can do that; but when the bill gets in the Senate no one will desire then to stop and debate it at length again. It did not seem to me to be an unusual request to pass over this amendment now and take up some other matter and return to it this afternoon. It will only take a few minutes to prepare my substitute, and I want to prepare it right. I, of course, can stand up here now and take time talking about it, but I do not want to do that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crawford	McCumber	Simmons
Bacon	Culberson	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Bailey	Cullom	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Cummins	Massey	Smith, Mich.
Bourne	du Pont	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bradley	Fall	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Stone
Bristow	Gallinger	Overman	Sutherland
Bryan	Gronna	Page	Swanson
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Thornton
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Townsend
Catron	Jones	Pomerene	Warren
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Reed	Wetmore
Clapp	La Follette	Root	Williams
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Shively	Works

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. PERCY] is absent necessarily on important business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of Senators, 60 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, receded from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, and 4, and agreed to the same with an amendment to each, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, and further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 9, 10, and 11 to the bill, upon which the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 21952. An act for the relief of James E. Baer; and

H. R. 22195. An act to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, receding from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, and 4, and agreeing to each with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate, and further insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 9, 10, and 11, upon which the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
August 5, 1912.

Resolved, That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agrees to the same with amendments, as follows: Omit the matter inserted by said amendment and in lieu of the paragraph stricken out insert:

"For salaries of 18 agents for the payment of pensions at the rate of $4,000 per annum each during the first half of the fiscal year 1913, $36,000.

"For salary of 1 agent for the payment of pensions, at the rate of $4,000 per annum for the last half of the fiscal year 1913, $2,000; and from and after the 31st day of December, 1912, there shall be only one agent for the payment of pensions, to be appointed in the manner now provided by law, and who shall receive a salary at the rate of $4,000 per annum; and section 4780 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the appointment of agents for the payment of pensions is repealed to take effect from and after December 31, 1912."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Omit the matter inserted by said amendment and restore the matter stricken out amended to read as follows:

"For clerk hire, and other services, at 18 pension agencies during the first half of the fiscal year 1913 and at 1 pension agency during the last half of the fiscal year 1913 and including not exceeding $10,000 for expenses of consolidating and removing records and equipment of pension agencies, $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That estimates in detail shall be submitted for the fiscal year 1914 and annually thereafter for clerks and others employed in the pension agency, and the amounts to be paid to each."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$2,225."

That the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 9, 10, and 11.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate, that the Senate ask for a conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that this matter comes over to us again in substantially the same shape as it was before, with the exception that the House has adopted what seems to me at least to be a novel procedure, and that is the matter of amending a conference report. The result, I understand, is in effect that that action discharges the conferees on the part of the House and leaves it to the Senate to adopt the House measure, or, refusing to adopt it, to ask for a conference upon its part.

I have assumed that to be the parliamentary status, and I have made my motion to conform to it. I desire to say simply in explanation that there has been no change in the proposition of the House, with the exception instead of an immediate abolition of the agencies they propose to abolish them on the 31st day of December, and appropriations are made up to that time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, is this matter open for discussion now or to an objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate decides to proceed to its consideration, it is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the matter is going to provoke discussion, I shall have to insist upon the regular order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire simply to say to the Senator from Connecticut that I hoped it would not lead to any extended discussion. We are now several days behind in the matter of the payment of pensions, and the action of the House leaves the matter in abeyance, so that there are no conference on the part of the House. We will hurry the matter through, and also make a final disposition of it by sending the bill again to conference as soon as possible.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My own view, Mr. President, is that the Senate should recede and accept the action of the House. That is the reason why I object to the appointment of conferees.

Mr. McCUMBER. That motion could be made now and voted on. I do not see the necessity of further discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the regular order be continued this afternoon, and if by insisting upon the regular order it will continue, I do insist upon it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I will ask the Senator having the unfinished business in charge if he will consent to lay it temporarily aside until we can dispose of this matter. I make this request in behalf of a great army of veterans who are being discommoded, at least, if not further than that, in not receiving their pensions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from North Dakota knows that the regular order can be demanded by a single Senator. It takes unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the Panama Canal bill. The regular order has been demanded, which is equivalent to an objection to the request for unanimous consent to temporarily lay the bill aside.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought if the Senator having the bill in charge would indicate on his own part a willingness to lay it aside possibly we might meet the objection that otherwise would be interposed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. My impression is that the rule of the Senate is that when a Senator asks for the consideration of a conference report and objection is made the question shall be submitted to the Senate. Am I correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would undoubtedly so hold were it not that the Senate is engaged in the regular order. So long as the regular order is before the Senate the demand of one Senator will necessitate the continuance of that order, unless the Senate by a majority vote should otherwise order, in which case the regular order would be displaced.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would not wish to have that done. I had an impression that the rule is pretty clear that a conference report having been submitted to the Senate and the Senator having it in charge asking that it should be considered, if an objection was made the question of consideration should be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct as to the general proposition. The Chair simply added that that could only be done in a way which would displace the regular order if the motion to proceed to its consideration should be adopted.

Mr. LODGE. If the Chair will permit me, if the question of consideration is submitted and prevails, of course that sets aside and displaces the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It displaces the regular order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assumed that that would be the case, and that is the reason why I sought to find a way out by getting the Senate to agree that the unfinished business might be temporarily laid aside, so that we could dispose of this matter in a short time and facilitate the purpose of securing money for the payment of the pensioners.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That has already been objected to. The Senator can bring it up in the morning hour to-morrow. I would accommodate the Senator if I could.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment of the committee as it has been amended.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, before putting the question to a vote I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a time not exceeding two minutes.

It seems to me that the real question in controversy in this matter is as to who shall have the appointment of the officials charged with the administration of affairs in the Canal Zone. We must all admit that there will be three departments at work there, the engineering department, the sanitation department, and the civil government part.

Those who prefer the House provision wish to have the person who is designated as governor of the zone to appoint the officials to carry out that work, for necessarily he must appoint others to do it, for he can not be expected to do it himself; whereas we who favor the Senate committee amendment think that the President of the United States should be charged with the power and responsibility of appointing those officials. That, I believe, is the real difference between us.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield for a question?

Mr. THORNTON. I have finished.

Mr. BURTON. I wish to read from page 5 of the bill, beginning in line 17. After stating that the governor of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the following is the House provision:

> All other persons necessary for the completion, care, management, maintenance, sanitation, and operation of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, or by his authority, removable at his pleasure, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may, by appropriation act or other law, regulate the same.

Mr. THORNTON. I will ask the Senator from Ohio to what portion of the bill he is referring?

Mr. BURTON. That is found on page 5, beginning with line 17, immediately after the provision for the appointment of the governor. It would seem that the contention of the Senator from Louisiana is secured by the provision of the House bill.

Mr. THORNTON. The House bill provides that—

> The President is authorized thereafter to complete and operate the Panama Canal or cause it to be completed and operated through a governor of the Panama Canal and such other persons as he may deem competent to discharge the various duties connected with the completion, care, maintenance, sanitation, operation, and protection of the canal.

I take it for granted, Mr. President, that the governor of the canal is the one who will really appoint and have the sole authority over these other officials, and that is the point that I am objecting to in this provision.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I feel a great deal of regret at taking a moment of the Senate's time to discuss this matter. I would not do so if it did not appear to me that we are multiplying the machinery of the Government in a wholly unnecessary way. It is very easy to create a great many positions, but when once created it is almost impossible to abolish them. We had an experience of that kind the other day. Report after report had been filed stating that it was wholly unnecessary to have some 17 pension agencies in this country. It must have been apparent to everyone that the simple form of sending out payments of pensions was a thing that could be transacted from 1 office even better than it could be transacted from 17 separate offices. There is not a business concern on earth that, charged with duties as simple as the payment of pensions, would ever think of establishing more than one office for the purpose of distributing those funds; yet when we came to be asked to abolish these places we found a solid party vote arrayed for the preservation of the jobs that now exist.

We are now about to take the initial step toward the establishment of a government in the Canal Zone. It is a strip of land 10 miles wide and about 50 miles long. I am not sure that I am correct as to the length, but it does not embrace more than one-quarter of the territory that is embraced in the ordinary county of an ordinary State. It does not embrace in population anything like the number of people contained in the ordinary counties of an ordinarily populous State. It has very few white people who are there permanently; perhaps we might almost say none who are there permanently.

Now, it is proposed to set up a machinery of government more complicated and more extensive than that which is established in the great States of this country—a governor, with a salary of $10,000 a year, yet the governors of most of the States of this Union do not receive to exceed $5,000 a year, and in many States they receive less. Two other governors at $9,000 a year each are provided for. We are about to divide this government of the Canal Zone into three parts. It looks to me a great deal like the same kind of division that was once made of Gaul when it was divided not so much for the purpose of government as for the purpose of revenue.

The argument for this complicated machinery is grouped around a very seductive thought, one that appeals to every one of us, namely, that there should not be a military government over the people in their civil affairs, and I grant that argument with all the force with which it was uttered; but it seems to me that it does not, therefore, follow that we should have a sanitary governor and a canal governor. It strikes me that this is a very simple proposition. There are some people living along the Canal Zone there; not very many; I do not know what the population is——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one second, if the Senator will pardon me. Can some one here enlighten me as to the total population of the Canal Zone when our employees shall have moved out?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, it is estimated by Col. Goethals that not to exceed 2,500 people will be required to operate the canal, and it is proposed to move all the remainder of the people from the Canal Zone excepting, of course, the families of the employees. A great portion of that territory will be covered by the lake, and it is necessary to remove them. The best-advised men down there say that they all should be removed. Of course that is a mooted question; but there are practically no white people down there, as the Senator from Missouri suggests, except those who are engaged in the construction of the canal.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Michigan speaks now of employees, but, in addition to employees, what will be approximately the population?

Mr. TOWNSEND. There is no white population down there in addition to the employees.

Mr. REED. About how many are there of the other kind?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, it is very difficult to say how many are there who are not engaged in the operation or construction of the canal, but not to exceed a few thousand.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am surprised to hear what the Senator from Michigan says about the number of people in those towns in the Canal Zone. When I was there it was pretty thickly settled, though those I saw may have been employees. There were some merchants, and I was told that a good many young men had bought plantations there and gone into the coconut business. I visited the Isthmus and I saw a great many people in the towns, owning houses, many of them beautiful houses.

Mr. TOWNSEND. To what town is the Senator from North Carolina referring?

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course, that was in Panama.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not speaking of the termini of the canal—Colon and Panama.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I am speaking of.

Mr. TOWNSEND. At Colon and Panama, while we are, in a measure, responsible for the government we are not in control of the people. They have governments of their own, except, of course, that we have been acquiring a large portion of Colon, and that may eventually be considered as a part of the population.

Mr. REED. But we do not exercise sovereignty over the part the Senator is referring to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Not yet.

Mr. REED. Well, when we get a larger sovereignty it will be time enough to talk about the officering of that part of it; but we may never get sovereignty.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not been to the Isthmus, and I know nothing about it from personal observation, but I was under the impression that on the Isthmus, along the line of the canal, there were several very thrifty little towns. I am told that on the map there are 10 towns marked out; and I was under the impression that there was quite a little population there outside of those who are engaged in work upon the canal. I should like to know about that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not been at the Isthmus during the past three years. I was there prior to that time; but in discussing the matter with members of the commission and others who have been there, I have been led to believe that we have not any considerable permanent white population down there, except at the termini of the canal—at Panama and Colon.

Mr. REED. And that part the Senator refers to we do not exercise sovereignty over?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Except, as I say, in a measure, in Colon, where we own or are acquiring property.

Mr. REED. But I am speaking of governmental sovereignty.

Mr. TOWNSEND. We do not, except to maintain order for purposes of canal construction.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Do I understand the Senator from Michigan to maintain that we will not exercise sovereignty over the population of Balboa and Cristobal?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was not discussing that.

Mr. BRISTOW. And over towns or cities that are developing at the termini of the canal?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator did not understand me to say anything of that kind. I was not discussing that; I was discussing the question of Panama and Colon. That was the question the Senator asked me.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I started to interrupt him a little while ago, but desisted. The Senator has been discussing the salaries of officials and the partition of power and jurisdiction on the Isthmus. I want the Senator to understand that my chief objection to a single head there has been the conviction that I have had that that head would be a military man. If he were to be a civilian, if the law required that he should be a civilian, a large part of my objection would be removed; but if we had a civilian head, he would, of course, have to be paid a salary. I understand we have to pay somewhat higher salaries down there than we do here.

As to the other two officers, the manager of the canal would have to be, I understand, a high-class man, and the man in charge of sanitation would have to be a high-class man. Even if he were a mere subordinate, appointed by the governor or appointed by the President subject to the governor, he would have to be a high-class man, and we would have to pay him probably a salary something like the salary that we have been paying the president of the canal commission, and something like the salary we have been paying Col. Gorgas, who has been at the head of the sanitary work down there. So I do not see, from the economical standpoint, that the situation would be very much changed.

Mr. REED. I was about coming to that, and will in a moment. I do not think the Senator from North Carolina and myself are very far apart in our fundamental views in regard to this question. It frequently happens, when a plan is brought in and we begin discussing the plan, we never pause to consider whether the plan itself is the right plan, and thus we begin considering that particular plan which is submitted in various lights and phases, when it may be fundamentally wrong.

If the Senate will pardon me for going back, I was saying this is a very small strip of ground, about one-quarter of the size of an ordinary county in an ordinary State. Its population, it appears, is not equal to the population which would exist in the same strip of territory in an ordinary State. Indeed, we are now told that when our Government shall have withdrawn its surplus force there will be about 2,500 people living within that territory over which the Government now exercises sovereignty.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Whoever stated that I believe to have been mistaken. It is the estimate of the commission, I believe, that it will require 2,500 men to operate and maintain the canal. That estimate does not include the families of the men, nor does it include those who will be engaged in some kind of business at either end of the canal or in the towns that may be necessary and will exist along the route of the canal. I believe there is no dispute with regard to the facts I have just stated. It is inconceivable to me, having recently visited the Isthmus, that there can be less than twenty-five or thirty thousand human beings at the termini of the canal and along the route of the canal.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, he has been down and investigated, and I know the Senator from Iowa is so fair that he will give us his candid views. He speaks, however, of the towns at the termini. Does he mean to include in his statement any people living outside of the territory over which we exercise sovereignty?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not. The termini to which I refer are Cristobal, on the Atlantic side, and Ancon, or, rather, Balboa, as it undoubtedly will be ultimately named, upon the Pacific side.

Mr. REED. The Senator's estimate of the population is 25,000?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have said that it seems to me that there can not be less than that number there.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. There may be many more than that number.

Mr. REED. I will take the estimate of the Senator from Michigan of 2,500.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think the record will show that I said there would be 2,500 persons employed on the canal.

Mr. REED. But the Senator further said that he thought there would be very few white people outside of that. I do not care to be critical about it, but whether the Senator from Michigan be correct in his estimate or the Senator from Iowa be correct in his, makes no difference in the deduction I am about to draw. Even if there should be 50,000 people there, still the population would not be greater than that of a city very moderate in size, and 25,000 or 10,000 or 15,000, whatever it may be, is still a small population, such as we find in our little cities scattered throughout the country.

Now, it is proposed to establish a civil government. What is necessary to that end? Do we need more than one man for that civil government? Manifestly not. If the great city of New York can be put under the control of one man, its mayor, if the other great cities of this country can be put under the control of one man, if the Philippine Islands can be put under the control of one man, then why can not this little narrow strip of land, at the present time almost without population, except those who are there employed by the Government, be put under the control of one man? Why do we need more than one man for the civil government? That man, because he deals with civil government, and with the rights of the people in their civil relations to each other and to the government, ought to be a civilian. I agree with all the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] said when he inveighed against ever placing a military governor over people engaged in the peaceful pursuits of civil life. So I am agreed to a governor who shall be a civilian.

Now, let us see what else there is down there which requires any other office of government. We have constructed at enormous expense this great canal. It is distinctly the property of the Government. It is the most expensive piece of governmental property we have or that has ever been built in the history of the world. It is of vast importance to our commerce and to our Nation and to the world. But it was constructed by officers of the United States Army. Its maintenance involves no greater degree of care, no greater degree of skill, than does the maintenance of other great public works of this country, and the best management, the best maintenance, the best guardianship you can establish over it is to have the President of the United States designate a high-class engineer of the Army and place him there in control of the canal proper, without any governmental power, without any governmental function, but in charge of the canal the same as the commander of a fortress is in charge of a fortress.

I say it is utterly wrong, in my opinion, not to use a harsher term, to talk about appointing a man as governor of the canal; it is as useless as talking about appointing a man governor of Fortress Monroe; it is as useless as it would be to appoint a man governor of Fort Riley. It is absolutely without any virtue. What the President ought to do is to designate a high-class, skilled, wise Army engineer and put him in supreme control of the canal itself, with all its locks and all its valuable property, and that should be done merely by detail, and no man should be put down there to stay forever. No man should be put down there for the salary. He ought to be put down there at the salary he receives in his position, with a liberal and proper allowance for his expenses.

Now, that takes care of that. What else is there? We are told that there are difficult problems of sanitation. But who solved them? Was he not an Army officer, and have we not given in our Army profound and careful thought and study to the great question of sanitation, and do we not boast that we have solved many of these difficulties, and that to-day the officers charged with the sanitation of our Army are abreast of the foremost in the world? If that be true, why should not the President designate to serve under the civil governor, but with broad powers, an officer of the Army, who may have charge of the sanitation?

What have you got there? The simplest plan in the world—a civil governor to set up civil government, to establish courts, and manage the civil affairs of those people. When it comes to the control of the canal, two officers of the Army to be designated by the President for that purpose. Why have three governors? Why have this machinery? Why set up this expensive and complicated system?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think if the Senator had been present yesterday he would have understood that this commission in fact provides for exactly what he says ought to be there. There is an Army officer, and the provision which the Senate committee recommends provides that a member of the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army shall be in charge of the operation and maintenance of the canal, as the Senator has suggested. The committee amendment provides that there shall be one commissioner appointed from civil life, who shall be charged with the civil affairs, and then a sanitary officer who is to do the work which is to correspond with the work that has been performed by Col. Gorgas as sanitary commissioner. The provisions which the Senator says ought to be in the bill are provided for in the bill.

Mr. REED. The one that is printed?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. REED. Oh, no, Mr. President. It is a very different scheme. This provides for the continuance of a commission. That is just the thing you do—the reduction of the present commission to three members, one chosen from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who shall be president of the commission as so reorganized.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will permit me, that provision has been amended by an amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa placing him in complete charge of the operation of the canal and its maintenance.

Mr. REED. I suppose the Senator refers to the discussion. Very well. I have not the benefit of that amendment. I was not here when it was offered. But does it propose to put an Army officer in control?

Mr. BRISTOW. It proposes to put a member of the Corps of Army Engineers in control of the operation of the canal.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand that.

Mr. REED. I should like to have it reported. I should like to hear it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand that. The civil affairs of the Isthmus are put under the control of one of the commissioners.

Mr. BRISTOW. The one chosen from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who shall be president of the commission as so reorganized; and then it was amended so as to provide that he is to have control of the operation and maintenance of the canal.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Then there is another one of the commissioners who is in charge of civil affairs.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly. But the Senator from Missouri asked if this governor would be in charge of the operation and maintenance of the canal, and my answer was that he would be.

Mr. REED. No; the Senator is mistaken. At least the Senator is mistaken or I do not understand it. I may be mistaken. I should like to have this amendment that has been offered reported. It has not been printed, and I have not seen it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 20, after the word "reorganized," and after the comma, insert:

And who shall have sole control of the maintenance and operation of the canal.

So that if amended it will read:

One chosen from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who shall be president of the commission as so reorganized, and who shall have sole control of the maintenance and operation of the canal.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Secretary please read the entire sentence, so that it may be more fully understood?

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. That when the construction of the Panama Canal——

Mr. CUMMINS. The entire sentence. I meant to begin at the amendment of the Senate committee and read the first sentence. I know the former part of the sentence, but it will not aid in the present situation.

The Secretary read as follows:

One chosen from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who shall be president of the commission as so reorganized and who shall have sole control of the maintenance and operation of the canal, one experienced in the work of sanitation in the Tropics, and one a civilian.

Mr. REED. The rest of the paragraph stands unchanged?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Up to this time.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, of course the amendment of the Senator from Iowa takes away from the Army engineer the civil control, but the commission of three still exists that does exercise supreme control over all parts of the Canal Zone, including the canal; and this Army officer—and there may be two Army officers still exercise control because they are members of the board.

Now, the Senator from Kansas stated—I am sorry he has left the Chamber—that my plan was the same plan. It is a very different proposition. One is a government of the canal by a commission, two members of which may be, and one of which certainly must be, a member of the Army—an Army officer; and these Army officers exercise a predominating control in the commission. Thus you have a military government of the Canal Zone, or at least you have a government of the Canal Zone by the military. Then you have a board of three engineers, and you have three salaries aggregating, I believe, $28,000 a year.

The proposition I make is almost diametrically the opposite of that. It is to have a civil governor, one man, who shall have charge of the civil affairs of the Canal Zone, and that ends the government question. The President shall detail a skilled Army engineer, who shall have charge of the works of the canal itself, and if necessary the President shall detail another Army engineer or officer skilled in the business of sanitation, who shall look after the sanitation of the Canal Zone.

What have you got then? You have simply detailed two Army officers to do that kind of work which they are doing in this country, and you have put one man, a civilian, as governor of this little strip of ground, and you have saved a lot of money and a lot of red tape and a lot of machinery, and you have civil officers administering civil government. I can see no objection to that plan.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator in his remarks spoke about the size of the territory and the number of the people, and he said, what is true, that in this country we have mayors governing great cities. The Senator recognizes the fact that while in this country the mayor governs a great city, the mayor does not appoint all the officers. The people elect the officers who are to perform the duties under the mayor.

Now, that was one of the conditions the Senate committee was trying to meet by this amendment. Under the House provision all the subordinates who were to perform the actual functions of government were to be appointed by the President. There was a governor, and all other persons necessary to the government of the zone, appointed by the President or by his authority. That meant by his authority. It meant that the President should vest in the governor the right and the function of appointing all subordinate officials.

But we sought to get rid of that, and to give the commission the authority to appoint. But let me ask the Senator a question. I like his plan. It is the plan of the Senate somewhat reversed, and better. He proposes a civil head. Then he proposes to put the canal under the control of a subordinate, and to put the work of sanitation under the control of a subordinate. I grasp that, of course. I like that better.

If the Senator's plan is adopted, who will appoint these officers—these subordinate officers outside, I mean, of the head of the Canal Zone; the manager of the canal and outside the manager in charge of sanitation? Who will appoint the other officers? Is it expected that the President will appoint them or that the civil governor will appoint them? We have tried to avoid putting into the hands of one man the right to appoint all the officers of that zone, whether they are engaged in work connected with the civil government or in work connected with sanitation or in work connected with the Canal Zone. Under the plan proposed by the Senator, who would make those appointments? I think that is a very important consideration.

Mr. REED. Of course the only difference now between the plan submitted by the Senate committee and the plan I suggest upon the one point is who shall appoint the subordinate officers of the government, excluding from the term subordinate the manager of the canal itself and the inspector or manager of sanitation; that is to say, the inferior officers, by which, I presume, it means perhaps the policing and the other work that goes with government. The only difference between the Senate committee's plan and my plan as it stands here now is that the Senate committee vests it in a board of three, while my plan would vest it in one man. But the Senate committee plan sets up a board of three, two of whom are Army officers, and I would rather leave the entire appointment in civil government to one officer selected from civil life than to leave it to a board the majority of whom are selected from the Army or Navy. I say that with due respect to the Army or Navy. I agree with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from North Carolina. These men are good men, skillful men, brave men, splendid men, but they have been trained to the business of the Army and Navy and not to the business of common civil life, and I am unwilling that they shall exercise, except in a time of actual danger, control over the civil affairs of the people, either here or elsewhere.

Mr. President, answering a little more in detail the statement of the Senator from North Carolina, for it was more a statement than an interrogatory, and I thank him for it, I would be unwilling, if we are ever to have any considerable population in the Canal Zone, to confer arbitrary power upon either a board of men or upon one man. I think when you get down to the question of really establishing a government there that is to be permanent in its character, we must pass some necessary laws giving to the local population some rights of setting up their local government. I am unwilling that any part of the world which is American territory shall be permanently placed under a guardianship established here in Washington. Of course to have a governor is one thing, but to absolutely give to that governor the entire right of control and government is quite a different thing.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator allow me? In the House plan the Senator will see that exactly that point was involved, and that is what the committee was confronted with:

> All other persons necessary for the completion, care, management, maintenance, sanitation, and operation of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, or by his authority, removable at his pleasure.

That meant of course in the last analysis that they would all be appointed by this one man. That is one of the difficulties in the whole situation.

Mr. REED. Sometimes a bad plan will start traveling along a certain road and those who follow it will never get down to consider the right plan. We go in a direction because we started that way sometimes. But the Senator did not read all of the House plan. Reading, beginning where he did, and following on:

> All other persons necessary for the completion, care, management, maintenance, sanitation, and operation of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, or by his authority, removable at his pleasure, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may, by appropriation act or other law, regulate the same.

Whether that means to be limited to salaries or not I am not certain. At first glance I thought not, but it may be that that is the meaning. However that may be, the fact that the House in its bill did not provide for a government is no reason why we should not do it. There is no insuperable obstacle presented here to-day for the amendment of this measure so that a government shall be established. But I take it that this is a temporary measure at best and at worst, and all we are undertaking to do now is to provide a temporary government. I see no special wrong in vesting in a civil governor these powers at the present time. Certainly I would as willingly do that as I would vest it in a board two-thirds of which were military. Then as soon as the canal is open surely Congress can pass a law that will provide for the other functions of government that must be employed.

I have taken a great deal of time here in discussing this matter, to the weariness undoubtedly of the Senate, but I am unwilling to set up machinery that we will never be able to take down again. If you appoint three governors there, with fat salaries, they will be there until the youngest man in the Senate has been gathered to his fathers. I am opposed to it, and I offer as an amendment the following——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit me to say, before he reads his amendment, that I agree entirely with him about the matter of salaries, but I do not see that his plan will avoid the difficulties on that score which confronted the committee. I think the salaries will have to be maintained at about the same rate whether we adopt the committee's plan or the Senator's plan.

I want to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I am not satisfied with the House plan; neither was I satisfied with the plan adopted by the committee; and that was the reason why I was trying to aid the Senator a little while ago to get time in order to frame something that would more nearly meet the situation.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator's position and that he does not specially prefer one plan over the other, but he thinks the bill might be improved.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is right.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am sorry I have not had time to write it out—the amendment—in proper form, but I move to amend section 4 so that it shall read as follows:

> That when in the judgment of the President the construction of the Panama Canal shall be completed so as to render unnecessary the further services of the Isthmian Canal Commission as now constituted, the President is authorized by Executive order to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission, which together with the present organization, shall then cease to exist; and the President is authorized thereafter to complete and operate the Panama Canal or cause it to be completed and operated through such officer or officers of the United States Army as he may deem competent to discharge the various duties connected with the completion, maintenance, and operation of the said canal. The President shall appoint a civil governor of the Canal Zone who shall be a civilian, and shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum. All other persons necessary for the care, maintenance, and sanitation of the Canal Zone shall be detailed from the military or naval forces of the United States. The governor shall have power to appoint such assistants and employ such aids in the conduct of the civil government of the Canal Zone as may be hereafter authorized by Congress. Officers of the United States Army or Navy detailed for service in the Canal Zone may, in the discretion of the President, be allowed a compensation in addition to that now fixed by law not to exceed 25 per cent of the salary now paid. Upon the completion of the Panama Canal the President shall cause the same to be officially and formally opened for use and operation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator to offer that as a substitute for the paragraph.

Mr. REED. As a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute offered is in order, but before it is put it is proper to perfect the original section by acting upon the amendment that has been proposed or amendments that may be proposed. The pending amendment is that reported by the committee to the original section. After the section has been perfected the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to strike out and insert will be in order. First, the amendment now proposed to the section as it stands will be acted upon and then the question will be presented to the Senate on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The question now is on the adoption of the committee amendment as it has been amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the amendment extending only to and including the word "canal," on the sixth line of the fifth page. That is the amendment now before the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as thus amended. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment as amended is agreed to. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, lines 6 and 7, the committee propose to strike out the words "as aforesaid" and to insert "under the provisions of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 8, after the word "military," insert the word "naval."

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand that the vote was taken on the main amendment substituting a commission? I thought not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question was taken on the amendment reported by the committee to this section, ending with the word "canal," line 6, page 5.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But not on the section as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But not on the section itself: simply on the amendment proposed by the committee as it had been amended by the Senate.

Mr. JONES. We adopted the amendment providing for a commission of three?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We adopted that as an amendment.

Mr. LODGE. That surely has not been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not the adoption of all the section.

Mr. JONES. But we adopted that amendment.

Mr. LODGE. When was it adopted?

Mr. JONES. Just now.

Mr. LODGE. It was not understood. I had no idea that that chief amendment was being put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair distinctly stated it; but the Chair will again put the question if it was not understood.

Mr. LODGE. Then it was my misfortune that I did not understand it. I ask that it be put again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put it again.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May the amendment be stated so that all may know what it is.

Mr. LODGE. An amendment of such importance can not be put through in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment was stated with the utmost deliberation.

Mr. LODGE. I did not understand it.

Mr. THORNTON. I will say that I certainly understood it and voted on it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend a moment. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the amendment be restated, and the Chair will then again put the question to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 9, strike out the word "unnecessary" and insert the words "as now constituted," and after the word "authorized" strike out the word "by" and the remainder of the text down to and including the word "canal," on line 18, and insert "to reduce the membership of the commission to three, one chosen from the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who shall be president of the commission as so reorganized"——

Mr. LODGE. It is not necessary to read further. It was the principal amendment, and I did not in the least understand that the question had been put. I move to reconsider, and make the point that there is no quorum present, and I shall ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It had not passed beyond the point where the Chair is authorized to again submit it to the Senate, the Senator stating that he did not understand that the question had been put.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; then I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. REED. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts has suggested the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will proceed to call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crawford	McLean	Simmons
Bacon	Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bailey	Cullom	Massey	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Cummins	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bourne	du Pont	Nelson	Smoot
Bradley	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Swanson
Brandegee	Gallinger	Overman	Thornton
Bristow	Gronna	Page	Tillman
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Townsend
Burnham	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Warren
Burton	Jones.	Pomerene	Wetmore
Catron	Kenyon	Reed	Williams
Chamberlain	La Follette	Root	Works
Clapp	Lodge	Sanders
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Shively

Mr. ASHURST. My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] has just been called from the Chamber and is unavoidably absent on important public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 58 Senators have responded to their names, and a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have only a desire to get a direct vote on the question whether we shall have one man at the head of the Canal Zone or three men; and if it is preferred, first, to adopt the committee amendments and then take the vote on substituting the amendment to be proposed by the chairman of the committee, I have no objection to that method of procedure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the parliamentary method of procedure.

Mr. LODGE. I make no objection to the adoption of the committee amendments, if it is understood that the chairman of the committee is then to offer an amendment which will bring up the direct question as between a triple-headed government and a single-headed government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has already offered an amendment to that effect, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] had simply given notice of an intention to offer such an amendment. Therefore the substitute proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be the first one to be acted upon. If that should not be carried, then the amendment proposed to be offered by the Senator from Connecticut will be in order for consideration in lieu of the present section.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whether the amendment proposed by the committee be agreed to or disagreed to, I shall offer the substitute which I have indicated providing for a single governor of the zone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is simply proceeding now to perfect the amendment before entertaining the motion to strike it out and to substitute another in its place.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is in the exact wording of the amendment he himself proposes to offer?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri was not reduced to writing; so far as I know, was only taken down by the Secretary at the desk. I am opposed to that amendment, but I do not speak for any other Senator. It is not at all the amendment which I am going to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts, the Chair understands, withdraws his request for another vote on the last amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw the request, it being understood that we are to have the same question decided later by a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. As I understand, the vote is to be taken on the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not yet; not until the Senate has acted upon the amendments which are offered to the original section. When those amendments have been acted on and the section shall have been perfected, the question will then be on striking it out and substituting the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will not be in order until after the Senate has acted upon the amendments proposed to the original section. Then it will be in order. The question now is upon the amendment striking out on page 5 certain lines, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, on page 5, line 8, after the word "military," it is proposed to insert the word "naval."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask if there was not yesterday a suggestion made, on page 5, line 6, before the word "Any," to insert the word "If"; and also several other amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands there are certain amendments pending to that effect, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 6, before the word "Any," it is proposed to insert the work "If"; in the same line to strike out the word "Any," with a capital "A," and to insert "any," with a small "a"; in line 7, before the word "be," strike out the word "may," and insert the word "shall"; in line 8, after the word "military," to insert the word "or"; in the same line, after the word "naval," to strike out the comma and the words "or civil"; and at the beginning of line 9, to strike out the word "but," so that if amended it will read——

Mr. LODGE. I think I must have the wrong print of the bill. Those amendments do not appear in the print I have.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The amendments were offered on the floor yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The text will now be read as it will stand if amended.

The SECRETARY. If amended as proposed the clause will read:

If any of the persons appointed or employed under the provisions of this act shall be persons in the military or naval service of the United States, the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendments will be agreed to.

The Secretary will state the next amendment proposed by the committee.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 5, line 12, after the word "act," it is proposed to strike out the following:

The governor of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned for a term of four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified. He shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 5, line 20, after the words "by the," it is proposed to strike out "President, or by his authority" and to insert the word "commission."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that seems to me, under any circumstances, whether we have a commission or a single governor, a most objectionable amendment. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether the amendment just stated, in line 20, which, I repeat, I think is a most objectionable amendment, is covered by his proposed amendment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The House bill provides that the President shall appoint all the other persons necessary upon the zone, and inasmuch as the Senate committee amendment contemplates the government of the Canal Zone by a commission, the sense of the committee was that the commission should have the authority to appoint the other persons necessary for the government of the zone.

Mr. LODGE. If by the House provision the appointments are reserved to the President when there is only one head, I think it is even more desirable that the power of appointment ought to be reserved to the President when there is a commission. I think responsibility ought to be lodged somewhere as to the men who are to manage the canal, and I think to give to the commission the power of appointment would be most unfortunate.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the effect of this provision would be that the man in charge of sanitation and the man in charge of the civil government could absolutely deprive the man who is responsible for the operation of the canal of all power whatsoever.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I think if a commission is provided for, two members of the commission, if they should disagree with the chairman, could deprive him of all power. That is the reason I am opposed to the commission plan.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether, in his opinion, this great canal ought not to be kept directly and at all times under the immediate control of the President and be in charge of an officer of the United States Army?

Mr. ROOT. I think it should.

Mr. REED. I think so, too.

Mr. ROOT. I think, through the exercise of the power of appointment by the President of the United States, this Government should keep its hand upon all matters in connection with the canal instead of leaving it to a commission on the Isthmus composed of three men, two of whom, by the exercise of the power of appointment, can render powerless the man who is responsible for the successful operation of the canal. I think, Mr. President, that we are making such arrangements that we hazard being humiliated before the world by a miserable failure in the administration of the canal.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to state, for the information of the Senator from New York, that during his absence an amendment was adopted on motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] giving the president of the commission the complete control of the operation of the canal; and, so far as I am concerned, as a member of the committee who voted originally in favor of this amendment, if the other members of the committee who agreed with me at the time would be satisfied, I would be perfectly willing for that amendment to be disagreed to.

Mr. ROOT. The amendment providing for the appointment of officials by the commission?

Mr. BRISTOW. The one amendment in line 20, striking out the words "President, or by his authority," and inserting the word "commission."

Mr. ROOT. That would be a very great improvement.

Mr. JONES. I desire to say that I opposed that amendment in the committee. I think we should leave these appointments to the President, either directly or by his authority. So I should like to see the amendment striking out the words "President, or by his authority," and inserting the word "commission," disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee, striking out the words "President, or by his authority," and inserting "commission."

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals was, on page 5, at the end of line 20, to strike out the word "his" and insert "its."

Mr. JONES. That should be disagreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, following the other amendment, that amendment will be disagreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals was, in line 23, to strike out the words "appropriation act or other."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the committee amendments to the section.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, Mr. President, I assume the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. REED. I should like to have it stated, Mr. President. I am not certain as to the form of the amendment. I undertook to dictate it here, and I suppose the Secretary did his work all right, but I am not sure that I did mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 4 it is proposed to insert the following:

That when, in the judgment of the President, the construction of the Panama Canal shall be completed so as to render unnecessary the further services of the Isthmian Canal Commission as now constituted, the President is authorized by Executive order to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission, which, together with the present organization, shall then cease to exist; and the President is authorized thereafter to complete and operate the Panama Canal or cause it to be completed and operated through such officer or officers of the United States Army as he may deem competent to discharge the various duties connected with the completion, maintenance, and operation of the said canal. The President shall appoint a civil governor of the Canal Zone who shall be a civilian and shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum. All other persons necessary for the care, maintenance, and sanitation of the Canal Zone shall be detailed from the military or naval forces of the United States. The governor shall have power to appoint such assistants and employ such aid in the conduct of the civil government of the Canal Zone as may be hereafter authorized by Congress. Officers of the United States Army or Navy detailed for service in the Canal Zone may, in the discretion of the President, be allowed a compensation in addition to that now fixed by law not to exceed 25 per cent of the salary now paid. Upon the completion of the Panama Canal the President shall cause the same to be officially and formally opened for use and operation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have only a few words to say in addition to the remarks I have already made. I will try to condense what I want to say in three or four minutes' time.

I believe that the civil affairs of the Canal Zone, the civil rights of the inhabitants of the canal, ought to be safeguarded by a civil officer. I believe that the sanitation of the Canal Zone is so important that it probably ought to be conducted under an expert appointed by the President direct. I believe that the canal itself is not merely a commercial enterprise; that, vast as its value may be to the commerce of the world and great as the benefits from a commercial standpoint will be to this country, the chief value of the canal in the last analysis to our country is its strategic value in time of national danger. I believe that we ought not to divide the control of the canal any more than we would divide the control and management of one of the great fortresses standing guard at the gateways of the Republic; that the management of the canal ought to be in the President of the United States; and that one of the most skillful and wise officers of the Army ought to constantly act there for the President as the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States.

I can readily see that a condition might arise when immediate action would be necessary. I can readily see that a condition might arise when a division of counsel and a war of opinions among three governors, with divided responsibility and divided opinions, might result in serious consequences to our Government. This canal may be the great gateway through which we shall send our vessels to the rescue of our country; it may be the gateway through which the enemy can reach our shores. It ought to be regarded as a military post and should be directly in the control of the President of the United States.

The amendment I have offered has not been perfected as I would like to have it, but it covers this question, and I think has been fully as well considered as has the bill now before us.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I intend to propose to this section as a substitute, and will ask the Secretary to read it in my time, in order that Senators may see whether and to what extent it covers the points made by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for section 4, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 4. That when in the judgment of the President the construction of the Panama Canal shall be sufficiently advanced toward completion to render the further services of the Isthmian Canal Commission unnecessary the President is authorized by Executive order to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission, which, together with the present organization, shall then cease to exist; and the President is authorized thereafter to complete, govern, and operate the Panama Canal and Canal Zone, or cause them to be completed, governed, and operated, through a governor of the Panama Canal and such other persons as he may deem competent to discharge the various duties connected with the completion, care, maintenance, sanitation, operation, government, and protection of the canal and Canal Zone. If any of the persons appointed or employed as aforesaid shall be persons in the military or naval service of the United States, the amount of the official salary paid to any such person shall be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation provided by or which shall be fixed under the terms of this act. The governor of the Panama Canal shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, commissioned for a term of four years, and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified: Provided, That he be subject to removal at the will of the President. He shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year. All other persons necessary for the completion, care, management, maintenance, sanitation, government, and operation of the Panama Canal and Canal Zone shall be appointed by the President, or by his authority, removable at his pleasure, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may by law regulate the same, but salaries or compensation fixed hereunder by the President shall in no instance exceed by more than 25 per cent the salary or compensation paid for the same or similar services to persons employed by the Government in continental United States. That upon the completion of the Panama Canal the President shall cause the same to be officially and formally opened for use and operation.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator from Connecticut if the amendment he proposes is not substantially the House bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is almost identical with the House bill provision, except it provides that the governor shall not only operate, but govern the Canal Zone. It is practically the House provision, and the only respect in which it differs are the suggestions, as I stated yesterday, made by the Secretary of War to the committee. I shall offer it in case the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is voted down.

Mr. WORKS. Can the Senator from Connecticut point out the difference between this amendment and the one offered by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not having his amendment before me, the Senator's recollection of the amendment is as good as mine.

Mr. WORKS. But I thought the Senator might have compared the two.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There has been no opportunity for comparison except as the Clerk read the two amendments.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri refers exclusively to the canal itself and the operation of it.

Mr. ROOT. I gathered the impression, from having heard read the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, that there would be two authorities on the zone—one the manager of the canal, the other the manager of the zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and others. Question!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from New York made some remark that I could not hear about the divided authority.

Mr. ROOT. I was merely answering the question of the Senator from California.

Mr. REED. I want to say, if I caught aright the question of the Senator from California, that it is not the intention in the amendment to divide authority at all. If I have expressed my thought—and I think I have—in that amendment, it provides for a civil government; that is, merely a government of the people, but the canal itself, the management of the canal and the control of the canal will be completely in charge of an officer appointed by the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to strike out the section and insert the substitute offered by him.

Mr. REED. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 4.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves to strike out section 4 and to insert a substitute therefor. The Secretary will report the same.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The amendment was reported a moment ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to strike out section 4 and insert in lieu thereof the amendment which has just been read to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who is absent, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer it to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. DILLINGHAM's name was called). The Senator from Vermont is absent from the city. He requested me to announce that he is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and if he were present and permitted to vote, he would on this vote vote "yea."

Mr. SHIVELY (when Mr. KERN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. KERN] is necessarily absent from the Chamber on important business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I am informed that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], if present, would vote "yea." I therefore transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I feel that I am paired on this question with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I am informed that I can transfer the pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I do so, and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WETMORE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LIPPITT] is paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. BRYAN. May I inquire whether the Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. BRYAN. I have a pair with that Senator on this vote, which I transfer to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]; and I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PERCY] is necessarily absent, and is paired. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce a pair between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been requested to state that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] stands paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—43.

Ashurst	Culberson	Massey	Smith, Ga.
Bacon	du Pont	Myers	Smith, Md.
Borah	Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

So Mr. BRANDEGEE's amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 6, section 5, line 10, after the words "Panama Canal," to insert a colon and the following:

Provided, That no tolls, when prescribed as above, shall be changed, except six months notice thereof shall have been given by the President by proclamation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. I take it it is in order for amendments other than those proposed by the committee to be offered during this reading of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the inquiry of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BURTON. It is whether the bill is open to general amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the sections are read, the Chair understands amendments are in order.

Mr. BURTON. Then I move to strike out line 13 and the first five words in line 14, on page 6, reading:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the vote is taken upon that question, I want to suggest in the italics just read, to change the word "except," in line 11, to "unless," so as to read "unless six months notice," and so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment having already been adopted, that change will be made, if there is no objection, by unanimous consent.

The next committee amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In lines 20 and 21——

Mr. BURTON. What disposition was made of my amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio presents an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lines 13 and 14 on page 6, the Senator from Ohio proposes to strike out—

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio to strike out the words which have just been read.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course that brings up the whole question whether coastwise trade shall be exempt from toll charges or not. That has been discussed a good deal by Senators in their general speeches on the bill.

I do not intend to take up more than one minute of the Senate's time.

I want to state that from the beginning I have been, and am now, in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. I do not see any reason why a vessel engaged in the coastwise trade of this country that wants to get from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, or the reverse, should have any right to come to that canal and say to the United States, which has already paid $400,000,000 for the construction of the canal: "Here, get to work. Burn up the coal you have bought with Treasury funds; maintain your operating force; transport me; not only give me the use of the waterway which you have provided at this enormous expense, as you would in the case of a harbor, but pay the expenses of transporting my vessel across the continent, and also insure her against any accident," for as the Senators who have read the bill know, it provides that the vessel must absolutely put itself in the hands of the operating force of the United States.

If any accident happens to it or damage results to it, the United States is responsible in damages for that vessel. I understand the claims that Senators make who believe the other way, but to me there is no moral claim whatever. Any shipping engaged in our coastwise trade, which already has a monopoly in the business, has bound the Government not only to spend the money collected in taxes from all the people in a special service to it, but also to guarantee it and insure it against damage if a vessel is injured. I am heartily in sympathy with the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. O'GORMAN and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield, and to whom?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut in what section of the bill it is that the United States agree to indemnify the owner of it for all loss or damage sustained by it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have it not before me at present. I will look it up and inform the Senator. There is a section which provides that any claim made by a vessel for damage going through shall be adjudicated, and it provides the court in which the claim shall be presented. I will refer the Senator to it as soon as I have taken my seat and have had an opportunity to find it.

Did the Senator from North Carolina rise to make an inquiry?

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to make an inquiry of the Senator. I understood the Senator to say there is a great deal required to maintain the locks, to bear the expense of furnishing coal and supplies, and we should not allow American ships to pass through free. In our interior waterways does the Senator know where the Government has built a lock canal that it does not maintain the lock canal and permit the free passage of vessels without charge?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New York that the provision I referred to occurs on page 8, lines 7 to 19, inclusive.

Now, in answering the inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina, I will say that I do not consider this Panama Canal to be at all on a parity with our inland waterways. I see no analogy whatever between them but the fact that they are both waterways upon which ships sail. I do not regard it as a part of our coast line, as some Senators do. Two foreign countries intervene between our country and the canal. To my mind it is no more a part of our coast line than the Straits of Magellan would be. It is simply a question of degree as to the distance.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut, then, upon what authority have we just passed legislation to establish a civil government for that zone?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was talking about the canal. We organize a civil government for the Canal Zone upon the authority under the treaty with a foreign country to which I have alluded.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then the Senator will admit, I presume, that as under the treaty we appoint a civil governor within that zone, and the canal happens to run through it, all the riparian rights there are as much ours as is the coast of America?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am talking about what signification shall be given to the word "coastwise." I am not discussing the extent of our sovereignty there. As I said the other day, it does not, in my opinion, have any relevancy to this discussion.

The sole question with me is with what moral force does the appeal come to the Congress of the United States as representatives of our States here and the people from a private shipowner, who already has a monopoly of our coastwise trade, to appear from the Atlantic or Pacific Ocean and signal to the operatives of the canal upon which we have spent $400,000,000, the interest charge of which is some $11,000,000, the annual maintenance of the operation of the two and a half or three million dollars—with what right in equity does that man say to us: "You have saved me some 8,000 miles of travel around the Straits of Magellan, and you allow me to sail over this water as you would a harbor, but in addition to that I demand that you shall keep it equipped, that you shall go into the market and buy coal, that you shall carry it down there and burn it in running the machinery for my peculiar benefit, and I will keep the tolls, the amount of money which the service is worth to me."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Since we have expended $120,000,000 on the improvement of the Mississippi River, why should we not charge for its use?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is practically the same question in another form that the Senator from North Carolina put to me as to the interior waterways. I do not see any analogy between the two things.

We had for years a Panama railroad down there, and it did as far as it could the same business that this canal is going to do, only the cargoes of ships had to be transferred from the ship to the railroad. We never put the cargoes of the ships through free on the railroad. On the contrary, we charged them for the service performed.

I could talk about it for half an hour or an hour, I suppose, but if Senators do not grasp my idea about it or the way I feel about it after what I have said, they would not after an hour, and I am not saying this to change anybody's opinion. Senators are just as well qualified to have an opinion about it as I am, but that is my view of it, and that is the reason why I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry. If I understand the Senator from Connecticut, he is opposed to the passage of vessels through the canal without the payment of tolls. Is he opposed to it merely on grounds of economy or domestic policy, or does he go further and oppose the view that such vessels can not be permitted to go through without the payment of tolls because of our treaty obligations?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I beg the Senator's pardon. There is so much conversation going on that I could not hear the Senator's question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will refrain from audible conversation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is just the last part of it that I did not hear.

Mr. STONE. I asked if the Senator also contends that coastwise vessels can not go through the canal free of tolls without violating our obligations under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have said upon a previous occasion that I do not think we can do it under the treaty. I am frank to say so. But, irrespective of the treaty, I do not think the proposition has any intrinsic merits of its own. If I were certain that we had the right to do it under the treaty, I should still be in favor of charging the ships for the people's money that we have burned up in putting them through. I think even if I were willing to grant a ship subsidy, which this is to an extent, I would want it impartially distributed among our ships. If I were going to subsidize our coastwise trade I should want a law so that any vessel in our coastwise trade could get its share; but if this be a subsidy it is a subsidy which discriminates between that portion of our coastwise trade which goes through the Panama Canal and all the rest of it, and says that those vessels which go through the Panama Canal shall be subsidized, and those which do not shall not.

Mr. STONE. I am more concerned about the interpretation to be placed by the Government of Great Britain and other foreign governments upon the action of the Senate as it relates to the right of the United States to control this canal and to exercise absolute sovereign jurisdiction over it, even to the extent of permitting any vessel of American registry to go through without the payment of tolls, than I am about the temporary policy, whether it be of one line or the other. I would dislike to have Congress take such action as would be in effect a congressional interpretation of the treaty to the extent that we ourselves in Congress denied the right of this Government to use the canal in the way indicated, if this Government saw proper to do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I never should have raised any treaty question at all, with the view that I entertain upon the subject. The fact that we had a note of a diplomatic character from Great Britain upon this question is absolutely immaterial and irrelevant to me, because, as I said, if Great Britain had never written such a note I would not be in favor of presenting this subsidy to these vessels.

There is another thing about this matter. I know we can have no trouble if we start in and charge every vessel for which we perform this special service. We can work on that theory for a year or two. If then Congress wants to remit the tolls, or is satisfied that it can lawfully give a preference to our domestic shipping, it can do it easily; but if it starts with free tolls and it is desirable to put tolls on, it never will be possible to do it, in my opinion.

There is another thing I will say in passing. If it shall be the policy of Congress to grant free tolls to its ships in the coastwise trade, which have the monopoly of the market, I think it much more deserving to grant subsidies or free tolls to our shipping in the foreign trade, which has been almost wiped from the ocean, while our coastwise trade is profitable. I certainly would not permit that discrimination as between our two classes of shipping.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can not see the precise distinction that is drawn between spending millions on the harbors of New York, Boston, San Francisco, and Philadelphia and admitting foreign ships and American ships on an equality with no payment except the trifling port and lighterage dues and for the management of the port and the expenditure on lights. I do not see why all our ships—coastwise ships and other ships—are allowed that privilege if they should not have the privilege of using the canal that we have built. I do not at all agree with the House provision which allows coastwise vessels to go through without paying tolls and compels the foreign tonnage—that is, American ships engaged in foreign trade, such few as remain—to pay the tolls. If tolls are to be exacted, there is much more reason for exacting them from the coastwise trade, which has an absolute monopoly, than from the few vessels we have engaged in the foreign commerce which are struggling for their lives without any help whatever, not only against the competition of the world but against the competition of heavy subventions and subsidies. If anybody is to be aided by being allowed to pass through the canal without paying tolls it ought to be the vessels carrying foreign tonnage. As far as the treaty is concerned, I can see no distinction between the two.

Mr. President, I do not want to raise the question of our rights under the treaty. I thought when the treaty was ratified that we could make any arrangement about our own tolls as we chose. I think so still; but I do not want to put the country in any light in which it can be supposed that it is dealing unfairly, nor do I want to raise any question about it that shall go before The Hague tribunal. I think the better way, therefore, would be to adopt the plan which is adopted by other nations in the Suez Canal of paying the tolls of vessels of the flag when they go through the canal. Of course, it costs the Government nothing. It is simply another form of giving them free passage.

I hold in my hand a copy of a contract between the French Government and the Messageries, which is the great line running from Marseille to the East. This is a contract made on the 22d day of July, 1912—just made. Article 3 of the contract reads—I will read simply the first clause, because that carries it all—

> The taxes for transit upon the tonnage paid by the company for the passage of the Suez Canal by the subsidized ships will be repaid to the company in addition to the subvention conformably to the arrangement of the provisions of article 96 of the schedule of charges.

During the calendar year 1911 the voyages of the steamers of the Messageries Maritimes through the Suez Canal numbered 172, tonnage 603,400, and the Suez tolls amounted to about $850,000. France by a new contract has just arranged to pay to her one line of steamships in addition to the subvention for the passage through the canal. There are some little details here about the charges which I will ask to put in the RECORD, but which it is not necessary to read.

I cited the other day when this matter was under discussion cases of Austria and Sweden, who directly paid. Here is absolutely the most direct form possible. Yet the Suez Canal under the original agreement with the Khedive, and under the subsequent arrangement by the Sultan, provided for equality to all vessels of all nations. Of course this puts the French vessels on an inequality with the others. It amounts to giving them free passage. It is only done in that way. England does not venture to protest or say that that is an evasion of the provisions of the treaty.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I think the Senator perhaps suggested it with sufficient distinctness, the subvention to the vessels of Sweden are precisely the amount of the tolls that would be exacted from those vessels going through the Suez Canal.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I remember that was the case. It was not done for that precise purpose, of course.

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. The French Government has made the contract the Senator has read with a line of ships by which that Government pays tolls exacted from the ships passing through the Suez Canal.

Mr. LODGE. In addition to the subvention.

Mr. STONE. I have no reference now to the subvention.

Mr. LODGE. It has no connection with the subvention.

Mr. STONE. Why could not that same Government or any other Government do the same thing in reference to the Panama Canal?

Mr. LODGE. It could; and will, no doubt.

Mr. STONE. Pay the tolls?

Mr. LODGE. They could and will, without any question.

Mr. STONE. Then, would not that leave American vessels still at great disadvantage in competing with the world's trade?

Mr. LODGE. It would leave them at the greatest possible disadvantage. That is just what I desired to point out. France and Austria and these other countries will no doubt follow the same course with Panama that they have with Suez. They will pay the tolls of their vessels.

Mr. STONE. That is very important.

Mr. LODGE. And our vessels will be required to pay tolls in the canal we built and which is ours. We own the zone and we govern it, and we will be paying tolls while the other vessels of foreign powers will be passing through our canal with their tolls paid. Our vessels will be under a burden of taxation put by our own Government upon them against all the rest of the vessels of the world. There may be a difference of method as to getting rid of that, but I say it would be a disgrace if the Government actually taxed our own ships and allowed the ships of other nations to go through the canal free, making the canal a burden on the American shipowner, whether engaged in the coastwise or in the foreign trade.

Mr. STONE and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. I first yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I think the Senator from Massachusetts states the case very clearly and, I believe, accurately. There are but two ways that I see—and he has suggested them—of avoiding this difficulty, so as to place American vessels on a footing of equality with foreign vessels, for it is almost certain to happen that France and other countries will pay the tolls on their vessels going through the Panama Canal.

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt that Great Britain will do so.

Mr. STONE. Then we must either pay the tolls on our ships or we must by law attempt to give our vessels free passage.

Mr. LODGE. We must put our vessels on an equality in our own canal with the vessels of the rest of the world. We must either relieve them from paying tolls or we must take the toll in one hand and pay it out with the other. It amounts to the same thing precisely.

Mr. STONE. Then, to avoid the opposition very likely, indeed almost certain, to arise from the notion that to pay tolls is a form of subsidy and furnishing a precedent, it may be, for additional subsidies in the future, why not provide at once that all American vessels shall go through without the payment of tolls?

Mr. LODGE. It ought to be all or none. I have here a bill, which I mean to offer as an amendment, which was prepared by the late Senator Frye and introduced by him in the last Congress. I reintroduced it in this Congress simply to bring it before the Senate. It provides:

> That all tolls and transit charges which may hereafter be imposed on public vessels of the United States and on merchant vessels of the United States for passing through the Panama Canal shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and there are hereby appropriated annually out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the purpose; and such appropriations shall be deemed permanent annual appropriations.

Of course the Government pays the toll to itself. That is all that is done.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, if the plan as expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] should come in vogue as it is in vogue in France, it would be paying a subsidy pure and simple. I do not believe it would be possible on this side of the Chamber at least to ever pass such a measure. The ramifications of such a system would be limitless. In the northeast corner of my farm I have a 12-acre lot so unfortunately poor that it will not raise buckwheat, but if the Congress of the United States will sufficiently subsidize me I will carry 15 inches of good soil to that lot and raise buckwheat. I think, with as much reason, I might plead before the Congress of the United States and ask the people for subsidy as that the shipowners should be paid back the dollars that they may be asked to pay for passing their vessels through the canal.

For myself, I beg to say that I am in favor of a canal as free as God's air. I believe that it would enhance our shipping. I have seen it stated that there are something like 1,200 various craft that are to-day under construction for the purpose of engaging in the trade across the Isthmus. I believe a free canal would induce further shipping and would do more toward the floating of the American flag than any other one thing of recent years. I am in favor, Mr. President, on page 6, line 13, wherein it is stated that "no tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," of inserting, after the word "coastwise," the words "or ocean trade carrying the American flag and having an American register."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from New Jersey will read the italics beginning in line 25, on page 6, and on down to line 14, on page 7, he will see that the provision of which he speaks is contained in the italics.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I now notice that. I did not at first grasp it. I thank the Senator from Kansas. That entirely meets with my approbation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there is no relation between a subvention and these tolls. They are perfectly distinguished in the French contract, which I have read, and which I will ask to have printed in the RECORD. It is simply a form of remitting the tolls, that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection permission to print in the RECORD the contract referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FRENCH SUEZ CANAL TOLL REFUNDS.

On July 22, 1912, the new 25-year ocean mail contract (expiring November 30, 1937) between the French Government and the Messageries Maritimes Steamship Co. went into effect.

Article 3 of the contract reads:

"ART. 3. Les taxes de transit sur le tonnage payées par la compagnie pour le passage du canal de Suez par les navires subventionnés lui seront remboursées en supplement de la subvention, conformément aux dispositions de l'article 96 du cahier des charges.

"Exceptionnellement, pendant la période transitoire prévue au cahier des charges, les frais de passage du canal de Suez par les navires de la ligne de Haïphong seront supportés par la compagnie."

Article 96 referred to in article 3 reads:

"ART. 96. La subvention est payable par douzième, à terme échu, sur la production d'un certificat dressé par le commissaire du Gouvernement et constatant la réguliére exécution du service. Ce certificat est donné sous toutes réserves des reprises que l'Etat serait en droit d'exercer pour des faits non encore révélés. Les payements ont lieu a Paris ou au port d'attaché du service, au choix de la compagnie.

"Le montant du remboursement de la taxe spéciale de navigation dans le canal de Suez (tonnage) est payable par douzième, à terme échu, en même temps que la subvention, d'après les prévisions de dépenses basées sur les chiffres de l'annee antérieure, sous reserve des redressements à apporter en fin d'exercise, d'après les taxes effectivement payées.

"A l'expiration de la concession, les derniers payements n'ont lieu qu'après constatation qu'il n'y a aucune reprise à exercer contre la compagnie."

During the calendar year 1911 the voyages of the steamers of the Messageries Maritimes through the Suez Canal numbered 172, tonnage 603,400; so the Suez tolls amounted to about $850,000. The toll rate for 1912 is 50 centimes (9¾ cents) less, or on the same tonnage about $750,000.

The contract calls for 156 Suez-Canal-toll-refunded voyages annually, beginning last week, the toll to be refunded amounting to about $680,000. The 26 voyages to Haiphong, on which temporarily there is no refund, are not included.

TRANSLATION.

Following is translation of article 3 and marked part of article 96 (balance of 96 covers, mode of paying subvention):

"ART. 3. The tolls based on tonnage for transit through the Suez Canal paid by the company on its subsidized ships shall be reimbursed to the company in addition to the subsidy, according to the provisions of article 96 of the schedule of charges and obligations: Provided, That during the temporary period covered by that schedule the expenses of passing through the Suez Canal of ships on the route to Haiphong shall be paid by the company."

"ART. 96" (first paragraph relates to the subsidy). "The amount of reimbursement of the special navigation toll on tonnage through the Suez Canal is payable monthly at the end of the month at the same time as the subvention according to the estimates of expenses based on the figures for the previous year, with the reservation of adjustment of balances at the end of the business year based on tolls actually paid." (Third paragraph relates to general subsidy.)

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, other nations are to a very large extent, though not wholly, getting rid of requiring their ships passing through the Suez Canal to pay tolls, and already there is a movement on the part of European nations to pass their ships free through the Panama Canal. There is no doubt about that.

The Peninsula & Oriental Line, the great British line, pays tolls to the amount of $1,700,000 a year, and the British Government gives that line $1,500,000, nearly as much as the tolls amount to. The North German Lloyd is paid—call it subsidy or what you please—$1,385,000; and the tolls through the Suez Canal for the North German Lloyd steamers are much less than that. Japan pays the Nippon-Yusen-Kaisha Line a subsidy of $1,336,000 for its ships passing through the Suez Canal. France pays the Messageries Maritimes $2,145,000 a year. The Russian Government gives directly for the passing through the Suez Canal to the Russian ships 650,000 rubles annually. The Austrian Government pays a subsidy to her ships of 4,700,000 crowns, and in addition pays the tolls through the Suez Canal. Sweden gives a subsidy of 1,850,000 crowns directly to pay the tolls of her ships through the Suez Canal. That is what is going on so far as the ships of foreign countries are concerned; and unless we make some provision to protect our own ships in that regard going through the Panama Canal, we shall be put in the attitude of requiring those ships to pay the tolls, while the other Governments will remit the tolls in the nature of subsidies or direct payments to offset the tolls.

I am myself, Mr. President, in favor of the provision in the House bill that no tolls shall be paid by American ships. If it is the judgment of the Senate that that is not good legislation, then in this bill—and we ought not to delay it for some other bill—we ought to have a provision that the Government itself shall become responsible for the tolls so as to put our ships on an equality with the ships of foreign nations.

This great Nation of ours has only about 10 ships now engaged in the foreign trade. I think I state it with considerable accuracy when I say that we have 10 ships engaged in the overseas trade with the entire world. Those ships ought not to be required to pay tolls through this canal any more than should the coastwise-trade ships, because the ships of other nations engaged in the over-seas trade will be granted subventions which will offset the tolls that they will pay for going through the canal, and our poor little languishing merchant marine—that I have tried to rehabilitate, but have not succeeded, and I have given up the struggle so far as any further effort is concerned—our poor little languishing merchant marine, 10 ships in number, will be put at a disadvantage in competition with the enormous merchant marine of Great Britain, France, Germany, Sweden, Italy, and other nations.

I feel a great deal of interest in this matter, and I want to vote either directly for the House provision or else for an allowance—call it subvention, subsidy, what you please—that will at least put our ships on a parity with those of foreign nations.

Mr. MASSEY and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MASSEY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question involving rather a matter of wisdom or policy than a question of law. If the Senator believes, as he indicates he does believe, that we should discriminate in favor of American shipping, so far as the fixing of tolls is concerned, in the use of the Panama Canal, would it not be wise for this Congress to pass a provision such as is contained in the House bill, directly giving to American coastwise shipping and shipping engaged in the foreign trade free use of the canal rather than to confess by legislation at this time that the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty extend over and against the action of Congress in respect to legislation now before us? Would not, in other words, the enactment of indirect legislation at this time be a confession that the American Congress were violating by the act the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in so far as tolls are concerned?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I personally interpret that treaty, and have from the beginning, as giving us complete control over tolls to be charged American vessels. There is a dispute upon that point. Members of this body and Members of the other House hold different views as to that; in other words, there is a doubt as to the interpretation of that clause. The interpretation I gave it is doubted by Members of the American Congress and by many others in this country. It is therefore impossible to suppose that other countries would not doubt and question it, and demand that the controversy go to The Hague tribunal.

Mr. MASSEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him further?

Mr. LODGE. Let me finish the sentence. Of course, if the question goes to that tribunal, as I said the other day, it is decided beforehand. It would be for the interest of every nation represented on that tribunal to decide the case against us, and their representatives would do so, no matter how good was our case. They would decide it, I think, in their own interests. I have no disposition to take that question to a tribunal where every judge is, through his country, against our contention.

The other alternative would be to refuse to go to The Hague at all. That we could do; but then many other Senators think that that would be violating one of our existing treaties of arbitration. It would probably be covered under the head of a vital interest, if we chose to refuse to go to The Hague tribunal, but I do not want to open up those questions with other countries. I object very strongly to doing that. The proposition which I make is one to which no country can possibly object; it is wholly a domestic question; and to undertake to make the argument about that such as was intimated, I believe, in the English dispatch, it seems to me, little less than impertinence.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he thinks there will be any legal difference between the express granting of free passage to our ships and a like express provision that we will repay or rebate the amount that is collected from our own ships? What difference would there be in a legal sense between the two as between ourselves and other governments?

Mr. LODGE. I think there is a very broad distinction legally, though none practically.

Mr. WORKS. The legal question, is strikes me, is very much the same as the practical question in that respect.

Mr. LODGE. One thing is prohibited by the treaty, if the interpretation of those who think the treaty prohibits us from making a distinction in tolls is accepted, but the treaty does not say, and does not pretend to say, who shall pay the tolls or where the money shall come from.

Mr. WORKS. No, Mr. President; but it is perfectly evident that it would be a pure and unadulterated evasion.

Mr. LODGE. Unquestionably it would be, just as it is a pure and unadulterated evasion in the case of certain nations that pay the tolls on their ships passing through the Suez Canal, a practice which is recognized by all the nations of the earth.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly; I understand that. There is another phase of this matter which should be seriously considered. When this matter was under discussion only a short time ago it was maintained by some Senators on the floor of the Senate that the Senate was estopped from questioning the construction the British Government placed upon this treaty by reason of the fact that one of its members had offered an amendment providing specifically that our ships might be relieved from the payment of tolls, and that amendment had been rejected. Now it is proposed, Mr. President, to pass directly upon that question by an affirmative vote, which, in effect, is to give just that construction to the treaty, or confess by the vote of the Senate that the British Government is right in its contention that the treaty should receive that construction. It seems to me that the Senate ought to hesitate a long time, leaving out of the question other considerations, before it casts a vote that places that construction in effect upon the treaty.

Mr. MASSEY. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MASSEY. I desire to suggest to the Senator that we are all anxious to avoid complications which would permit any questions involved in this legislation to be submitted to The Hague tribunal for adjustment; yet I do suggest to the Senate and to the Senator that if there is any well-established rule of law—and I apprehend that that rule would apply to the determination of international disputes as well as to disputes between individuals—it is that the conduct of one party admitting the contention, or, in effect, the contention of the opposite party, is always taken into consideration in determining a liability based upon that conduct; and if this Congress by its legislation admits, even in an evasive way, that the discrimination proposed by this legislation is in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty England could well rely upon this legislation as an admission upon the part of the American Nation that we had violated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty when we had attempted to discriminate in the way suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, although in an evasive manner.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon any provision which involves the question of our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the idea which has been suggested several times, I believe, that by reason of our having acquired sovereignty over the Canal Zone we have rights that are superior to the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; that we are entitled to exercise the rights of sovereignty, and that neither under that treaty nor any other is any other country entitled to call them in question.

I venture to say that no such idea has any just foundation, because we acquired our rights and all the rights we have to the Canal Zone and to the canal expressly subject to the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Our rights on the Isthmus, in respect to the canal, come from the treaty with Panama of November 18, 1903. The second article of that treaty provides:

> The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed.

The eighteenth article of that treaty provides:

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

That is the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. So we take all the rights we have on the Isthmus expressly under a trust to observe in respect thereto the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. And, sir, I know of no higher rule of ethics or of interest than that which requires nations to observe the good faith of treaties.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it all goes back to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I was aware, of course, of the treaty with Panama. I do not think it adds anything to the force of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. ROOT. I referred to it as showing that whatever the Hay-Pauncefote treaty binds us to we are still bound by. We can not escape from the provisions of that treaty.

Mr. LODGE. That is not to be disputed.

Mr. ROOT. It has not been disputed.

Mr. LODGE. I certainly did not intend to dispute it. I was not aware that I had disputed it. But I do say that the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in regard to the equality of tolls is open to more than one interpretation. I think it is a clause of doubtful interpretation. My own opinion has been clear from the beginning. But I do not want, as I said the first day I spoke upon this matter, to put the United States in an attitude where its action can be questioned—where its good faith can be questioned—by any nation on earth.

That is the reason I am unwilling to vote for the exemption from tolls for American vessels. I see no other way of meeting it except by the Government paying the tolls into its own Treasury. It is not a subvention. The vessel gets nothing; it goes free. That conforms to the letter of the treaty, as I was about to say a few moments ago.

I resent, as I said before, this attempt to go behind the treaty and asking, "Where did the vessel get the money?" If France comes over here and chooses to pay the tolls on her vessels, or England, or any other country, it would be mere impertinence to inquire where the money came from and to say, "You can not pay the tolls for your own ships." At the same time it produces the case which I described in answer to the Senator from Missouri—there is no escape from it—where it will end that in our own canal, built by us—and what we got from Great Britain in giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not amount to a snap of your finger. Great Britain gave up nothing; the treaty was worthless; there was nothing left of it——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Great Britain makes the same protest against the proposition made in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then, is it not better for us to meet this proposition squarely on the ground that England has no business to interfere with our own canal? We are not evading the controversy.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will excuse me. If we pay the toll, that is purely a domestic question, and no nation can take cognizance of the question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is it any more of a domestic matter than if we exempt our own vessels from the tolls which we ourselves would collect?

Mr. LODGE. We say in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that the tolls shall be equal. The dispute arises on the words "all nations"—whether the term "all nations" governs us when we are making a treaty, or whether it does not. But it applies only to tolls, and nothing else. If the tolls are equal, there is nothing more under the treaty that anyone is pledged to.

Mr. BRISTOW. But England, in the note, makes protest against either way. Why not meet the controversy in a direct way, and refuse to arbitrate? I think it is preposterous to have European nations pass upon the question what we shall collect as tolls upon our vessels passing through the canal which we have built.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not had the privilege of reading the note of the British Government. I want to ask the Senator if I am correct in assuming—and I gather it from discussions here—that England not only protested against our ships passing through the canal free, but likewise protests against our Government reimbursing them?

Mr. LODGE. So I understand from the published statement. I have not seen the original.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a most extraordinary position in view of what is happening at Suez.

Mr. LODGE. Of course it is. Every nation that pays the tolls of a vessel going through the Suez Canal, of course, destroys at once the equality which is pledged under the agreement with the Khedive, the original contract between De Lesseps and the Khedive, and the subsequent firman of the Sultan.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he does not recognize the fact that the House provision, by simply applying to coastwise vessels, does not offer a distinction between our vessels and foreign vessels, having in view, of course, the further fact that any vessel at any time admitted to the coastwise trade would fall within the same provision? The policy of this Government being to exclude all but American vessels from doing coastwise trade, American vessels alone would have the privilege; but if that policy were changed, then the vessels of other countries permitted to enter our coastwise trade would be admitted to the canal free of toll.

In this connection I wish to mention the fact that the Supreme Court in the Galveston case, to which I called attention the other day, held that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, requiring no distinction between our own vessels and foreign vessels, was not violated by discriminations generally in favor of coastwise vessels.

Mr. LODGE. In that connection, I have secured the facts in regard to the coasting trade of other countries, and the coasting trade is reserved like ours, unless reciprocal arrangements are made, in all countries except Great Britain and Turkey, where it is open to foreign vessels, except to foreign steam passage boats. It is partially reserved there. So the reservation of the coasting trade by the United States is not unusual. I will ask to have this printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Statement submitted on June 17, 1902, by the British foreign office, with additions supplied by the board of trade, to the select committee of the House of Commons on steamship subsidies.

VENEZUELA.

Decree, February 20, 1871: Coasting trade reserved.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can we not plant ourselves upon the proposition that permitting free passage to coastwise vessels would in no sense be a discrimination against vessels of other countries?

Mr. LODGE. That distinction I am unable to make. There is a distinction in the practical importance of it which was drawn by the London newspapers, which stated at the beginning of this matter—I had the quotations here the other day, but I have mislaid them—that they had no objection to the coasting trade going through the canal free, because Great Britain could not enter it and could not compete with us at any rate; but as a matter of principle under that treaty I do not see that the coastwise trade differentiates it from a vessel in the foreign trade.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not be more entirely free from criticism than to require all to pay and at once take the money and hand it back to them?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know how about the criticism, but if we let through American coasting vessels, there is no reason, as far as the treaty is concerned, why we should not let through those few American vessels engaged in the foreign trade. The language of the treaty is "all vessels." There is no distinction drawn in the treaty between what trade one vessel is engaged in and what another is.

> The canal shall be free and open, in time of war as in time of peace, to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On equal terms.

Mr. LODGE. "On terms of entire equality."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. "On terms of entire equality."

Mr. LODGE. "So that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it be any discrimination against any other nation for us to carry the House provision, that the coastwise vessels should pass through free? It would be no discrimination against any nation, because the coastwise trade is a matter of domestic policy, and we have already determined that it shall be done alone by our vessels.

Mr. LODGE. It would be a discrimination against the Canadian traffic, which is at the bottom of this whole difficulty that has been raised, through the canal from one Canadian port to another. You give the advantage to the American coasting trade, which can take at Portland or Boston or any near point to the Canadian frontier, through goods, sent under bond, and carry them through the canal and land them at a point on our western coast, where they can again go under bond to Vancouver; and thereby the American coasting trade is at once given, by being free of tolls, an advantage as against the Canadian trade. That is the bottom of all this trouble.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty not only provides that it shall be on terms of entire equality as to tolls, but provides that—

> There shall be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

Now, it seems to me that if we are bound by that treaty, if the treaty applies to us, it is a discrimination for us to attempt to exempt our coastwise vessels from tolls, in this sense: A British vessel, from Liverpool via the canal to San Francisco, has to pay the tolls, while an American vessel from San Francisco to New York, going via the canal, does not have to pay any tolls. If Great Britain has a market in San Francisco, we are able to have just that much preference in the retail prices or the wholesale prices there by the fact that our vessels go through the canal free, while theirs are charged, and it might result, if the margin was close enough, in transferring the trade from old England to New England.

Mr. GALLINGER. Those tolls are paid by Great Britain.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What does that matter?

Mr. LODGE. Under those circumstances one vessel could be run profitably and another could not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, foreign vessels are subsidized; and the Senator from New Hampshire says the remission of the tolls would put them upon equal terms.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New Hampshire did not say anything like that. He objected to putting an additional burden upon them.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if, in his opinion, it would be a discrimination if we should say that vessels running from the coast of Africa through the Panama Canal should pay $1 per ton and all vessels from Europe $2 per ton?

Mr. LODGE. Obviously, that would be a discrimination.

Mr. PAGE. But not a discrimination between nations.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean to make it apply to all nations alike?

Mr. PAGE. All nations.

Mr. LODGE. That would not be a discrimination.

Mr. PAGE. It would not? Then why would it be a discrimination between nations to say that no tolls shall be charged upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States? We do not say we will charge a British or an American vessel more or less—it is true we have a law which says that a British ship shall not engage in the coastwise trade—but if we are to beat the devil around the stump, it seems to me that would be the better way to get at it.

Mr. LODGE. I can not draw any distinction between American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade and those in foreign commerce. They are all alike, it seems to me, to come under the first clause of article 3. The doubtful question is whether in making that treaty when the United States said, "of all nations," the United States intended to include itself. That is the whole question there. Some of us believe that it did not and some of us believe that it did.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that in his mind there was but little doubt that the other maritime nations would pay the toll of their ships through the canal.

Mr. LODGE. Other foreign nations.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I mean—other foreign nations; and it would put American shipping on a great disadvantage if our vessels have to pay toll.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; unless we pay their tolls or let them go through free.

Mr. SIMMONS. In that conditions of things, bringing about this discrimination against American shipping in favor of foreign shipping passing through the canal, if it were not for our treaty obligations the Senator would think that we ought to allow our vessels to go through free?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator's second proposition, as I understood him, was that the treaty is subject to more than one construction. Under one construction we would not have the right to relieve our vessels of tolls and under another construction we would have the right to relieve our vessels of tolls.

Mr. LODGE. That is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, the proper and legitimate legal construction is a matter of doubt.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Shall we solve that question of doubt in the interest of American commerce to relieve it of this discrimination or shall we solve it against American commerce and impose this discrimination?

Mr. LODGE. The doubt certainly ought to be solved in favor of American commerce, but the moment you solve that doubt in favor of American commerce you are obliged to go to The Hague, as is required under our treaties of arbitration.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the question.

Mr. LODGE. In other words, we can not solve the doubt. It has to be solved elsewhere.

Mr. SIMMONS. But if there is a doubt we have to solve it here against ourselves or we have to solve it for ourselves and take the chances of The Hague tribunal.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The question I ask is, Does the Senator hold that we should solve that doubt as to the proper construction of the treaty against American shipping interests, or should we solve that doubt in favor of American shipping interests?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think that I favor making a test case, because, as I said, there is a possibility of getting but one decision from a tribunal where the judges will be furnished from nations whose interest it is to pay tolls on their own ships and force us to collect tolls from ours. There is no use in going to a tribunal constructed in that way, but, unfortunately, we are supposed to go to it under another treaty for the promotion of peace and good feeling, and if we are forced to go there we shall find ourselves in the position of having to exact tolls from our own vessels, and there will also be the imputation that we have not acted in good faith. To that I do not care to expose the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator would solve the doubt about this matter against American shipping?

Mr. LODGE. No; I should not.

Mr. SIMMONS. How are you going to get to The Hague?

Mr. LODGE. I should simply do as other nations. I should take the tolls and pay them or remit them as they go through, taking the tolls of the vessels at one end and handing it back at the other end, or whatever way you choose. It is what every other nation on earth will do for its vessels except ours.

Mr. SIMMONS. That solves the doubt against us, I think.

Mr. LODGE. How? It would not cost the Government a cent any more than a free vessel, but of course I understand how profound the terror is that in some way the Government of this country may help what remains of American shipping. I have not been here all these years without learning that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator certainly does not understand me as desiring to do anything against American shipping. I want to solve it by letting these vessels go through free, and if that makes a case for The Hague tribunal I can not help it, so far as my vote is concerned.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Very well, that is for each Senator to decide for himself. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Can the Senator conceive of a discrimination against a man or a nation unless some right or privilege to which that nation is entitled or to which that man is entitled is taken away?

Mr. LODGE. That is rather a large question. To conceive of such a case I think you would have to postulate what the Senator says, that some right our country is entitled to is taken away, to constitute the discrimination.

Mr. REED. Applying that, we have agreed, according to one construction, not to discriminate against the commerce or shipping of Great Britain, but if Great Britain has no rights in our coastwise trade then how is it discriminated against when we permit that trade in which it has no right, which it can not engage in at all, to go through the canal without charge?

Mr. LODGE. Assuming, of course, as you must, that the interpretation is correct—that is, for the Senator's proposition—we will assume that the view is correct that we have not the right to discriminate in tolls. I think giving it to the coastwise trade of America is discriminating in favor of the whole coastwise trade of America as against a portion of the trade of the British Dominion. I do not think the fact that it is given to an entire trade, an entire merchant marine or coastwise traffic, alters the discrimination.

Mr. REED. Let me state it in the concrete. No vessel can engage in the coastwise trade of the United States except a vessel registered as an American vessel. When we let that vessel go through without paying any tolls we do not discriminate against any British vessel engaged in the coastwise trade, for there can be no such vessel.

Mr. LODGE. No; but we discriminate against a vessel engaged in another trade.

Mr. REED. We simply permit a vessel to go through free when Great Britain can not have such a vessel and can not engage in such a trade. The Senator speaks of the Canadian trade; that is to say, a vessel could leave a port of Canada on the Atlantic coast, go through the canal, and land its goods at a Pacific Canadian point; but our coastwise vessels could not do that. They could not compete with Canada for that trade, and if they did carry that trade they would not be permitted, under the bill as it is now proposed, to go through the canal at all unless they paid the tolls. The minute they go into competition with the Canadian trade and haul Canadian goods they are not engaged in our coastwise trade, but they are engaged in a general shipping business. Is not that correct?

Mr. LODGE. They may take Canadian goods at any of our ports where Canadian goods are put in bond and be in the coastwise trade. They can compete with Canadian vessels, of course.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Senator to say that our vessels engaged in our coastwise trade would be permitted, under the bill as it is now proposed, to go to Canada and load?

Mr. LODGE. No; they can take Canadian goods at American ports.

Mr. REED. Goods that had already been shipped into our country?

Mr. LODGE. Coming in under bond. Just the same, the competition is there. There is no mistake about it. It is just as direct competition as could possibly be devised.

Mr. REED. It seems to me that when the goods get into an American port and are then taken by an American vessel engaged in the coastwise trade it becomes American coastwise trade. We come back to the technical point again. You are not taking away from England any right or making a discrimination against an English vessel, because you are not taking away from that vessel any right which it can enjoy under the law.

Mr. LODGE. The discrimination in competition seemed very clear to me and very direct. I think they feel it very much in Canada.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We have been here since 10 o'clock this morning. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 7, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, August 6, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, Father Soul, ever susceptible to the wants of Thy children and always responsive to those who seek Thee in faith and confidence, take away from us all guile; pour down upon us Thy spiritual gifts; and grant us every blessing, in Jesus Christ, our Lord, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in all our hearts. Let Thy blessing be upon all who are in sorrow. Comfort, we beseech Thee, the wife of our President who mourns the loss of her distinguished father. Grant that she and all those who mourn with her may be comforted in the blessed hope of Him who said, "I am the Resurrection and the Life." And to Thee we will ascribe all praise now and evermore. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 24121. An act to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 21888. An act providing for the sale of the United States unused post-office site at Perth Amboy, N. J.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7163) authorizing the State of Arizona to select lands within the former Fort Grant Military Reservation and outside of the Crook National Forest in partial satisfaction of its grant for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 21952. An act for the relief of James S. Baer;

H. R. 22195. An act to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool; and

H. R. 21888. An act providing for the sale of the United States unused post-office site at Perth Amboy, N. J.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Sundry messages, in writing, from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a unanimous-consent order for the disposition of business in the House. I ask unanimous consent that there be evening sessions of the House of Representatives on Thursday, August 8, 1912, and Friday, August 9, 1912, beginning at 8 o'clock p. m. and continuing until 11 o'clock p. m. on each day, during which time it shall be in order to discuss the report of the special committee appointed under House resolution 148 to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and one-half of the time by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]; that on said days it shall be in order, when the business of the House is disposed of, to move to take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that on Thursday and Friday next there shall be night sessions, beginning at 8 o'clock, extending until 11 o'clock, for the purpose of debate on the reports of the special committee investigating the affairs of the Steel Trust, and for that purpose only; one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]; and that on those days, when the business of the House is disposed of, it shall be in order to take a recess until 8 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Alabama if this unanimous-consent agreement that he asks to be entered into will displace the bills that have been made privileged under the rule recently adopted?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all; only providing for a night session each day. There is nothing in the rule that interferes with the daily business.

Mr. LEVER. It does not interfere with the daily business?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. It is simply an order of business for two nights, and that is all, on the Steel Trust investigation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] if this arrangement is satisfactory to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. STANLEY. I can not say. I do not think he has any objection. It may be that during the days the consideration of conference reports might interfere; but I can not say positively.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman modified his request?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I modify the request so that there shall be debate only until 11 o'clock, and not to run beyond 11 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is here, and I would like to have the request stated again.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will read the request again.

Mr. MANN. I will be glad if the gentleman would.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will send it to the Clerk's desk and have it read.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest that the gentleman have it read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. That is what the gentleman is going to do now. The Clerk will read.

House resolution 669 (H. Rept. 1144).

Resolved, That there be evening sessions of the House of Representatives on Thursday, August 8, 1912, and Friday, August 9, 1912, beginning at 8 o'clock p. m. and continuing until 11 o'clock p. m. on each day, during which time it shall only be in order to discuss the report of the special committee appointed under House resolution 148 to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]; that on said days it shall be in order, when the business of the House is disposed of, to move to take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] present this as a motion or as a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. He presents it as a resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It is a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then I present it as a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The matter itself presents itself as a resolution.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Has the Committee on Rules met? Under the rules that resolution must go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The Committee on Rules has met and reported that resolution. Mr. Speaker, I present it as a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I raise the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that no unofficial meeting of the Committee on Rules, or of every member of the Committee on Rules, even if every one of them agrees to it, is a meeting of the committee under the rules of this House. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] whether it is true that the Committee on Rules has met and has voted to adopt that resolution?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The Committee on Rules have met in formal session with a quorum and have adopted that resolution, and I present it as a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will intervene to state that he had no idea that the chairman of the Committee on Rules had anything to do with this resolution in the beginning. The Chair knows it now. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] got up and read the resolution——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I presented it as a request for unanimous consent. I hoped the gentleman would be willing to agree to it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I myself move the previous question on that resolution, in order to have 40 minutes' debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman has not the floor.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman always has the floor to move the previous question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; he has not the power to take me off my feet, when I am waiting here for the disposition of my request.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman was not on his feet.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have been on my feet all the time.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will read the report of the Committee on Rules——

Mr. MANN. I suggest that the Speaker put the request for unanimous consent. This was presented as a request for unanimous consent by the gentleman from Alabama. Let us have that disposed of first.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was under that impression at first, but when the paper was sent up here for the Clerk to read, it appeared that it was a resolution. The gentleman from Alabama was reading in a low tone, and the Chair could not understand very well what he was saying in the beginning. The Chair thought it was a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. It was so presented by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. If somebody objects to that, time enough then for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] to present it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama having presented it for unanimous consent, the Chair will first put that question. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I was consulted yesterday by a member of the Committee on Rules on an entirely different proposition. I shall not object to this rule, on the assumption that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is correct in saying that it is impossible to discuss this steel report during the daytime. However, I do not think it is right to come and consult me as senior minority member of the steel committee, make a definite agreement with me of an entirely different nature, and then proceed to offer this resolution to the House without one moment's consultation with me. I make no objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MANN. Let us see whether there is any objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask if it is the intention to have a vote upon the adoption of the report of this committee after the debate at some time during the present session?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that when the report was filed that was the end of the work of the committee. It was an investigating committee. The gentlemen who compiled the report and presented it to the House desire to present their views on the question, and this is merely a proposition for debate. There is no action to be taken. No action can be taken.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The report itself undertakes to set out the views both of the majority and the minority.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly. This is merely a request by gentlemen of the House to be permitted to explain their report to the House and to the country. No action can grow out of it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. In other words, to debate a report that has been filed, upon which no subsequent vote is to be taken.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Undoubtedly no subsequent vote can be taken, but the House and the country are interested in the question.

Mr. RODDENBERY. In that state of things, inasmuch as we have two or three general immigration bills on the House Calendar and on the Union Calendar that millions of citizens in different parts of the country would like to have us vote upon, could not the gentleman add to his request for unanimous consent a request that to-morrow night, Wednesday, the House meet at 8 o'clock, and that Members be allowed to discuss and consider pending immigration legislation reported by Democratic committees and indorsed by the Democratic Party? If no more, let us debate those bills just one night.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the gentleman that I am not chairman of the Committee on Immigration, and I am not in charge of those bills. A very capable Member of this House has charge of those matters, and I think he is entirely competent to present his own views.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman is not chairman of the committee that made this steel report either, is he?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am acting at the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], who is the chairman of this committee, and I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. RODDENBERY. To be entirely frank with the gentleman, before making any objection, if I shall conclude to do so, I should rather say what I have to say in a Democratic caucus; but it seems we can have a caucus for nothing except battleships, and I have no doubt, since Tammany Hall has told us we must rescind and vote for battleships that, notwithstanding three Democratic caucuses have decided against battleships, we will to-night put our heads under the yoke and proceed to give them. An ordinary one-gallus, copperas-breeches Congressman does not have much show in a Democratic caucus, and we can not discuss immigration or anything of the sort.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I object.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the investigation made by the special committee appointed under a resolution of this House to investigate the violation of the antitrust act, and for other purposes, has attracted widespread attention.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I would like some idea of what the intention of the gentleman from Tennessee is, whether he is taking the floor for debate or whether he intends to move the previous question. I call attention to the fact that if he moves the previous question now he cuts out all debate, because he has already begun his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rule that he has not begun.

Mr. GARRETT. How much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Why not move the previous question, and then we shall have 20 minutes' debate on a side.

Mr. GARRETT. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not know whether anybody else on this side wants to speak or not.

Mr. GARRETT. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I had intended to yield time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

Mr. GARRETT. I shall be glad to conclude the statement I was about to make, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to one hour.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I ask for 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. I will yield now, then, to the gentleman from Massachusetts 10 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this rule devoting six hours to the discussion of a report on which no action is pending is the clearest possible illustration there can be that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] is correct in assuming a preconcerted plan to prevent the consideration of the immigration bill. There is plenty of time to take up the immigration bill, if anybody wishes to do so. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that if that bill came before this House there would be 250 Members for it and 150 Members against it; but there are 350 Members out of the whole 400 who do not want it to come up, because whichever way the thing goes, they think they are going to be in trouble. Now, I should like the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY].

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] will give his attention. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] that if instead of publishing in the RECORD the names of the Democratic members of the Committee on Rules who say they are in favor of the bill coming up, if he will publish boldly in the RECORD the fact that the Democratic Committee on Rules refuses to let this bill come up, he may accomplish something. It is no use proving that the members of the committee as individuals are in favor of the bill if the members of the committee acting as a body refuse to permit its consideration.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I yield the floor.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman yield the balance of his time to me?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts can not yield the balance of his time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. GARRETT. Not at present, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question, if I may.

Mr. GARRETT. I will yield for a question.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Will the gentleman, before his hour has concluded, or before he makes a preferential motion, yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. GARRETT. I will only yield for discussion on the question before the House.

Mr. RODDENBERY. That is what I desire to discuss.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I would like 10 minutes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, investigation, as I began to say a few moments ago, by the special committee appointed to investigate the American Steel Trust has elicited great attention throughout the country. It seemed to the Committee on Rules that that report was of sufficient importance to justify a discussion in the House, and consequently the Committee on Rules reports this resolution providing for such discussion. I now move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RODDENBERY) there were—ayes 99, noes 11.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. All those in favor of ordering the previous question will answer "aye" and those opposed will answer "no."

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 222, nays 13, answered "present" 7, not voting 147, as follows:

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HUGHES of Georgia was granted leave of absence, for two days, on account of sickness.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I find in the columns of a leading metropolitan newspaper the following statement:

The attitude of the leaders toward the Stanley plans was shown Saturday when Mr. UNDERWOOD refused to allow Mr. STANLEY time to make a speech explaining the steel report. It is customary when a chairman brings a committee report into the House to allow him to make a speech.

Mr. Speaker, I am not concerned about any attack made upon myself. During the year or more that this committee has been in session I have treated personal attacks in the press, personal misrepresentations, with that silent contempt they abundantly deserve. It has been intimated this committee itself was organized, appointed, and run by a wolf in Wall Street, whom I never saw, that men were employed on this committee, who were working in the interest of stockbrokers and that this committee was closely watching the stock market. It was amusing to me to be accused of interest in the stock market. I never had money enough ahead in my life to buy a share of stock, and I never sold one. I care nothing about these malicious, mean, scurrilous buzzings about the cloakrooms and corridors of this House; now and then they appear in the newspapers. I prefer to leave the work of this committee and the conduct of its chairman as its sole defense. When, however, it is charged that the leader on the floor of this House has refused to allow the chairman of a committee, which has expended $39,000 of the public money and which has been in session for more than a year, time in which to make a statement, it puts the leader in an attitude that he does not deserve, and I feel that it is just to say of that gallant and gifted Alabamian, that during my whole course of this committee, whenever I have unearthed anything touching the conduct of this corporation which was oppressive to the people or injurious to the country generally, he has been among the first to tender his assistance and approval. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I will say for the leader on the floor that when objection was made upon the Republican side of the House to a discussion of this matter—and I do not believe there is more than one Democrat living who would object to airing the Steel Trust's iniquities—he assured me that I could have all the time I wanted in which to discuss the question. I then said to Mr. UNDERWOOD that I did not care for any time, that I had never asked for time in which to discuss the question, but that it had been suggested by my colleagues, and it has been the will of a majority of this House, that the conflicting views of the members of the committee should be discussed before the House. I said to him at that time that I would take no time given to me, that I wanted the time to be equally divided so that the opposition might have the same chance that I had to express their views, and I have continuously insisted upon this course.

I wish to say for the Speaker of this House that during the entire conduct of this investigation he has shown that interest in the public welfare, that interest in the oppressed everywhere, and that bitter hostility to graft and plunder on the part of monopoly that has always marked his illustrious course, and he has never been too busy, never had too much upon his big, brave shoulders, to take the chairman of this committee into his confidence and to heartily commend his efforts. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The House has heard the chairman of the Committee on Rules express his opinion of the conduct of the committee, and the conduct of its chairman, investigating the affairs of the United States Steel Corporation. It is not necessary that I should speak of his long, untiring, and successful efforts to have corporate abuses thoroughly and rigorously investigated. His fight for the organization of this committee is a part of the history of the Sixty-second Congress. The chairmen of the great committees to whom the bills recommended by this committee are referred—the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—have rendered me every assistance and displayed the deepest interest in this far-reaching legislation. If this committee has been successful, if this committee has deserved the commendation of the country, if it has reflected in its recommendations the will of the Democratic Party, it is due not to any skill, not to any talent, on the part of the chairman, but it is due to the hearty, tireless, and unequivocal support of a Democratic Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I regret that a great newspaper——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I raise a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Kentucky has not stated any question of personal privilege. If the gentleman desires to make a political partisan speech, I have no objection to giving unanimous consent that he may do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Kentucky did not have any question of privilege and would have sustained the point of order after three sentences if anybody had raised it.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I did not raise it; I have no objection to the statement and have no objection to the gentleman's making a partisan speech if he desires to do so.

Mr. STANLEY. I am not making any partisan speech; the gentleman is oversensitive.

Mr. MANN. Nobody can accuse me of being oversensitive. If the gentleman desires time to make a partisan speech——

Mr. STANLEY. I hope to get unanimous consent for one minute to continue my partisan speech.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman's taking the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed with his personal statement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STANLEY. I have not called the name of the journal which published this, because I believe it is heartily anxious to aid and not to injure the Democratic Party and properly present the attitude of the leaders in this House and would not have given currency to the statement if it had been truthfully and wisely advised. [Applause.]

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—PRIOLEAU AGAINST LEGARE.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to present a report from the Committee on Elections No. 2 in the contested-election case of Prioleau against Legare. (H. Res. 670, H. Rept. 1148).

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contested-election case of Prioleau against Legare.

The SPEAKER. Ordered to be printed and referred to the calendar.

REPORT IN REGARD TO JUDGE HANFORD.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary I present at this time a privileged report and ask that the Clerk read the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

[House Report No. 1152, Sixty-second Congress, second session.]

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF CORNELIUS H. HANFORD, UNITED STATES CIRCUIT JUDGE FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made the following report, to accompany House resolution 576:

The committee having had under consideration House resolution 576 report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution proposed by this committee, which accompanies this report, be agreed to.

The resolution (H. Res. 576) was carefully considered by the committee, and under the authority conferred by this resolution JAMES M. GRAHAM, WALTER I. MCCOY, and EDWIN W. HIGGINS were appointed the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary and were directed, as such subcommittee, to inquire into the alleged misconduct of Cornelius H. Hanford, United States judge for the western district of the State of Washington, and to report the result of their investigation to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The report of the subcommittee, giving account of the acts and doings of the same, is hereto attached and made a part of this report.

Your committee, after having carefully considered the report of the subcommittee, agreed to the recommendations reached by the subcommittee and adopted the same as the conclusions of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Impeachment is designed to remove unworthy persons from office. The officer convicted in an impeachment proceeding is nevertheless subject to indictment, trial, and punishment in the proper court for any crime he may have committed. Impeachment is the method adopted for the removal from and disqualification to hold office. The Constitution provides that "the party convicted [in an impeachment case] shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law" for his crimes. It was said by Mr. Bayard in the trial of Blount that "Impeachment is a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish the offender as to secure the state. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity." (Wharton's State Trials, 263.)

If this judge has been guilty of any crime, the courts which administer the criminal law are the proper tribunals to try and to punish him.

Your committee recommend that the testimony taken by the subcommittee in this case be printed and transmitted to the Attorney General of the United States for his consideration and use, to the end that if any crimes have been committed against the laws of the United States the Department of Justice may take cognizance of the same and see that the guilty parties are tried and punished in the appropriate tribunal.

Your committee has considered the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., July 23, 1912.

Hon. H. D. CLAYTON,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

DEAR JUDGE CLAYTON: The President has received a telegram from Judge Hanford, United States district judge, western district of Washington, tendering his resignation as United States judge and stating that a letter follows. Before acting upon this resignation the President asks me to inquire of you whether the acceptance of the resignation would in any way interfere with the plans of the committee engaged in the investigation of the charges against Judge Hanford. I shall be very glad to have a statement of the attitude of your committee and of your own recommendations in the premises.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. W. WICKERSHAM,
Attorney General.

To this letter, in accordance with the direction of the committee, the chairman made the following reply:

AUGUST 3, 1912.

To the ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Department of Justice, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of July 23 came duly to hand. Reply thereto has been delayed for the purpose of having the subcommittee, composed of Messrs. GRAHAM, MCCOY, and HIGGINS, to return from Seattle, Wash., to Washington, D. C., and report to the Committee on the Judiciary the result of their investigation of the charges against Judge Hanford. The Committee on the Judiciary gave consideration to this matter and has directed me to say that the acceptance of the resignation of Judge Hanford would not in any way interfere with the plans of the committee which has heretofore been engaged in the investigation of the charges against Judge Hanford. There appears to be no good reason why the resignation of Judge Hanford should not be accepted. The committee will submit to the House of Representatives the recommendation that the testimony taken in the investigation of the alleged misconduct of Judge Hanford be forwarded to you for your consideration and use, so that your department may take cognizance of any infractions of the criminal laws of the United States which said testimony may disclose or tend to disclose.

Yours, very truly,

HENRY D. CLAYTON, Chairman.

It appeared to your committee that there was no good reason why the resignation of the judge should not be accepted. And it appears to your committee that the further prosecution of the impeachment proceedings is inadvisable. Among the reasons for this conclusion may be stated in substance the reasons assigned by the subcommittee:

(1) The chief good which successful impeachment proceedings could effect would be the removal of Judge Hanford from the bench. That good his resignation accomplished.

(2) The record of the evidence shows that he is 64 years old his next birthday, and hence not entitled to retire on pay. Therefore his resignation brings him no emolument or reward and involves no expenditure of public money.

(3) Your committee do not think it necessary or advisable to pursue the impeachment further merely for the purpose of making him ineligible to hold office in the future, as his age and the circumstances disclosed by the testimony render such a contingency highly improbable.

(4) Bringing the witnesses from Seattle and vicinity to Washington, a distance of over 3,000 miles, to prosecute an impeachment proceeding before the Senate, would involve an expenditure approximating $70,000. This expenditure of public money could not be justified in this case, where the judge is now out of office and doubtless will never again be appointed to office.

Your committee recommend that the following resolution be agreed to:

RESOLUTION.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of and action under House resolution 576.

Resolved further, That the testimony taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary under the authority conferred by House resolution 576 be printed as a part of this report and transmitted by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the Attorney General for his consideration, and with the recommendation that the Department of Justice take cognizance thereof and take whatever action may be deemed advisable in case said testimony discloses or tends to disclose any infractions of the laws of the United States.

Report to the Committee on the Judiciary by the subcommittee appointed under House resolution 576 to take the testimony in the matter of the alleged misconduct of Cornelius H. Hanford, United States judge for the western district of the State of Washington:

To the Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

On Thursday, June 13, 1912, the Committee on the Judiciary adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That JAMES M. GRAHAM, WALTER I. MCCOY, and EDWIN W. HIGGINS, members of this committee, be appointed the subcommittee by virtue of the authority given under House resolution No. 576, passed by the House of Representatives on June 13, 1912, authorizing an inquiry into the alleged misconduct of Cornelius H. Hanford, United States judge for the western district of the State of Washington, and that the said subcommittee shall have all the powers authorized by said resolution hereinbefore named."

In pursuance of said resolution your subcommittee left Washington on June 21, 1912, and reached Seattle the evening of June 25. Wednesday, June 26, was spent in making the necessary preliminary arrangements for proceeding with the hearings, and on Thursday, the 27th, the taking of testimony was begun in a court room of the Federal building in Seattle, and was concluded on Monday, July 22, 1912. The subcommittee sat every day between those days, except Sundays and the 4th of July, making in all 21 days of actual work, including several evening sessions. Two hundred and three witnesses were examined and 3,291 typewritten pages of testimony were taken, not including 94 exhibits which were made part of the record, and not including 138 collateral exhibits which were received tentatively by the subcommittee and taken back for examination by the members of the whole committee and for such use as the committee might desire to make of them.

The subcommittee had almost, but not quite, completed the taking of testimony when, at the morning session on Monday, July 22, counsel representing Judge Hanford asked for a conference with the members of the subcommittee, and the request was granted. They then informed the subcommittee that Judge Hanford had concluded to send his resignation to the President. Thereupon the subcommittee went into executive session to consider what its course of action would be, and after careful consideration of the premises unanimously reached the conclusion not to proceed with the taking of further testimony unless directed to do so by this committee; and the chairman of the subcommittee was directed to wire Chairman CLAYTON for instructions. After having ascertained that Judge Hanford's resignation was in fact forwarded to President Taft, the chairman of the subcommittee wired to Chairman CLAYTON as follows:

"JULY 22, 1912.

"To Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
"House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

"Judge Hanford has just now forwarded his resignation to the President. We are not quite done taking testimony, but nearly so. The subcommittee unanimously favor discontinuing the taking of further testimony. Wire advice immediately."

And in a short time he received the following reply:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., July 22.

"Yes; I advise you to take no further testimony."

The subcommittee then reconvened in open session and the chairman publicly announced that owing to the resignation of Judge Hanford the hearings would be discontinued, and the subcommittee adjourned, subject to the call of the chairman.

Your subcommittee was moved to recommend the discontinuance of the hearings by a number of reasons, among which might be mentioned the following:

(1) The chief good which successful impeachment proceedings could effect would be the removal of Judge Hanford from the bench. This good his resignation accomplished.

(2) The record of the evidence shows he is only 64 years old his next birthday, and hence not entitled to retire on pay. Therefore his resignation brings him no emolument or reward and involves no expenditure of public money.

(3) Your subcommittee did not think it necessary or wise to pursue the matter to a final conclusion merely for the purpose of making him ineligible to hold office in the future, as his age and the circumstances disclosed by the testimony render such a contingency highly improbable.

(4) Bringing the witnesses from Seattle and vicinity to Washington, a distance of over 3,000 miles, to prosecute an impeachment proceeding before the Senate, would involve an expenditure approximating $70,000.

There were other reasons suggested and discussed, but those given above were deemed by your subcommittee sufficient to justify them in recommending the discontinuance of the hearings.

Your subcommittee further reports that Judge Hanford was represented during the hearings by able and learned counsel, namely, Mr. E. C. Hughes, Mr. Harold Preston, and Mr. C. W. Dorr, and that they were given wide latitude in the examination of all the witnesses and in the production of evidence on behalf of Judge Hanford, so that the record contains such evidence in defense as counsel desired to offer as well as the incriminating evidence; and on the whole record your subcommittee respectfully suggests that it clearly appears that Judge Hanford's usefulness as a Federal judge is over; that his personal and judicial conduct disqualify him for that position and that this committee recommend that his resignation be accepted.

Your subcommittee respectfully submits herewith a complete transcript of the testimony taken and originals or true copies of all exhibits offered and admitted in evidence, and recommend that this committee have the same printed.

They also submit certain documents designated as collateral exhibits which were not made a part of the record because they were not considered relevant, but which were taken along by the subcommittee for such further use as this committee might think fit to make of them. But the subcommittee does not recommend that they be printed.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES M. GRAHAM, Chairman.
WALTER I. MCCOY.
EDWIN W. HIGGINS.

House resolution 672.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of and action under House resolution 576.

Resolved further, That the testimony taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary under the authority conferred by House resolution 576 be printed as a part of this report and transmitted by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the Attorney General for his consideration and with the recommendation that the Department of Justice take cognizance thereof and take whatever action may be deemed advisable in case said testimony discloses or tends to disclose any infractions of the laws of the United States.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, at this point I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that Judge Hanford's resignation has been accepted. Under date of August 5, 1912, in a letter addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary the Attorney General writes as follows:

The President has to-day written to Judge Hanford accepting his resignation as United States judge.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask that the report of the subcommittee, which is made a part of the report just read, be printed in the RECORD. It is in harmony with the report which has been just read, and therefore it is unnecessary to read the report of the subcommittee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put this motion as he understands it, and if he is not correct the gentleman will correct it. The gentleman from Alabama makes this report and asks that it be printed, and he asks that the report of the subcommittee, which had immediate control of this matter, be also printed, and asks that the report be received and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the Hanford case.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the Chair has stated substantially the proposition, but not exactly in the way in which the matter is before the House. The report which has just been read makes as a part of that report the report of the subcommittee. In other words, the subcommittee report is a part of the report of the committee. Now, I ask to dispense with the reading of the report of the subcommittee and that it be printed as a part of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. I now offer the resolution which the Clerk has and move the adoption of the resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks that the report of the subcommittee be printed along with the report of the full committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 672.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of and action under House resolution 576.

Resolved further, That the testimony taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary under the authority conferred by H. Res. 576 be printed as a part of this report and transmitted by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the Attorney General for his consideration, and with the recommendation that the Department of Justice take cognizance thereof and take whatever action may be deemed advisable in case said testimony discloses or tends to disclose any infraction of the laws of the United States.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is divisible, and I therefore ask that the first part of the resolution be read, and I will ask its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first part of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of and action under House resolution 576.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BERGER. May I have five minutes to speak to this?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman five minutes' time, inasmuch as he was the author of the original resolution 576 which was adopted by way of the adoption of a substitute in the House on June 13, 1912. Mr. Speaker, I shall insert in the RECORD the resolution as it finally passed the House or was agreed to in the House on June 13, which varies in some slight particulars from the original resolution introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The substitute or amended resolution 576 is in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is requisite concerning the official misconduct of Cornelius H. Hanford, United States judge for the western district of the State of Washington, and say whether said judge has been in a drunken condition while presiding in court; whether said judge has been guilty of corrupt conduct in office; whether the administration of said judge has resulted in injury and wrong to litigants in his court and others affected by his decisions; and whether said judge has been guilty of any misbehavior for which he should be impeached.

And in reference to this investigation the said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, employ a clerk and stenographer, if necessary, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and whereever it may be necessary to take testimony for the use of said committee. The said subcommittee while so employed shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant at arms, by himself or deputy, who shall serve the process of said committee and the process and orders of said subcommittee and shall attend the sitting of the same as ordered and as directed thereby, and that the expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The resolution was adopted in the form as read for the reason it was more nearly in accordance with the precedents or resolutions in like cases adopted than was the resolution offered in the original form by the gentleman from Wisconsin, but it was in substance the same. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Speaker, to begin with, I want to express my appreciation of the fine spirit shown in this case by both the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], and the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], and the other members. I fully agree with the report that the impeachment proceedings against Judge Cornelius H. Hanford should be dropped now, because the official to be removed from office has removed himself. Furthermore, I know that impeachment proceedings are of a political and not of a criminal nature.

The judge impeached by me, Judge Cornelius H. Hanford, of the western district of Washington, no doubt did the best thing for himself and for the country when he resigned. He saved himself a great deal of trouble and the country a great deal of money.

I hope that a number of other Federal judges who stand in the same position before the country to-day, who are under the same kind of a cloud, will follow his example and resign.

Impeachment proceedings are obsolete, clumsy, and very unsatisfactory as a rule. Moreover, impeachment is expensive and hardly ever brings results. We ought to elect our Federal judges by a vote of the people of their respective districts, and we should have the recall besides.

Until that be the case, however, I believe it would be for the advantage of the Federal bench and add to the respect for law in general if about a dozen Federal judges could be made to resign. And for this reason, Mr. Speaker, I also hope that the second part of the resolution will be adopted and that the Attorney General will see his way clear to call a Federal grand jury to probe the conditions and the circumstances which led to the sudden resignation of a Federal judge while charges were pending against him—a judge who could have resigned a few months later with a full pension. Judge Hanford was rather in too great a hurry. He resigned by wire. The ex-judge is not responsible to us now, but the conditions in his district will bear a criminal investigation.

I want again to thank the gentlemen of the committee for the good work they have done.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for one minute?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman if he desires.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I thank the gentleman. I do not desire that much time. I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER]. This Federal judge has resigned. I have not read the record. The resolutions are about to be adopted which recommend the discontinuance of the impeachment proceedings. Upon the guilt or innocence of this judge that was, if he had been impeached, I do not have an opinion. He is out. If he is bad, he is disposed of, and the House and the country are to be congratulated.

But I respectfully dissent from the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] when he says there are at least a dozen other Federal judges that ought to be out of the service, intimating, if not saying, that they ought to be impeached. I do not sympathize with that remark. I believe in the coordinate branch of the Government, the judiciary, and in the enforcement of the law, and I could not sit still and listen without dissent to remarks which would tend, so far as the remarks of the gentleman could tend, to discredit the coordinate branch of the Government. I have no sympathy with such statements. I believe that the coordinate branch of the Government, the judiciary of the United States, is substantially patriotic, able, and clothed in integrity and wisdom. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Is this vote to be on the first resolution?

The SPEAKER. Yes. It is to be on the first part of this resolution. The question is on agreeing to the first part of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next part.

Mr. MANN. It was read once. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How much evidence is there that was taken by the subcommittee?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am very glad to answer the gentleman. I have here a letter from the Public Printer touching that matter. I violate no secret when I say that the other day, before drawing this report, I ascertained the views of a few of the experienced Members of the House whose opinions I value, particularly on such matters as this, and among those gentlemen with whom I conferred was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as to the advisability of printing this testimony. After having talked with the gentleman from Illinois and members of the committee and other Members of the House, I was persuaded that perhaps it was well to leave it to the House whether or not this testimony should be printed.

I thereupon put myself in communication with the Public Printer. I sent to him all the testimony taken in the case, except the exhibits, which the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], informed me were not necessary to an intelligent understanding of the testimony itself. Now, this testimony, exclusive of these unnecessary exhibits—unnecessary in the sense that I have stated—comprises what would make 1,880 pages of printed matter. That is what the Public Printer says.

Now, I believe that it comprises something like 3,400 pages of typewritten matter. After I had communicated with the Public Printer he sent me this letter, dated August 5, 1912:

I am in receipt of your communication of August 5 requesting an estimate of the cost of printing transcript, insertions, and exhibits of the investigation made by the subcommittee on the judiciary in the matter of the charges touching the official conduct of Cornelius H. Hanford, United States judge for the western district of the State of Washington.

The estimated cost is as follows: 1,000 copies, $3,830.70; 1,880 pages, 2 volumes.

This estimate does not include the insertions nor exhibits, for the reason that they have not been submitted. The manuscript has been returned.

Yours, very respectfully, SAML. B. DONNELLY, Public Printer.

That was addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was suggested by some of the gentlemen on the committee and others that perhaps it was unnecessary to incur the expense of printing this testimony. It occurred to me in the beginning, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps it was an unnecessary thing to do, and therefore, if unnecessary, it was not advisable to put the Government to that expense. But after discussion in the committee and further discussion with the Members of the House your committee reached the conclusion that it was advisable to print this testimony.

Much has been said in the public prints as to what this testimony disclosed. Much has been said to the effect that the Attorney General ought to take some appropriate action. Much has been said to the effect that these impeachment proceedings ought not now to be abandoned; that these impeachment proceedings should be further prosecuted in order that the daylight may be turned in on certain transactions occurring in the West with which the name of the judge has been associated. Your committee thought that perhaps they would be censured if they held back from the full public view the testimony taken in this case. In another case which that committee have had under consideration a number of representatives of the press attended the daily sessions of the committee and gave long accounts every day of the testimony submitted. The public seemed to want to know just what this judge did and just what those who are associated with him did. The public want to know what is involved in all of the various conduct alleged against the judge. The committee reached the unanimous conclusion that the public ought to have the benefit of the information as to exactly what the conduct of this judge was. For these reasons, which I have set forth briefly and imperfectly, it occurred to the committee that the report should be printed. I bring that proposition to the House and respectfully submit it to the House, with the statement that the committee advise that this testimony be printed and then transmit it to the Attorney General for further action in the criminal courts if he deems such action necessary or proper. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the Public Printer estimates that the thousand copies without the inserts will cost in the neighborhood of $3,500. I do not know why the Public Printer estimated on the basis of 1,000 copies, because that number is never printed. If it is ordered printed at all, there will be the usual number printed, which will be 300 for the House, a certain number for the Senate, a certain number for the executive departments, and a certain number for public depositories.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman permit me to say that I do not know why the Public Printer estimated it upon the basis of a thousand copies, unless he was actuated by the same reason as that which actuates the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk out in the corridor, who always tells us what the first thousand will cost and then tells us what the second thousand will cost, the second thousand costing less than the first thousand?

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I apprehend the Public Printer knows that even if the House passed a resolution to print 1,000 copies that does not mean that 1,000 copies only will be printed. The law provides the number to be printed under such circumstances. and it is more than 1,000 copies. But, regardless of that, I take it that the number that would be printed would cost in the neighborhood of $3,500 or $4,000.

This testimony is to be referred to the Attorney General. Necessarily most of the testimony taken in cases of this sort becomes irrelevant before the case is closed. What object is there in printing that entire number? It looks to me like a gross extravagance. We did not print the testimony in the impeachment proceedings which are now pending.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman is mistaken about that. The testimony was printed in the impeachment case now pending before the Senate. It was printed from day to day under the authority given to the committee.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes, as a committee print; a very small number of copies. That does not go throughout the country, and a few months from now probably you will not be able to find a copy.

Mr. CLAYTON. Perhaps not. I will not undertake to say.

Mr. MANN. I mean that copies are not placed in the public depositories, or anything of that sort.

Mr. CLAYTON. Perhaps not. I do not know about that, but there will doubtless be some bound copies to be found hereafter in the libraries and in the committee rooms.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that, of course, the committee might have ordered this testimony printed; but there being such a large volume of it, and the judge having vacated his office, the committee were of the opinion that it was better to submit the question to the House itself. Therefore we brought it here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think anybody will ever read this testimony?

Mr. CLAYTON. Judging from the inquiries that the chairman of the committee has received for copies, I think a good many people will read it. Requests have been received from various parts of the country.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Alabama thinks that the Committee on the Judiciary has the power to order this printed, why does not the committee order 500 copies printed? That is a greater number than will ever be used. This proceeding would require what is called the usual number to be printed—close to 1,500. I will say that I do not think the Committee on the Judiciary has the power to order it printed.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, the committee were of the opinion that they did have the authority to order it printed, but they thought it was a question that ought, with all propriety, to be submitted to the House itself. As to the other objection urged by the gentleman, instead of printing 1,500, under the usual order in such cases, I can say to the gentleman that I would readily agree to an amendment of the resolution restricting the number to 500, if the gentleman sees proper to offer that amendment.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that such an amendment would not decrease the number printed, but would add to the number printed, because when the House orders a document printed, it is printed in the usual number, and if a specified number is mentioned, the usual number is printed in addition.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is it not quite competent for the House by a special resolution to abrogate any general rule and specify a particular number to be printed?

Mr. MANN. I think it is quite certain that the House by special resolution can not change a law. That is my recollection.

Mr. CLAYTON. I apprehend it would be competent for the House to control the number that it desires.

Mr. MANN. If it is printed as a House document it has to be distributed through the public depositories, and that requires the usual number to be printed.

Mr. NORRIS. Five hundred copies would cost nearly the same as the usual number. It is the setting of the type which constitutes the greater part of the expense.

Mr. MANN. No; in a large case like this the cost of the paper is a considerable expense.

Mr. HARDY. I should like to inquire whether the committee by unanimous report has given a succinct statement of all the facts relating to the charges?

Mr. CLAYTON. It has not. It has given its conclusions and the reasons for them, but the report does not go into a detailed statement of the facts. The report deals mainly with the phase of the case that the judge having resigned or vacated his office there is therefore no necessity for a further prosecution of the impeachment proceedings.

Mr. HARDY. One question more; was there any evidence in conflict or dispute as to the facts?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; there was a contrariety of evidence.

Mr. HARDY. The facts were not agreed to?

Mr. CLAYTON. The facts were not agreed to; there was a great volume of testimony. As is the practice in such cases the accused judge was present with his counsel and asked a great many questions; witnesses were examined on both sides of the controverted propositions in order that the subcommittee, if it had reached that point, could make an intelligent deduction of the truth from the testimony on the controverted facts.

Mr. HARDY. I understand that the matter being about to be dismissed the committee did not state the conclusion of facts.

Mr. CLAYTON. No; there were a number of charges involved in the resolution. There was the general charge of his misconduct, and there was the charge of habitual inebriety, a charge of corruption—all those things were not named in the resolution with that particularity required in an indictment, or with the particularity required in an article of impeachment, but there was substantially stated these charges so that any intelligent man could comprehend what the purpose of the resolution was, and of what the alleged misconduct of the judge chiefly consisted. The report made by the committee deals with the question whether the House shall now proceed with the impeachment case more than it does with the merits of the charges made against the judge originally.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. I understand Judge Hanford, under accusations that seemed to warrant impeachment, has resigned.

Mr. CLAYTON. The report discloses that, and all the discussions to-day disclose that, and the gentleman could not be mistaken about it.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does that resignation relieve him from all punishment?

Mr. CLAYTON. It in nowise relieves him from punishment for any crime that he may have committed.

Mr. BATHRICK. It relieves him in this one way: That if impeachment proceedings were held and he was finally impeached, he would be disqualified to hold office and to vote as a citizen of the United States.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the report deals with that aspect of the case. The object of impeachment proceedings is twofold: To rid the public service of an unworthy official. That is the primary object. The secondary object of impeachment proceedings is to disqualify the impeached officer, if the Senate shall so pronounce judgment, from further holding office. That secondary idea was carried into the impeachment provision of the Constitution for this purpose. Another provision in the Constitution says, in effect, that the President shall not pardon in case of impeachment. Now, then, if in the case of an impeached judge the President can not pardon him, of course, with that in view and without a judgment of disqualification, the President could avoid the provision which prevents his pardoning him by reappointing him to office after conviction on impeachment.

Let me, Mr. Speaker, cite the provisions of the Constitution of the United States bearing upon the impeachment of judges. These provisions are as follows:

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Art. I, sec. 2.)

Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. (Art. I, sec. 3.)

The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Art. II, sec. 2.)

The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Art. II, sec. 4.)

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. (Art. III, sec. 1.)

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. (Art. IV, sec. 2.)

It was to prevent the possible nullification of the denial of the pardoning power to the President in impeachment cases that the secondary idea in the impeachment provisions of the Constitution was inserted. Now, that brings us to the practical question of this case. The committee was of opinion that the primary object of impeachment proceedings having been accomplished by resignation of the judge, it was not necessary to further prosecute this case in order that the possible secondary provision of impeachment proceedings might be had, namely, disqualification of the judge.

The judge is now about 64 years of age. He has resigned his office under charges of such a character that no President would ever appoint him to office. Therefore his age and the circumstances of his resignation renders it almost ridiculous to suppose that any President would ever again appoint him to public office.

Then, again, your committee was of the opinion that for the mere purpose of disqualifying this judge 64 years of age, who has resigned under these circumstances so highly discreditable to him, that it is unnecessary to put the Government to the enormous expense of trying this man to the ultimate conclusion of an impeachment proceeding. The report of the subcommittee and the report of the committee shows that it will cost the Government approximately $70,000 to continue this prosecution. It will cost more than that; it will cost the time and attention of this House, the time and attention of the Senate, and the gentleman from New Jersey and the gentleman from Illinois, who are on the subcommittee, are inclined to the opinion that it would cost $100,000 to continue this impeachment proceeding further.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to suggest that this part of the resolution has already been adopted.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; of course that occurred to me; but when the gentleman from Ohio asked for information I thought it entirely proper for me to give the information. The committee was actuated by a desire to give the fullest publicity to the conduct of this judge, and it would be a wholesome public benefit to have the testimony printed. I believe the money expended for printing the testimony would be well expended for the public good.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. How many copies would be given to each Member of the House under this resolution, and how many to the Senate, approximately?

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman is a more expert mathematician than I am.

Mr. COOPER. I did not understand what the total number was.

Mr. MANN. Under the law, of the usual number printed, I think the House gets 300 copies.

Mr. COOPER. That is less than one copy for each Member of the House.

Mr. MANN. That is the case with all documents printed.

Mr. COOPER. It ought not to be in the case of this document. I should like to have the gentleman from Alabama give me four minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Alabama a moment ago said, or intimated, I think, that there had not been very full reports of the testimony taken before the subcommittee.

Mr. CLAYTON. Oh, I was very unfortunate if the gentleman understood that.

Mr. COOPER. I mean in the newspapers.

Mr. CLAYTON. The newspapers in the eastern portion of the country, or to put it more precisely, except the newspapers in the far West, the press has not carried a very full account of the testimony taken in the case.

Mr. COOPER. There has been a good deal of conflict concerning the testimony. The judge resigned, as I recall it, on account of his health. Is that so?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am not advised as to that.

Mr COOPER. He gave that as the reason in his letter of resignation.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not seen his letter of resignation.

Mr. COOPER. It was so reported that he resigned on account of his health.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have not seen the letter.

Mr. COOPER. I am free to say that I hope a resolution will be passed providing for a number of copies sufficient to enable not only the House but the country to become informed concerning the evidence taken on that hearing.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman that if it should develop that there was a demand for more than the usual number would supply it would be a very easy matter to have a reprint.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that it is an easy matter to get a reprint. I understand it to be quite a difficult thing to get a question of that kind before the House.

Mr. NORRIS. It is an easy matter if there is a demand for it.

Mr. COOPER. It depends on whether you can get the question before the House. My own judgment is that there ought to be a sufficient number of copies of the testimony printed in every proceeding of this kind, where the official proposed to be impeached holds his office for life, so that the facts can become generally known to the people throughout the country. When newspapers print that the testimony is getting close to firms worth a million dollars and representing great business interests of the State of Washington, that suddenly a consultation is called in the chambers of the judge, and that in a few minutes he resigns, there is presented an unusual state of affairs, and I do not propose that anything which looks like political pull or any other kind of pull shall suppress the full publication of the facts, so that I, at least, shall know what they were. It ought not to be said that the House of Representatives directed an investigation of the conduct of a Federal judge, which investigation went to such a point that the judge suddenly called people into his chamber and resigned, and that then the House of Representatives refused to print the testimony. As a matter of fact, this resolution ought not to have been brought up until after the testimony had been printed and the Members of the House had an opportunity to examine it, so that we might know whether we wished to vote to continue the impeachment proceedings.

So far as I am concerned, my vote will go for the printing of at least a sufficient number of copies to provide one for each Member of the House and the Senate and one for the Congressional Library.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that the testimony in this case ought to be printed. I do not think the cost of printing it is even a moderately good reason why it should not be done. The entire cost of the investigation up to this time, while I have not figured it up with accuracy, I think will not greatly exceed $2,000. Most of that has gone for stenographic service, and the next largest item is the cost of transportation from Washington, D. C., to Seattle for the members of the committee and one attendant. The entire cost is so trifling that it seems to me that the cost of printing a few hundred copies of the evidence ought not to cause the House to hesitate at all. Some Seattle papers have been forwarded to me since my return, as they have been forwarded to other members of the subcommittee, and in them the gentleman who represented Judge Hanford before our subcommittee has made a voluminous résumé, or what they claim to be a résumé, of the testimony given before the subcommittee. That résumé has doubtless circulated quite extensively on the Pacific coast, and may extend farther than that. With a knowledge of the testimony adduced before the committee fresh in my mind, after the reading of that résumé I have not any hesitation in saying that it is not a reasonably fair presentation of the testimony in the case. If this testimony is not printed, that résumé will go out before the public and will be preserved and will practically stand as the testimony produced before the committee, when it is not, and it is not nearly the testimony. It is entirely misleading. They have not only failed to remember the testimony, but they have been unable to remember some remarks which they say I made, but which I did not make.

I think that, in view of the small amount of money needed to preserve it, it is well worth making it a permanent record. It will be read quite extensively in the western part of the United States, and it will be of record and on file in the future if anybody wants to refer to it. I do not suppose that any Member of the House, and perhaps not many others, would read it from cover to cover. I think that is true; but I know a great many Supreme Court reports that are printed and preserved with great care, and I do not know anyone who reads them all from cover to cover. They are useful for reference, more so than this would be, of course, but this would be useful for reference also now and then. It is an exceptional case, and many would be interested to know whether, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] said a moment ago, the judge resigned because of ill health or because the weather was getting too warm, and the testimony, like the weather, was getting too hot for him to retain his seat. There will be many interested in ascertaining those facts, and they can only do it by reading the record of the testimony. If the testimony is not printed there will be many citizens who may think there is something amiss, that there was something to be covered up, something that would not bear the exposure of publicity; and it seems to me that, as this is a public matter, the public have a right to know just what took place there, and the only way they can know that is by having this record put in cold type and preserved.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, this resolution with reference to printing will not carry into effect the printing of this testimony as a document nor will it bring about the distribution which has been discussed here. The resolution provides only that the testimony be printed and transmitted to the Clerk of the House, and that he transmit the same to the Attorney General for action, and so on. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that he should amend his resolution so as to provide that it be printed as a House document and that a copy of same be transmitted to the Attorney General. In that way he would carry into effect the suggestions contained in the debate which has been going on with reference to the matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that I suppose if this is printed it will be printed as a part of this report.

Mr. FINLEY. I think if the gentleman will read the resolution carefully he will come to the same conclusion that I have.

Mr. MANN. I heard the resolution read. It provides that the testimony shall be printed.

Mr. FINLEY. And be by the Clerk transmitted to the Attorney General.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; but when an order is made by the House for the printing of a thing it is either printed as a report or as a House document. The law so provides. The House can not by a simple resolution print it in any other way.

Mr. FINLEY. I have the law here before me. The present law provides:

> Whenever any document or report shall be ordered printed by Congress, such order to print shall signify the "usual number" copies for binding and distribution among those entitled to receive them. No greater number shall be printed unless ordered by either House, or as hereinafter provided. When a special number of the document or report is ordered printed, the usual number shall also be printed, unless already ordered. The usual number of documents and reports shall be 1,682, which shall be distributed, etc.

Now, this is a special resolution simply providing for the printing of that testimony taken in the impeachment case.

Mr. CLAYTON. The resolution shows on its face——

Mr. MANN. Does not the law further provide that the House can not order printed anything that will cost over $500 by a simple resolution, unless it be a document presented to the House or a report presented to the House?

Mr. CLAYTON. One purpose of the resolution is to print the testimony as a part of the report. In order to reenforce the idea which is recognized by the gentleman from Illinois, if it is necessary to reenforce it, I move to insert after the words "be printed and transmitted" in the report so it will read as follows:

> Under authority conferred by House resolution 556 be printed as a part of this report.

After the word "printed" insert the words "as a part of this report."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, just a word. I would desire to offer an amendment. I would move to strike out of the resolution that part of the resolution providing for the printing of it. As I understand, this testimony was taken in public, newspaper reporters were admitted—am I right in my supposition?

Mr. CLAYTON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. And published widely, whereas if it be printed now as a part of the report or as a House document, as far as the public is concerned, it might as well be buried in the catacombs, and I think it is a gross injustice to print 3,500 pages of typewritten matter.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman offer his amendment?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Alabama yields for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not know whether the gentleman yielded for the gentleman simply to make some remarks or to offer an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Well, I did not know either.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the gentleman will not offer that amendment. I will be quite willing for him to test the sense of the House in voting down the proposition, but I do not think it is necessary to offer the amendment as a part of the resolution. I divided the question.

Mr. MANN. I understand that part is referred to the Attorney General and I have no desire to oppose that.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Alabama does not yield to the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman from Illinois insists I will yield for him to make that motion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will offer it.

Mr. MANN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out that part providing for the printing of the testimony.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out that part of the resolution providing for the printing of the evidence.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will please state his amendment again.

Mr. CLAYTON. On the fourth line from the bottom, page 4, after the word "printed" in that line, insert before the word "and" the words "as a part of this report."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers an amendment that after the word "printed" and before the word "and" there be inserted the words "as a part of this report."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question instead of making a parliamentary inquiry. The only way, then, that this evidence will be printed is as part of the report of the committee?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; unless some further action is had.

Mr. COOPER. Well, how many copies of the report will be printed?

Mr. CLAYTON. The usual number.

Mr. COOPER. What is the usual number?

Mr. CLAYTON. I am not accurate about that. I have never served on the Committee on Printing, and the gentleman from Wisconsin has been here very much longer than I have and he certainly, about the detail work of the committees, ought to be better informed than I am.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman has been here for 12 years.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am informed that it is 420.

Mr. MANN. The usual number, if the gentleman will permit me, is between 1,600 and 1,700, and my recollection is that 300 copies go to the House, a certain number to the Senate, a number to various departments, and then to public depositories, the Library, and so forth.

Mr. COOPER. Then of this evidence only 300 copies come to the House?

Mr. CLAYTON. I suppose that is correct; but I will say to the gentleman that neither the chairman of the Committee on Printing nor the distinguished leader of the minority nor the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has served here so long and faithfully, seem to know what the law is.

Mr. COOPER. Suppose a person introduced a resolution to have a larger number printed, would he get the usual number? I have never introduced such a resolution, and therefore I ask for information.

Mr. CLAYTON. The usual number, I am informed, is 420, and that is the best information I have.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Illinois says that he is informed that the House only gets 300.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The question was taken, and the amended resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was agreed to was laid on the table.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules which I present.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution (H. Res. 642, H. Rept. 1151) providing for consideration of the disposition of water rights on Schofield Military Reservation, Hawaiian Islands, in connection with the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations, etc.

Resolved, That in the consideration of the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes, it shall be in order to consider the following provision as an amendment thereto:

The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to grant and lease in the manner hereinafter provided, for a period of 25 years, such surplus water of the United States within the limits of or pertaining to the military reservation of Schofield Barracks (Waianae Uka), island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, as may not be needed for the supply of the military post and troops on said reservation; and he is further authorized and directed to include in such grant or lease authority to the grantee or lessee thereunder to enter upon such reservation and make surveys thereon for and construct and maintain dams, reservations, canals, ditches, flumes, tunnels, and pipe lines for the purpose of diverting and conducting from the reservation the water covered by such grant or lease, at such places on said land as said grantee or lessee may select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and to include also the right to said grantee or lessee to take from the lands of the United States adjacent thereto, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, earth and stone necessary for such construction and maintenance: Provided, That said grant or lease shall be made to or entered into with the highest responsible bidder for such surplus water, under sealed proposal, after public advertisement of the terms and conditions thereof for a period of not less than 30 days in a newspaper or newspapers of general circulation published at Honolulu, in the Territory of Hawaii, such terms and conditions to be fixed by the Secretary of War when not inconsistent with the provisions of this section: Provided further, That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this section is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules proposes to rescind the existing rules of the House, so far as section 4 of the general deficiency bill is concerned, and to make that section in order on the bill. That section provides for the leasing of water power at the Schofield Barracks, in Hawaii, reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The Committee on Appropriations does not have jurisdiction of the matter. The Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on the Territories would certainly have jurisdiction. The Committee on Appropriations, without having jurisdiction, and without having—with due deference to the distinguished members of that committee—very much knowledge concerning the present trend of sentiment relating to the granting of the use of water powers, has undertaken to prepare, and has prepared and presented, this proposition.

To a certain extent it involves the entire question of the Government's control over water powers. It contains no provision that the Government shall have any authority to regulate the charges made by the company which shall receive the grant.

I am not familiar with the facts in the case. I know nothing concerning what I understand from the report and statements by the gentlemen is a dispute between two sets of people who desire to obtain this concession, valuable as it is. But I can see from the form of the amendment, offered now to be made in order, that under it the public, who might want to investigate, will have very little chance indeed to do so. Outside persons will not have much opportunity. The grant shall be made to the highest bidder, under sealed proposals, after an advertisement of not less than 30 days.

That proposition is good in itself. It is provided that when made it shall include the right to enter upon the reservation and make surveys thereon for the construction and maintenance, and so forth, of the dam and the necessary appurtenant works. How can anybody bid upon it without having knowledge of the surveys in advance? Here is a proposition requiring that bids be advertised for and a contract let without specifications, without knowledge, with the right on the part of the person who secures the contract to enter and make surveys. Why, before they bid it is necessary for some one to make surveys. Either the Government ought to present its plans and its specifications, so that all bidders might bid on equal terms, or else it ought to authorize prospective bidders to make their examination and surveys in advance of submitting their proposals.

Mr. Speaker, we have on the calendar a large number of bills relating to water powers and the construction of dams. I do not believe that Congress ought to adopt any policy until it knows what it is doing. I do not believe that we ought to adopt any policy in reference to this dam now, probably foreclosing our right to control and regulate the charges which may be made by the company. That is what this proposition would do. It has no place on an appropriation bill. I desire to protest against gentlemen inserting on appropriation bills items which they favor and then insisting upon obtaining from the Committee on Rules a rule to make those items in order.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take up only a little time in making a statement. This is not a question at all similar to the question involved in a disposition of water power in the United States. The old Hawaiian Government leased a certain tract of Crown lands for a period of 30 years, which at the outset was not deemed of any value because of the water it contained. Shortly after the lease was made it was realized that the water upon the tract was of very great value for irrigation purposes; not particularly of value for power purposes and not contemplated at the time for use for power purposes, but of much greater value for irrigation purposes.

The lease was for a period of 30 years, and it expired in January, 1912. A bill was passed granting a right or an easement on this reservation set aside by Executive order to this company for the maintenance of reservoirs and ditches. Without the legislation, in January, 1912, they would have been trespassers—trespassers upon this military reservation. In the act that passed Congress there was placed a provision that any ditches that would be built would be subject to the right of the War Department so to regulate the construction that the reservation would not be impaired in usefulness for military purposes, and also that the United States should have sufficient water to provide for the military purposes of the reservation.

Because of the conditions placed in this grant of right of way this company now contends that the United States has given to it a grant in perpetuity of the surplus waters on the reservation estimated to be worth forty or fifty thousand dollars a year. If nothing be done, the company continues to get the benefit of water worth forty or fifty thousand dollars a year for nothing.

The War Department called the attention of the committee to the matter. Representatives of the company now in possession and enjoying this very desirable condition of affairs, and representatives of other interests in the Hawaiian Islands that are anxious to obtain the use of this water and are willing to pay for it and to compete for it, were given a very extended hearing before the committee. In view of the fact that this company is enjoying these rights without any claim other than the fact that they are in possession, without any legal title, and are enjoying the use of the water belonging to the United States, worth from $40,000 to $50,000 a year, the committee believed that it was imperative that something be done; that the United States be at least given the opportunity to obtain some returns for the use of the water belonging to it. So the committee, after very careful consideration and examination of the somewhat voluminous briefs, and after a hearing in which all the parties interested were given an opportunity to be heard, upon being notified that the War Department was proceeding to arrange to supply the necessary water for the reservation itself, decided that the fairest thing to do was to authorize the sale under sealed bids of the surplus water of this reservation. One company is in the enjoyment of the use of a valuable privilege, utilizing this water to irrigate valuable cane lands. Another combination of interests is anxious to get the use of the water in order to utilize other valuable cane lands. It seemed to the committee that the House should at least have an opportunity to determine whether it would enact legislation, properly guarded, which would permit these two interests to compete for the use of this water, rather than to have one set of these estimable gentlemen, because of the failure of Congress to take any action, continue to have the benefit of from $40,000 to $50,000 worth of water annually belonging to the United States.

The committee did not seek to initiate this matter. It was called to its attention by the War Department, which pointed out the situation. Representatives of the parties interested, some from the Hawaiian Islands, and attorneys in the United States competent to discuss the matter, appeared before the committee. The committee felt it their duty to present the matter to the House, so that the House might determine what should be done.

As to one thing the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has spoken of, there need be no alarm. Only very extensive interests can by any possibility utilize this water. All who are familiar with conditions in the Hawaiian Islands know that only by the investment of a very large amount of capital can the waters there be impounded and utilized for irrigation purposes. I recall one instance where $1,250,000 was expended to carry water 100 miles from one side of one of the islands to the other in order to make possible the production of cane upon what is now one of the largest plantations in the islands. If nothing be done at this session of Congress these gentlemen, who have no right, no grant, nothing but permission to maintain their reservoir until otherwise determined by Congress, will continue to get the benefit and use of all the water that is not taken by the War Department for the use of the United States itself. It is a very desirable condition for those enjoying that privilege. It seemed to the committee that the people of the United States had some interest in this matter, and that the proper thing to do was to place this privilege at auction and sell the right to use this water. There is no need to worry about making surveys before or after the sale. The only persons to whom the water is of value outside of the United States are thoroughly informed of the conditions. One of them has a dam which impounds all of the surplus waters that are not used by the United States, and the other gentlemen know now just how much it will be necessary to invest in order to utilize these waters in the event that they are successful in the competition. The committee simply desire that the House have an opportunity to determine whether the United States shall be compensated for the use of these waters or whether those now utilizing them shall continue to have this valuable privilege without any expense.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Has not the War Department full power at present to expel these trespassers from the reservation? I understood the gentleman to say that they were trespassers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. There was an act passed which gave them an easement to maintain their reservoir, and continues that right after the expiration of the lease. They had a lease from the Hawaiian Government made 30 years ago. That lease has expired. The legislation that was enacted gives a continuing easement unless Congress acts in some other way.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Is this an irrigation company that own the land to be irrigated, or do they sell the water to other people who own the land?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do both, I understand.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Then there is no limit to the amount that may be charged the other people. We are granting them a monopoly, are we not, if we pass this bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It can not be anything else. It must be a monopoly. The water flows down. The land along the line of the flow is entitled under the laws of Hawaii to a certain amount of water, and the lowlands are entitled to a certain amount of water. It can only be handled by one person or combination being in possession and distributing the water in accordance with the rights of the various parties.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. After having granted this monopoly ought not the Government, in the opinion of the gentleman from New York, to fix the rate that this company may charge? In Wisconsin we grant monopolies to electric-light companies and various other companies for municipal purposes. We also fix the rate——

Mr. SHERLEY. We do not grant any monopoly. The gentleman is mistaken in his assumption. There is no grant of a monopoly at all. The situation is this, that there is a company that has built a dam on its own property, impounding the waters that rise above, in the north and the south fork of this stream.

The south fork of the stream rises on Government property. They claim that, under the act of 1909, which gave them the right to run laterals and ditches on the Government land, they have been given a grant in perpetuity to the excess of water that rises in the south fork of the Government land. What we propose—not believing that they have the shadow of a title to that—is that the Government shall sell the surplus water on such terms as the War Department shall fix, not to exceed 25 years.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. Is there any provision in any law which gives the War Department or any other department of the Government the power to fix the maximum for rates that shall be charged for this water?

Mr. SHERLEY. This act itself does.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The situation is this: If nothing is done there is no restriction on what this company shall charge. It can charge anything it pleases and keep all the money. It takes the money for the use of the water that belongs to the United States. This simply proposes that the United States shall dispose of the surplus water. As a matter of fact, the water is practically all used by the persons who now have it.

Mr. MORSE of Wisconsin. In the opinion of the gentleman from New York, ought there not to be a provision in the bill which will permit the Secretary of War, or some other department of the Government, to fix the maximum rate that shall be charged for the use of the water?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We thought not, for the simple reason that the water is used most largely, if not entirely, for the irrigation of the property of the company itself. If other companies interested secure the control of the water they will divert it and take it to a different part of the island and utilize it in irrigating the very extensive tracts of land which they have.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not a fact that the plantation company now using the water is using all the water which it claims on its own lands for the purpose of irrigation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not quite certain about that, but I believe that is the situation.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman said a moment ago that he thought they were selling some of the water. I do not so understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. They are selling it all to another company. The other company is really owned by the same men. It is one investment, but there are two companies.

Mr. MONDELL. These people are using the water, as all irrigators do, irrigating their own land.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The water company is organized practically by the same individuals that have the land to be irrigated, and they sell the water to themselves, practically, and it is utilized in that way.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time has already been used?

Mr. MONDELL. And I would like 15 minutes to discuss the rule.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-six minutes have been used.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming. I wish to say before he begins that the committee went into the matter thoroughly, and that there was no division of opinion as to the necessity of having the House pass upon this matter.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the majority leader, called the attention of the House the other day to the evils of legislating on appropriation bills. We have before us a concrete illustration of the evils of that sort of legislation. If there is any excuse at all for legislating on appropriation bills, it must necessarily relate to that class of cases where the legislation relates directly or indirectly to items of appropriation. That is not true in this case.

This is a matter entirely separate and apart from any question of appropriation whatever. Furthermore, this rule which makes this legislation on an appropriation bill germane, under which it can be considered, amounts to a rule discharging a committee of the House that has charge of the subject matter, taking it away from that committee and placing the matter in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. Not only is this legislation separate and apart from any question of appropriation, but it is not an emergency matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is an emergency matter.

Mr. MONDELL. If it is an emergency, it is of the same character of the thousand and one questions that are before the House and that committees are considering; and if it becomes the province of the high and mighty Committee on Appropriations the moment it discovers in its ramblings through the avenues of legislation some matter that has not been passed upon by committee to proceed to appropriate it and discharge the committee, there is nothing in the domain of legislation that the committee might not proceed to take up. This is not legislation in any way remotely connected with any appropriation. It is in no sense an emergency legislation. There is no new condition. Here is a company that has been using the water a great many years under a lease from the Territory of Hawaii.

The time is approaching—I do not know the exact date—when that lease expires, or perhaps it has expired; but that does not present any condition of affairs necessitating the taking up by the Committee on Appropriations of this very important question of legislation. It can not be considered, in the nature of things, in connection with this appropriation bill with that care and consideration for all of the facts or factors involved that it would have if taken up in an orderly way by the committee having jurisdiction in the matter reporting a bill to be considered by the House in the due and proper course of business. It does seem to me that if we ever had a rule in the House thoroughly without justification putting legislation on an appropriation bill this is that rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to say that this is the first time that I ever heard the gentleman from Wyoming protest against legislation on an appropriation bill. I have been in the House 14 years. I have in my hand 298 pages of general legislation incorporated in appropriation bills during the past 14 years by Republican Congressmen. It is rather late in the day for the gentleman from Wyoming to become indignant over any such practice.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman does not pretend to say that it was a mistake to legislate in that way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A very large part of it was bad legislation.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman would not make the same mistake again, would he?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] seems to me to be proper. This is an important question. There are many features of it that can not be discussed in five minutes. It is a matter that should have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs, which has jurisdiction of water supplies to military reservations, or it should have gone to the Committee on Territories.

The officers of the War Department could have presented the matter to either one of those committees, and the matter could have been discussed at full length and a proper bill brought in here. The Territory of Hawaii claims that it has the right to any moneys growing out of the rental for the use of this water, and that is a claim that is not to be pushed aside offhand. The Delegate from the Territory of Hawaii sent a cablegram to the minority leader [Mr. MANN], which I propose to read at this time.

HONOLULU, July 27, 1912.

Hon. J. R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington:

Request you enter protest in my behalf against any legislation during my absence regarding surplus waters, Schofield Barracks, now proposed in deficiency bill reported by House committee. Annexation resolution and organic act, section 73, provide revenues from all public lands and appurtenances shall belong to Territory, except such parts thereof actually used by United States. Will you urge that any legislation affecting said waters be deferred this session in order that Territory may have further opportunity to present and have its claims recognized?

J. KALANIANAOLE,
Delegate from Hawaii.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know when the Delegate from Hawaii left Washington?

Mr. KAHN. I do not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know when the hearings were had upon this bill?

Mr. KAHN. I do not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman know that the Delegate's secretary was present during the entire hearings?

Mr. KAHN. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, the Delegate is in Hawaii at the present time, and he has heard from his own people.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the point. He had an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further. I do not know any of these things the gentleman has stated, but the Delegate has returned to his home. He has met his own people on their ground, and he has information from them which he believes the Congress of the United States should have, and he has sent a cablegram to the minority leader here asking that action be deferred until the Territory which he represents upon this floor can have an opportunity to be heard before the proper committees of this House. I do not think that that kind of a request is to be sneered at or whistled down the wind. It comes from a gentleman who represents an important Territory of the United States, and his people have the right to be heard.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The only question the Delegate is interested in is the disposition of the money paid for the use of this water.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; and the section as offered in the bill makes no provision for that whatever. It says the Secretary of War shall have the right to lease this water. It makes no provision for the payment of any money to the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I have only five minutes, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIS. Is the Territory of Hawaii getting any recompense whatsoever from the use of this water now, which is worth $40,000 a year?

Mr. KAHN. It is not getting any; but I daresay that the Delegate desires to offer a proposition from his people so that they shall receive some recompense. As a matter of fact, the water which is being used by this company is taken up by a certain sugar company, or 80 per cent thereof is. There is another sugar company that is trying to get this water, and if the lease for the taking of the water is made it is going to divert the water from its present watershed on the island over to another side of the island altogether.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from New York to yield me five minutes longer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, Mr. Speaker, we can discuss the merits of the proposition later.

Mr. KAHN. Very well. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If this rule be adopted, will amendments be in order under the rule?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand so. The intention of the committee was to give the House an opportunity to determine whether anything should be done in respect to this matter.

Mr. KAHN. And if the rule is adopted there is no disposition on the part of the committee to shut off amendments?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would think not.

Mr. PAGE rose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, much of the discussion that has taken place on the rule has been directed to the merits of the proposition contained in the bill. My observation as a Member of this House has been that complaints about legislation on an appropriation bill are governed entirely by whether or not the gentleman making the complaint wants the legislation, and I think that is true in practically every instance when a rule is presented to make in order legislation on an appropriation bill. As to the necessity or emergency, as to which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] said there was none, the whole question in my mind resolves itself into this proposition: Here is a water company in the island of Hawaii enjoying the use of water which belongs to the United States, valued, according to the testimony of officials of the War Department given before the Committee on Appropriations, at not less than $40,000 a year, and possibly $50,000 a year, beginning in January last at the expiration of an old lease which was entered into with the Territory itself, using it without compensation, the Government of the United States every year that this state of affairs shall exist losing at least $40,000. If that does not warrant some legislation to prevent a condition of that kind when the water is not only valuable to one party, but is worth that to the Treasury of the United States or, meeting the contention of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who read the telegram from the Delegate from Hawaii, to the Territory of Hawaii, one or the other, I should like to know what will. That water should not be turned over to a company that is now enjoying the right for nothing. I simply want to state this position in justification of the rule that has been brought, making this legislation in order on this appropriation bill.

Another question has been brought into this discussion. The statement was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the minority leader, that the Committee on Appropriations had no jurisdiction over this matter, so here we have the matter of a jealousy of committees, as to which shall legislate, while in the meantime the Treasury of the United States is losing a revenue that it should have. Whether this committee or that committee has jurisdiction is, in my judgment, a mere quibble.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as I remarked before, I know nothing of the merits of the controversy between the different parties. I have been long enough in the game to understand that on a matter of this sort if it is admitted to be worth $40,000 or $50,000 it is probably worth $150,000, and if there are only two parties interested under this proposition they will get together and probably pay one-half of what the gentleman estimates it is worth and one-quarter of what it is really worth. Under the provisions of this bill——

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. That is in the discretion, under the provisions of this bill, of the Secretary of War. We give him authority.

Mr. MANN. You authorize and direct him to make a lease in the manner herein provided for, which is to the high bidder. It has been stated by the gentleman there are only two persons who can bid. Does anybody doubt that there will be an arrangement between them without any upset price? Now, Mr. Speaker, I would be perfectly willing to have this matter taken up at any time in the House and study it, as far as I am concerned, in a place where we could have a roll call, but the gentlemen bring it in on an appropriation bill, considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where there can be no roll call and where gentlemen escape responsibility. In my judgment the responsibility is upon the adoption of this rule, and I give notice that until it is proclaimed the settled policy of Congress I shall demand a roll call upon every proposition to dispose of valuable water privileges.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not intend to say there can not be a roll call upon this amendment if adopted?

Mr. MANN. I pretend to say there can be no roll call upon this amendment; there can be a motion to recommit and strike out the provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the gentleman is not familiar with the rule. It was drawn purposely so that a roll call could be had upon this amendment, if adopted, if it was so desired.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not familiar with the rule. What is there in the rule authorizing a roll call in the committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will read it:

That in the consideration of the bill making appropriation to supply deficiencies, etc., and for other purposes, it shall be in order to consider the following provision as an amendment thereto.

Not to consider the provision in order in the bill, but it must be offered as an amendment.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; considered in the Committee of the Whole House, where there can be no roll call, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; there can not be. But when the bill is reported to the House——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I said you could have a motion to recommit and to strike out; I have already stated that to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me to remind him of something which he seems anxious to not let the House know——

Mr. MANN. That is unfair and not a true statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When the bill is reported to the House with the amendment a separate vote can be demanded upon the amendment and a roll call can be had upon the amendment, and I am sure the gentleman from Illinois knows that as well as any Member of this House.

Mr. MANN. But not upon an amendment of this amendment; not like an amendment to the consideration of a bill. We could get a roll call in that way, but you can not get a roll call upon the proposition to require that the Government shall have the right to regulate the charges. You can not get a roll call upon anything except on this amendment. The gentleman knows that perfectly well.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Anybody who is familiar with this matter will not for a moment suggest that it is a matter in which the question of regulating charges is at all involved, ingenuous as the gentleman's argument seems to be.

Mr. MANN. Very well; let it go. The gentleman is seeking to defend his committee by his specious argument. I am endeavoring to speak the facts.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, it was fortunate for the gentleman from Illinois that he began his remarks by saying that he knew nothing whatsoever about the merits of the case, because that may explain much that he said afterwards, because he is too clear a thinker otherwise to have made some of the statements which he has made.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have made no statement about the merits, except what were in the bill. I said I knew nothing about the controversy, and the gentleman is, as usual, a little unfair.

Mr. SHERLEY. Evidently the remark was pertinent, judging from the quick response that came from the gentleman, notwithstanding his statement a while ago that he was not at all sensitive. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] very pertinently said that the opposition to having this matter considered on an appropriation bill came from those who were opposed to the proposition itself, as will be disclosed both in the committee and on the roll call; and it is an old habit when we object to a thing to urge all the particular special pleading that is possible in order to delay it. Now, this matter presents this curious situation, which is a justification for action now, and that is that the failure to act by Congress is itself action in favor of the company which uses the water free of any payment, and every hour of delay that is had in the consideration of the matter is an hour of value to this company, and, naturally, they object to its being considered on an appropriation bill. If it had come from the Committee on Military Affairs, we would have had a declaration that only the Committee on Territories could have given it a full hearing, and if it had come from the Committee on Territories, that only the wisdom of the persons composing the Committee on Military Affairs could do justice to such an intricate subject. Now, the Committee on Appropriations did not go out of its way or hunt an opportunity to do this thing, though they might well have been justified in hunting the opportunity to save the money of the Government. The Department of War, having up the question relative to barracks and quarters, which comes regularly before the Committee on Appropriations, sent to the committee certain propositions in connection with this water proposition in order that Congress might indicate its policy, inasmuch as they were planning to build a dam and impound some of this water for the use of the barracks.

The matter was discussed at great length. I have never known any law case—and that is what this is, from the standpoint of this company—that was as fully or as patiently listened to as this. The committee in this case listened most patiently to the many, many learned lawyers that were employed to come before us and urge that the Government had no interest in this very valuable water. We spent an entire day in hearing them. They submitted briefs at length. The matter was considered diligently by the committee, and there was no division in the committee in regard to it. If I believed for one instant that these people are entitled to something that it is proposed here to sell, I would not favor this resolution. But I am not willing to becloud the Government's title, and I am not willing under specious pleas to delay action so that men can continue to get the usufruct of something that does not belong to them. [Applause.]

This is a matter that deserves action now. It has been as fully considered by the House to-day as it ever can be considered. If the Members of the House believe that the judgment of the committee is not well founded, vote down this resolution, but do not determine the matter by running away from it. It is for that reason that the committee has felt warranted in asking the consideration of this matter upon this bill. [Applause.]

Now, in regard to the Delegate from the Hawaiian Islands, this is no new matter. When the hearings were had here it was known by him that this question was up. I do not desire to criticize him, particularly in his absence, but it is asking a good deal to ask to delay the consideration of it in order that he may be heard. The delay does not help the Territory of Hawaii. It does not get a dollar now, and the failure to act by Congress will not give it a dollar for the use of this surplus water. If it be that the Territory has a claim to this money that comes from the sale of this water, that matter can be determined afterwards. But there is no reason why this company should be permitted to continue to use something without payment while we wait on the Delegate from Hawaii to determine when and how he desires to present the viewpoint of that Territory. For that reason we ask now the adoption of this rule and the consideration of the matter on its merits. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIMS). The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves the previous question on the adoption of the rule.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present, and a call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the resolution will, when their names are called, vote "yea"; those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 149, nays 67, answered "present" 13, not voting 160, as follows:

Mr. PALMER with Mr. HILL.

For the session:

Mr. FINLEY with Mr. CURRIER.

Mr. ADAMSON with Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota.

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. PALMER. I desire to withdraw my vote and to answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it. A quorum is present. The proceedings under the call are dispensed with. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The resolution is agreed to.

PAYMENTS FOR INJURIES TO CERTAIN GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims, disagree to the Senate amendments, and appoint conferees on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 24121, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. MANN. May we have the title of the bill reported?

The SPEAKER. It will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Is this the bill which came over this morning?

Mr. POU. It is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. POU, Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska, and Mr. HEALD.

DIXIE POWER CO., WHITE RIVER, COTTER, ARK. (H. DOC. NO. 899).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 20347, being a bill to authorize the Dixie Power Co. to construct a dam across White River at or near Cotter, Ark.

The White River, on which this dam is proposed to be built, is a navigable stream. In March, 1899, Congress adopted a project for the improvement of the navigation of the river from Batesville, Ark., upstream to Buffalo Shoals, by a series of 10 locks and dams. Of these, three have already been constructed by the Federal Government, and the Government is also engaged in improving the river by channel work in other portions. This bill proposes to authorize the construction of a dam at or near Cotter, a short distance above the portion covered by the aforesaid project of 1899, and situated well below Forsyth, Mo., which is generally considered to be the head of high-water steamboat navigation. The dam will increase the navigable capacity of the stream above it, and could be constructed so as to form a part of an extension of the above-mentioned projected canalization scheme below it. While the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors has, in a subsequent recommendation, advised against the present prosecution of this project on account of the lack of present commerce in the river, it is quite possible, according to the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, that conditions may so change in the future as to lead to an extension of the lock and dam system as far as the site of the dam proposed by this bill.

By a provision inserted into the bill since its introduction in Congress it is provided that upon the expiration of the Federal permit the dam shall become the property of the State of Arkansas at the option of said State. In my opinion, this provision is likely to introduce serious complications in the orderly development of navigation in the river. The lower river is being improved by a series of dams belonging to the Federal Government. This dam, situated in the upper reaches of the river, is, according to the report of the engineers, capable of becoming a part of this general Federal improvement of navigation. To introduce a diversity of title into a series of dams which may all become eventually a part of a single improvement directed at the same end would, in my opinion, be highly objectionable. Furthermore, the policy of this provision would seem to be in conflict with the policy of the general dam act of June 23, 1910, by which, at the expiration of such a permit, the control and title of such a dam apparently vest in the Federal Government, as pointed out in the recent final report of the National Waterways Commission, page 57.

The bill also fails to reserve to the Federal Government any right to receive from the grantee of this privilege any compensation therefor to be used in the interest of furthering the navigation of said river. This is a subject to which the National Waterways Commission has given much study and made urgent recommendations, and in regard to which the Secretary of War has, with my approval, written a letter, under date of July 30, 1912, to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives. In view, however, of the serious objection to the bill, contained in the provision which I have already discussed, I do not deem it necessary to enter into a discussion of this feature of the bill.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 6, 1912.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to refer the matter to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

PANAMA CANAL (H. DOC. NO. 900).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In my annual message of December 6, 1910, I recommended legislation directing the Executive to fix, within limits established by law, the rate of tolls for vessels using the Panama Canal. I then said:

> The present consideration of this question is necessary in order that the commerce of the world may have time to adjust itself to the new conditions resulting from the opening of this new highway.

In my message of December 21, 1911, I renewed this recommendation, and called attention to the fact that we are now near enough to the completion of the canal to make it imperatively necessary that legislation should be enacted to fix the method by which the canal should be maintained and controlled, and the zone governed.

National as well as international considerations urgently demand the prompt adjustment of those questions, and I therefore deem it my duty again to invite your attention to this subject, in order that the necessary provisions may be made before the close of the present session of Congress.

There are certain needs which must be satisfied at once if there is to be no delay in the opening of the canal and the utilization of it by commerce. These needs are—

(1) The organization out of the construction force of a permanent force for the operation of the canal and the government of the zone;

(2) The announcement of the maximum tolls which will be imposed upon the commerce of the world; and

(3) The establishment of adequate coaling and other marine facilities, such as dry docks and repair shops.

If the necessary steps toward these ends be taken, the great waterway can be thrown open to shipping before the close of 1913; that is, within 15 months.

The establishment of a permanent organization to operate the canal and exercise our control over the surrounding zone is vital. The manipulation of the locks and the machinery, the administration and maintenance of the canal, will require a force of about 2,500 men, most of whom will need special training in the performance of their duty. As fast as one part after another of the construction is now being completed the men, especially those with the most initiative, are returning to the United States to engage in other employment. It is plainly the dictate of foresight and economy to blend the present construction force into a trained force for permanent operation, instead of later going through the wasteful process of organizing a new force.

The establishment of maximum toll rates is another indispensable immediate need of the situation. In order that the canal may secure commerce against its competitors as soon as it can be handled, business must be given an opportunity to adjust itself to the new trade route; in order that they may make their calculations and build their ships, shipowners must know, about two years in advance, the maximum tolls which they are to be charged. We are already somewhat behind a safe margin of time in informing the commercial world of the proposed tolls, although, in anticipation of the appropriate machinery and in cooperation with committees of Congress, the War Department had been collecting data under expert direction as to the proper rates of toll and the formulation of working rules as to the basis on which they shall be fixed.

Finally, an indispensable factor in the success of the canal is the certainty to the shipping world of securing necessary coal and marine facilities at reasonable prices at the canal. The ability to recoal at the Isthmus, instead of carrying coal in ballast to the diminution of income-earning cargo, may be a decisive factor in the availability of the Panama route. The same is true of docking facilities. Such facilities can not be improvised, and express authority should be given at once in order to commence with the necessary construction.

Congress is now in possession of the fullest information necessary for immediate action in regard to these essential points. Fortunately, there is no serious controversy as to the policy which enters into either of them. The subject is, happily, outside of the sphere of party differences. The discussions and differences of opinion which have arisen as to other phases of canal policy should not, in my opinion, be allowed to delay action on these vital and pressing subjects, which are by their nature entirely distinct and severable.

I earnestly again invite your attention to these matters in order that the necessary legislation may be obtained before the coming adjournment of Congress, and in order that the great work which has been so successfully carried on thus far may not be marred in the hour of its completion.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 6, 1912.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4838. An act to amend section 96 of the act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, approved March 3, 1911;

S. 7163. An act authorizing the State of Arizona to select lands within the former Fort Grant Military Reservation and outside of the Crook National Forest in partial satisfaction of its grant for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions;

S. 7195. An act to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River; and

S. 7012. An act to permit the construction of a subway and the maintenance of a railroad under the post-office building at or near Park Place, in the city of New York.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 18642. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909;

H. R. 21952. An act for the relief of James S. Baer; and

H. R. 22195. An act to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 25970, the general deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912, and for prior years, and for other purposes, with Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as section 3 the following:

"The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to grant and lease in the manner hereinafter provided, for a period of 25 years, such surplus water of the United States within the limits of or pertaining to the military reservation of Schofield Barracks (Waianae Uka), island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, as may not be needed for the supply of the military post and troops on said reservation; and he is further authorized and directed to include in such grant or lease authority to the grantee or lessee thereunder to enter upon such reservation and make surveys thereon for and construct and maintain dams, reservations, canals, ditches, flumes, tunnels, and pipe lines for the purpose of diverting and conducting from the reservation the water covered by such grant or lease, at such places on said land as said grantee or lessee may select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War; and to include also the right to said grantee or lessee to take from the lands of the United States adjacent thereto, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, earth and stone necessary for such construction and maintenance: Provided, That said grant or lease shall be made to or entered into with the highest responsible bidder for such surplus water, under sealed proposal, after public advertisement of the terms and conditions thereof for a period of not less than 30 days in a newspaper or newspapers of general circulation published at Honolulu, in the Territory of Hawaii, such terms and conditions to be fixed by the Secretary of War when not inconsistent with the provisions of this section: Provided further, That the right to amend, alter, or repeal this section is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this is the provision which I have already explained in the House, when the question of adopting the rule was under consideration.

The committee believe that since the United States owns certain water upon this military reservation, it should be compensated for the reasonable value of the water used by others. In so far as the Territory of Hawaii is concerned, and the protests of the Delegate from the Territory against the enactment of any legislation at this time, I think the committee should bear in mind that the purpose of this legislation is to obtain compensation for the use of the water. If, as the result of future investigation, it be determined that under the terms of the treaty of annexation of the Territory of Hawaii and the organic act of the Territory, the returns from the disposition of the surplus water of this reservation should properly be converted into the treasury of the Territory, legislation can readily be enacted which will adjust any account existing between the Territory and the United States. If eventually it should be determined that the Territory is entitled to the moneys to be derived from the disposition of these surplus waters, it is to the advantage of the Territory to have compensation paid as speedily as possible for the use of the water. Since January of the present year to the present time, the company enjoying the use of the water has not paid for its use. There is no way in which it can be compelled to pay for the use of these waters during this period, and the longer it is deferred the greater will be the value of the use of the water enjoyed by the company.

A number of suggestions were presented to the committee by counsel representing the company now in possession of the water. It requested that a provision be inserted that no action be taken under this provision until all questions as to the rights of the United States to these surplus waters be determined in a competent court.

A very serious question arose in the minds of the committee as to whether under any existing statute there was any manner in which these rights could be determined. The committee believed that the wisest thing to do was to dispose of whatever rights the United States has in these surplus waters and leave to those competing the necessity or disadvantage of engaging in litigation.

Mr. Chairman, some attempt has been made to confuse the matter at issue here by the discussion of the provision regulating the charges to be made by the person or persons securing the right to these surplus waters. My recollection is that the water company now taking the waters has erected a dam. It sells this water itself to another company, consisting of practically the same individuals who are engaged in the cultivation of sugar lands. In that manner the returns of the water company can be regulated so as to show a not very great profit simply by adjusting the price it pays practically to itself for the water.

The War Department has gone into the matter very thoroughly and believes it to the advantage of the United States that action should be taken. I might add, Mr. Chairman, that this controversy arose through an exhibition of greed upon the part of the company that was somewhat remarkable, in view of the privileges it enjoys for nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the act of 1909, by which the water company got the right or easement to maintain the reservoir on the reservation, certain conditions were fixed. One was that it would furnish to the United States such water required for the military purposes so long as the reservation was occupied for military purposes. The War Department made a demand that the company furnish the water.

The company made reply that it was willing and ready to furnish the water at its dam as soon as the United States built the necessary flumes and ditches to avail itself of the readiness of the company to furnish the water. Then the department went into the matter more exhaustively and ascertained that the company had no rights, that it was merely occupying the reservation by the toleration of Congress, and that to take the water from the point at which the company was willing to supply it would result in a water supply that would be detrimental to the health of the garrison at the barracks. The committee determined that the wisest thing to do was to make arrangements to take over the water which the Government owned—whatever was adequate for the Government purposes—and to ask Congress to dispose of the surplus for the benefit of the Government. It seems to me, as it seemed to every member of the committee, that that was the only course open for the Government to pursue. For that reason this legislation was recommended.

I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by substituting the word "reservoirs," in line 6, for the word "reservation." It is a misprint.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that in line 6 of the amendment the word "reservoirs" be inserted in place of the word "reservation." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman numbers that section 3. Should it not be section 4?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Sections 3 and 4 went out on a point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to secure unanimous consent to discuss this important matter for about 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is along the same lines which have already been discussed.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not care to take the time of the House, and I would not if it was not of such far-reaching importance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have already occupied about an hour in the discussion of the matter.

Mr. MANN. That is the difficulty with this kind of a proposition in this kind of a bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I objected to taking it up under the rule, because it was difficult to get time to discuss its merits.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Perhaps we can arrange a time for discussion.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman said when we were discussing the rule that we might agree upon the time for debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time is wanted upon that side? One gentleman wants 15 minutes——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from New York think 15 minutes on a water-power proposition is too much?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not a water-power proposition.

Mr. MANN. It is not a hydroelectric water-power proposition. I think the gentleman from New York does not know what a water-power proposition is.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I do; I think I know what the common acceptation of the term is.

Mr. MANN. Well, if we can not get the time to discuss it, I shall have to make the point of no quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman want on that side?

Mr. MANN. I do not know.

Mr. MONDELL. I would like 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. There ought to be a reasonable amount of time for discussion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am willing to agree to a reasonable time on both sides; otherwise we will discuss it under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. Let us have an hour and a half, three-quarters of an hour on a side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Make it an hour.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from New York want any time on his side?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am willing to agree to a half an hour on a side.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York having talked for some time, will 40 minutes on this side and 20 minutes on that side be agreed to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will make it an hour and 10 minutes and give the gentleman from Illinois and that side 40 minutes. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that debate upon the amendment and all amendments thereto be limited to 70 minutes, 40 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois and 30 minutes by myself. I suggest to the gentleman that some arrangement be made about disposing of amendments.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how that can be done, but we will try not to consume time on amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto terminate in 70 minutes, 40 minutes to be under the control of the gentleman from Illinois and 30 minutes to be under the control of the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this means an hour and more is to be devoted exclusively to the discussion of the water-power question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. All this matter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Matters germane to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; this particular proposition.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would inquire what arrangement is made as to amendments. Some of us desire to offer amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That does not prevent the offering of amendments.

Mr. WILLIS. And we will have time to discuss amendments?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; but we will make it very brief.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think some arrangements ought to be made about amendments.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to say that I want to offer some amendments. I would not want more than 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand this debate is to cover debate on the pending amendment and all other amendments thereto.

Mr. MANN. That was not the request.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was what I intended to request.

Mr. CANNON. That was the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. I expressly stated that that would not include debate on amendments, but that I thought debate on amendments would be very brief after the general debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not so understand.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can we get some idea as to the number of amendments that are to be offered?

Mr. MANN. I am not aware of that and I can not tell.

Mr. WILLIS. I have two amendments that I desire to offer.

Mr. MANN. And I have two or three myself.

Mr. SHERLEY. Suppose we enter into an agreement that the amendments be now offered and be considered as pending, and then, if necessary, make the debate 10 minutes longer, and close the matter up. If we have general debate on the major proposition, and then have time on each amendment for debate, we would not finish to-night.

Mr. MANN. That does not seem to be a reasonable proposition, and certainly I would not undertake to control the time under such an arrangement as that.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will appreciate that this is the situation: This is a matter on which each person could talk 10 or 15 or 20 minutes, but when one person on one side has had that much time and another person on the other side has had the same amount, supposing they know their case, the whole thing will be presented. One might as well say that in an argument in a law case every attorney should have an hour, and run the thing for months. The whole proposition on both sides can be stated in 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. How long did the Committee on Appropriations work on this?

Mr. SHERLEY. The committee listened to a lot of lawyers waste an hour or more of time each, and the best speech made on the gentleman's side was made by Col. Hepburn, and he used only 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. How much time did the gentleman from Kentucky work on it?

Mr. SHERLEY. He worked a long enough time to have an opinion about the matter now as the result of that work.

Mr. MANN. And he does not want any of the rest of us to know anything about it. I expect it is safer not to let the information get before the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unless the time covers all of the amendments, I shall not consent.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may do as he pleases about consenting to it. If he does not desire to have the matter discussed I do not think he will make anything, so far as time is concerned. If the purpose of the gentleman is to prevent the discussion of the proposition, he can withdraw his request. I thought myself none of the gentlemen wanted to let in the light of day on the proposition. I judged when the rule was adopted that they would cut off debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the more light let in on this proposition the less defense or excuse there is for any Member to oppose what the committee proposes. We do not intend at this stage of the session to have half a dozen gentlemen ventilate their views on questions that are not relevant to this question. We are willing to make a reasonable agreement as to debate, and if gentlemen do not wish to accept that we will proceed under the rules of the House.

Mr. MANN. Having just adopted a rule for six hours of hot air, with no possible result, the gentleman now objects to debate of an hour on a real proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the gentleman was a party to the agreement under which an agreement was made for the six hours of hot air.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. I was not a party to any such agreement and I did not vote for the proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the request be submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto terminate in 70 minutes, 40 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can knock me down and drag me out, but not with my consent. I object. If gentlemen want to show they are afraid to debate the matter, let them go ahead. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-one Members are present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 25970, the general deficiency bill, and finding itself without a quorum he caused the roll to be called and that 205 Members had answered to their names, a quorum, and he reported herewith the list of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 25970, finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called and 205 Members answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the committee rose for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum was present in the committee; and that having been found, under the rules of the House, it is the duty of the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union automatically without action. The question, then, for the committee to determine is whether to rise.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and the committee will resume its sitting.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the Speaker rules upon the point of order, permit me to remind the Speaker this matter has been ruled upon a number of times in the past, and without any variation——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has any authorities the Chair will hear him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire also to make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair sustains that point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is now almost 5 o'clock, the usual time for adjournment.

The SPEAKER. Evidently the whole performance was dilatory—the raising of the point in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union itself—if the Chair had to pass on that——

Mr. MANN. The Speaker has no right to make that statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will retract it, then, and erase it. The Chair thinks that the motion to adjourn at this juncture is dilatory, and the committee will resume its sitting.

Accordingly the committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is manifestly impossible to debate the questions involved in the amendment before the committee in five minutes. It would be impossible to fairly state the case in five minutes, much less to argue it. It involves the entire question of the use of water, both under the old common-law rule of riparian rights and under the rule of appropriation. No more important question has been brought to the attention of Congress at this session, and we are to dispose of it after a five-minute debate on an appropriation bill. Briefly the facts are these: Many years ago the natives of Hawaii began the appropriation of water for their taro patches from the stream in question, and for generations these taro lands were irrigated from this stream. Later large sugar plantations were started along the borders of the stream, using the water for the purpose of irrigation and appropriating it for the purpose under the laws of Hawaii. Later the Government of the United States set aside a tract of public land toward the headwaters of the stream for military purposes.. The mere segregation of that tract of land for military purposes over which a stream flows, the Committee on Appropriations assumes, gives the Government the ownership of all the waters that flow over the land. If any such doctrine was ever uttered on the face of the earth before I can not recall ever having heard of it. Let us imagine that the Government should purchase a tract of land in the State of Pennsylvania for a military reservation over which flowed a very considerable stream. Would gentlemen say that the Government could peddle that stream out and sell it by the jug full without regard to the riparian rights of those who lived below? Say that this was to occur in the arid regions where the law of riparian rights does not apply and where the law of appropriation is the rule. Can the Government go into my State and by merely reserving a tract of land across which a stream runs set up the claim that it thereby becomes the owner of all the water that runs across that tract?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only five minutes, I am sorry to say. It is axiomatic with the Democratic Party always, on the eve of an election, to give us our opportunity. This time they went to far Hawaii to get it, and the Committee on Appropriations has lugged in here a provision which, if applied on the mainland or in Hawaii, would deprive every citizen of the United States of his right as a riparian owner in the East, and would deprive every irrigator of his rights as an appropriator in the West, if perchance the Government should purchase, or, it being public land, should reserve a tract over which waters flow. It is over 5,000 years since the Egyptian and Roman law of waters was laid down, and this Appropriations Committee proposes to turn back the rule of 5,000 years of civilized history. [Applause.] The proponents of this measure are afraid to refer the question of the rights of the Government to the courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, line 1, strike out the word "directed" and insert the word "empowered."

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment be adopted, and I shall have further opportunity to offer another amendment, I propose to offer an amendment which will make this provision that has been offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] conform to the recommendations of the Secretary of War.

The Secretary of War recommends not that he be directed, but that he be empowered to act; and further that there be given power to control or provide means of control for the readjustment of rentals, as is provided in the other amendment which I intend to offer.

Mr. Chairman, if this amendment, proposed by the gentleman from New York, can be amended in some such way as I have indicated, it seems to me it ought to be adopted. I have taken some little time to go over the hearings in this case, and, so far as I am able to determine, the company which is now using these water rights, which, according to the estimates of the Secretary of War, are worth $40,000 a year, has not any shadow of title to these water rights, and in that idea I am backed up by the opinion of the present Secretary of War, by the opinion of his predecesssor, Secretary Dickinson, and by the opinion of the Judge Advocate General.

It has been contended and will be contended that there ought to be inserted here a provision which would enable this company to establish its title. I assert it does not have any shadow of title. Why should the Government becloud its own title? The only claim that the company has, or that it possibly can have, is under the act of 1909, and if gentlemen will take the pains to read that act, which I shall insert in the RECORD, they will find not one single word about granting water rights to this company which is now enjoying those rights. Only a right of way is granted. Section 36 of the act of February 20, 1909, to which I have just referred, is as follows:

That the Wahiawa Water Co. (Ltd.), a corporation organized under the laws of the Territory of Hawaii for the purpose of irrigation, be, and is hereby, granted the right of way through the lands of the United States to the extent of the ground occupied by the water of the reservoirs and canals of said company and their laterals, and 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof, including that portion of the company's irrigation works located within the limits of the military reservation made by the order of the President July 20, 1899, setting aside a portion of Waianae-Uka, in the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii, and as published in the general orders of the War Department, No. 147, and dated August 10, 1899, and including also the right to take from the lands of the United States adjacent to the line of the canals earth and stone necessary to the construction thereof, the said reservoir sites, canals, and laterals, and waterways being now occupied under an outstanding lease from the former authorities of said Territory to said company and so recognized in said general orders: Provided, That the plans for the works herein proposed shall be submitted to the Secretary of War for approval, and shall be carried out in conformity to such regulations in respect to maintenance and operation as he shall prescribe: Provided also, That the servitude herein granted shall not prevent the movement of troops over the said right of way, and when the movement of field artillery and wagon trains is impeded or prevented, due to the use of gulches for water storage by said company, bridges suitable for the passage of troops, artillery, and wagon trains across said gulches, with suitable approaches thereto, shall be provided by said company when required by the Secretary of War, said bridges and approaches to be constructed in accordance with plans approved by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That during the occupation of said military reservation by troops the said company shall furnish, free of charge, all the water needed for post or encampment purposes, and in case an electric-power plant is erected by said company it will furnish power to the United States, if required, and if it be obtainable without interference with the irrigation supply, at not to exceed 1 cent per kilowatt-hour, measured at the dynamos.

It was contended in the hearings that because of certain provisos that are set out in Senate Document 789, this company was given claim to water rights, but as the Secretary of War found, upon careful investigation, that is not the case. I read from his report, or rather his letter on the subject, dated March 4, 1912, directed to the Hon. JOHN FITZGERALD, page 5 of this document. The Secretary of War says:

In regard to the request of the attorneys for the company—

Mind you, that is the company that is now enjoying the right, and which is opposing any legislation whatever—

Members should understand that if the committee or the House declines to act it really amounts to positive action. It amounts to saying that this company, which now is enjoying the right without paying a penny for it, shall be permitted to go ahead and enjoy that right without any authority being given to the Secretary of War to dispose of this right.

[Applause.]

In passing I might say, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], when he says that it has never been contended anywhere that the Government does own this water, that the Secretary of War does make that specific contention in his report. The Judge Advocate General of the Army also does make that specific contention in his report, and——

Mr. MONDELL. Which report of the Judge Advocate General does the gentleman refer to—his first or his last report?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. In just a moment. I do not know whether it is the first or last report of the Judge Advocate General. I have the report here.

Mr. MONDELL. In one report he said that the Government did not have the right to sell.

Mr. WILLIS. And in one he made the report that it did; the present Secretary of War so reported in his letter of March 4, 1912.

Mr. KAHN. His decision of September 20, 1909, was against that. The first opinion was rendered in July, 1909, and in September, 1909, he formulated an opinion that the Government had no right there, and that this company had rights there.

Mr. WILLIS. Document No. 600, embodying the report of the Judge Advocate General and the report of the Secretary of War, from which I propose to read, shows that——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, I suggest to the gentleman that, while everybody also admits the priority right of the taro lands, everybody also admits that after they have been supplied the Government did have the right to the surplus waters rising on these lands, and the lawyers on the side that the gentleman advocates contended that under the act of 1909 that right was conveyed by the proviso.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. By what right does the gentleman say "the side" I advocate?

Mr. SHERLEY. I was only undertaking to define the position the gentleman was on. I was not reflecting on the gentleman at all. I assumed that the gentleman was debating one side of this question.

Mr. MONDELL. I am merely insisting that the Government has not any right to peddle this water. I do not dispute the Government's right.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman voices the contention of the people who, in claiming the right to the water, deny that the Government has any right to control it; the people who assert that they have rights without paying for them.

Mr. WILLIS. The fact is that those who appeared before the committee, according to the printed hearings, and opposed the passage of any bill, admitted by their very argument that they thought the Government did have the right to this water, and they claimed that under the act of 1909 the right was granted to them without a single word being in the act that pretended to grant any water right.

It was simply a right of way. But I was diverted from what I started to say. I want to make clear the position taken by the present Secretary of War here, and I read from his statement, on page 5, House Document 600:

In regard to the request of the attorneys for the company that any legislation having in view the disposition of the surplus water of this reservation should provide for the determination of the rights of said company under said grant by judicial procedure, as I am firmly convinced that no water rights passed to the company under said grant, I am unable to recommend any such provision. I see no reason why the Government should take action which would tend to cloud a clear title and would, moreover, delay the establishment of waterworks which would insure an adequate supply of water of this post for military purposes, the necessity for action looking to the establishment of such works being urgent.

It may be further added that this case presents no ground for the consideration of the claims of the company on equitable rather than legal grounds. So far as appears from the papers the reservoir, canals, and their laterals had already been constructed when the grant for a right of way therefor was made; and no expenditure appears to have been made by the company on the faith of the construction contended for by its attorneys which would make the insistence by the Government on the strict construction of the grant inequitable. As to the burden imposed on the company by the proviso, the company insisted on a strict construction of its obligations in this regard, i. e., that as the proviso only required the company to furnish the water and did not impose on it any obligation to deliver the water where required for the uses specified, it was under no obligation to deliver the water where required for military purposes. For this reason, as well as for the other reasons given above, the company has not been called upon to furnish any water under this proviso, and it is not contemplated to require any in the future.

In Senate Document 789, page 4, Secretary Dickinson says:

The bill as originally introduced (H. R. 16374, 60th Cong., 1st sess.), was entitled "A bill to confirm to the Wahiawa Water Co., of Hawaii, the right of way for irrigation purposes," and it purported to deal merely with the right of way for the maintenance of the reservoirs, canals, and their laterals on the reservation. Provisos were added, at the suggestion of the War Department, as follows:

"Provided, That the plans for the works herein proposed shall be submitted to the Secretary of War for approval, and shall be carried out in conformity to such regulations in respect to maintenance and operation as he shall prescribe: Provided also, That the servitude herein granted shall not prevent the movement of troops over the said right of way, and when the movement of Field Artillery and wagon trains is impeded or prevented, due to the use of gulches for water storage by said company, bridges suitable for the passage of troops, artillery, and wagon trains across said gulches, with suitable approaches thereto, shall be provided by said company when required by the Secretary of War, said bridges and approaches to be constructed in accordance with plans approved by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That during the occupation of said military reservation by troops the said company shall furnish, free of charge, all the water needed for post or encampment purposes, and, in case an electric power plant is erected by said company, it will furnish power to the United States, if required, and, if it be obtainable without interference with the irrigation supply, at not to exceed 1 cent per kilowatt hour, measured at the dynamos."

It is contended by the company that these provisos give the act an entirely different character; that as thus amended the act deals with and, in effect, alienates to the company the water rights appurtenant to the reservation, subject only to the right of the Government for post and encampment purposes. In other words, it is contended that the grant of the right of way, coupled with the provisions calling for the furnishing of water to the military reservation, conferred upon the company, by necessary inference, the right to all the waters, except such as might be diverted in compliance with the provisions of the act itself. It is further claimed on behalf of the said company that the diversion of any of such waters elsewhere by Government authority, after the Government's declared uses have been fully served, would be inconsistent with a fair interpretation of the act; that these waters supply the irrigation needs of agricultural users, including the supplying of the irrigation needs of the Waialua plantation, wherein approximately $7,000,000 have been invested for the production of sugar cane, and the operation of which with only a reasonable profit has been made possible thereby; and that the grant of the water rights to others would inflict a great loss and hardship upon the company.

As stated above, the bill originally introduced purported to "confirm" an existing right of way to this company, and the measure as passed in terms covers only a right of way for certain existing reservoirs, canals, and their laterals within the limits specified, and confers no authority upon the grantee to construct new laterals, etc., for the purpose of controlling the entire water supply of the reservation. Legislative grants are to be construed strictly and as passing nothing against the Government except what is expressly included within the terms of the grant. (See Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet., 420, 543–550; Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S., 659, 666; Slidell v. Grandjean, 111 U. S., 412, 437; Coosaw Mining Co. v. South Carolina, 144 U. S., 550, 562.) Under this rule of construction and having in view the fact that there is nothing in the language used which purports to grant to the company any water rights of the Government on this reservation, my opinion is that no such rights passed under the grant. I do not think that the provision that the grantee should furnish the United States, free of charge, with all the water needed for post and encampment purposes and power at the rate specified therein would change the character of the grant. Attention was further called to the fact that the right is claimed under a proviso. The office of a proviso is not to grant, but to limit a previous grant. Unless the construction necessarily requires it, the proviso will not be construed as a granting clause. (Minis v. U. S., 15 Pet., 423, 445; Patterson v. Winn, 11 Wheat., 380, 388; Chicago v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 126 Ill., 226; 18 N. E., 668; De Graff v. Went, 164 Ill., 485, 492; 45 N. E., 1075, 1077; State v. Twin City Telephone Co., 104 Minn., 270; 116 N. W., 835, 837; State v. Bellew, 86 Wis., 189.)

The present arrangement with the Wahiawa Water Co. (Ltd.) is unsatisfactory, for the reason that the proviso of the act of February 6, 1909, supra, is vague in regard to the purposes for which the water shall be furnished to the Government, and also because the act only requires the company to "furnish" the water, resulting in the company taking the position that it is not under any legal obligation to deliver the water where required for the uses specified, and because the company is claiming rights under the act against the Government which, in my judgment, were never intended to be granted.

In his memorandum for the Chief of Staff on February 27, 1912, the Judge Advocate General says:

The rights acquired by the Wahiawa Water Co. under said act of Congress were very fully considered in the report of the Secretary of War, dated January 19, 1911, to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs (S. Doc. No. 789, 61st Cong., 3d sess.), and it was held therein that under the grant the water company acquired simply a right of way for certain existing works—reservoir, canals, and their laterals—within the limits specified; that no right was given to construct new laterals, etc., for the purpose of controlling the entire water supply of the reservation; and that no water rights of the Government on this reservation passed to the company under the grant, as grants of this character are construed strictly in favor of the Government and as granting no more than is expressly stated.

Further on in this memorandum the Judge Advocate General states:

I am therefore of the opinion that the matter should be submitted to Congress, with a request for such legislation as will authorize the Secretary of War to grant leases for the use of the surplus water of this reservation, at such rates and on such terms and conditions, and for such periods of time, not to exceed 20 years, and with such provision for the periodical adjustment of rentals as he may deem just, equitable, and expedient; and for the occupation of such lands of the reservation in connection therewith as he may regard as necessary for the construction and maintenance of works for the purpose of diverging and conducting from the reservation water covered by such lease or leases; such legislation to provide that the proceeds shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts; and a statement thereof shall accompany the annual report of the Quartermaster General. In making such a lease consideration could be given to any equitable claims which the Wahiawa Water Co. (Ltd.) may have to preference in the lease of any water which the Government may not need for the supply of the post.

There appears to be no reasonable doubt that the Government will have some water to dispose of, and legislative authority should be obtained to lease the same for a considerable term, in order that the water may be disposed of to advantage.

In other words, the present Secretary of War, his predecessor, and the Judge Advocate General make perfectly clear in these documents from which I have read that the Government of the United States owns the water right, which, according to the report of the Army engineers, is worth $40,000 per year, and which, if no action is had, the company will continue to use absolutely without compensation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said what I have in order to make clear, if I can, this proposition: First, that the Government owns this water right; second, that the present company that now is using it absolutely without compensation does not own a thing, except a mere easement or right of way, and has no shadow of title whatever to any water rights. If that is the case, the only sensible proceeding is to adopt some sort of a provision here which will enable the Government, fairly and in the open market, to dispose of that which belongs to it and to break up the monopoly that now exists in this particular case. However, I am not in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] unless we can have the two amendments adopted to which I have referred. I am not in favor of a proposition which will absolutely direct the Secretary of War to make the sale. The Secretary of War should have some discretion. As was suggested here by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], there might be collusion among the bidders. It seems to me the word "empowered" ought to be inserted there in place of the word "directed." Nor am I in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York unless the other amendment which I shall offer can be adopted, so as to give to the Secretary of War the right to regulate rentals. In disposing of these water rights we must protect not only the rights of the Government, but the rights of the consumers.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman from Ohio have two minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the request?

Mr. MANN. I asked that the gentleman from Ohio have two minutes more, and the gentleman from New York objected. The gentleman from New York is not very courteous to-day. I desire to be recognized in my own right.

I merely wished to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he thought his amendment would make it discretionary with the Secretary of War? As I understood, his amendment was to strike out the word "directed" and insert the word "empowered."

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman is correct. I am frank to say that the purpose of my amendment is to make it discretionary with the Secretary.

Mr. MANN. I will suggest to the gentleman, then, that the addition of the word "empowered" gives no additional authority. If the gentleman will move to strike out the words "and directed" and insert in place of those words the words "in his discretion," so that the provision will read:

The Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to grant—

That will accomplish the purpose which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. WILLIS. That is exactly what I wanted. I only adopted the language used by the Secretary of War in his recommendation.

Mr. MANN. We usually consider that the words "in his discretion" are necessary, because where Congress provides that the department has certain power that is usually considered as mandatory. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his amendment in that way.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment as indicated, so that it will read "is authorized in his discretion," striking out the words "and directed."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Ohio that his amendment now reads that the word "empowered" be inserted in place of "directed," in line 1, on page 60. There is no page 60 in the pending provision.

Mr. WILLIS. I referred to the printed bill. I desire this to be inserted in line 1 of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], and I desire to have the amendment which I am offering read as follows:

Strike out the words "and directed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in his discretion."

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his amendment, and he proposes another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1 of the amendment strike out the words "and directed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in his discretion," so that it will read: "The Secretary of War is authorized, in his discretion, to grant."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] does not make the legislation any better. The gentleman from Ohio has disclosed a curious state of mind with regard to this water right. The gentleman is cocksure that the Government, by reason of its ownership of a few acres of land toward the head of the stream, owns all of the water in the stream. He is equally sure that people who own great quantities of land riparian to the stream, and who have used the water of the stream for many years, have no claim whatever to the water they have so used. His philosophy evidently is this: That water may be enjoyed by riparian owners and used by appropriation for irrigation for generations, and then some one may locate at the head of the stream, and by so doing become proprietor in fee of all the water which has been used by the people below; and he feels sure of that because he has the high authority of the Secretary of War.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I know he does not want to be unfair.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not unfair.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman is not unfair, but the statement he is making is. Nobody is contending but that the people that own the taro lands have the right to as much water as is necessary to irrigate them. This proposition contemplates that the surplus only shall be sold.

Mr. MONDELL. He says everybody has admitted, which in this case means the War Department—the high and mighty War Department. When was the War Department constituted the judicial tribunal for the settlement of the water rights in the Territory of Hawaii?

The War Department says they may use 4,000,000 gallons each 24 hours on the taro lands, which means 6 cubic feet of water per second. Six cubic feet of water per second in Hawaii on lands growing cane or taro, which must be submerged, will irrigate about 200 acres. Here is a stream 12 to 15 miles long with taro lands on both sides, and the War Department constitutes itself the court to settle the water rights and says that the taro lands, the riparian lands for 10 miles or more, may have water enough to irrigate 200 acres, and no more. The fact is, however, that this bill gives no assurance that even those rights will be protected or respected.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. Does the gentleman know that the testimony before the committee shows that the taro lands are only 205 acres in extent?

Mr. MONDELL. I did not know that, but it proves I have figured accurately as to what amount of water they use for irrigation per acre. Evidently the 4,000,000 gallons was based on the taro lands, and did not take into account at all the hundreds of acres of cane lands which have been irrigated for years.

I do not know what rights this company has, and no man here knows definitely what rights the company has or what are the rights of the riparian owners along the stream, nor what rights the Territory of Hawaii has, and yet we are called upon to assume that the Government of the United States in one of its Territories, by the simple segregation of land reserved for military purposes, can become the owner of a large quantity of water as a property right, a thing that is not tolerated in any civilized country on earth, whether it be the land of riparian rights or the land of irrigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have been interrupted several times, and I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to put this proposition squarely. Now, my friend from Iowa has a great military post which, I presume, is on the Des Moines River. Does the Government of the United States own the Des Moines River by reason of the fact that it has lands upon its banks for military purposes?

Can it stop the flow of the Des Moines River and sell it out by the jug full and become that meanest of all things under the dome of heaven—a water lord? That is what you are proposing here. You are proposing to take away from the courts of Hawaii the opportunity to decide the relative righs of the riparian owners and appropriators and to say that the Government may become what you do not allow anyone under your national irrigation law to become. This House has placed itself on record on the question of water rights where water can be diverted for irrigation, and it is declared in the national reclamation law that beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right to the use of water. The War Department, by the reservation of these lands, has the right to use all the water that it needs on these lands for all purposes and no more. It does not own the surplus there any more than John Jones would own the surplus if he were there instead of the War Department.

I do not pretend to say who has the right to the use of this water. I know that this House can not afford to put itself on record to the effect that the Government as a landowner can do what no other riparian owner can do; that it can, in a land of diversion, do what no individual can do, to wit, become a water lord and claim the right to peddle out the water. It is a thing that civilization has fought against since the beginning of time.

Under the laws of Hawaii the people of Hawaii own these waters. The Government of the United States has no proprietary interest in them. As the proprietor of these lands it has the right to all the water it needs for itself in the use of the military reservation, but it does not become the proprietor of that water so that it can dispose of it and become the Providence to the landowners below on the stream.

In my opinion, if the truth were known, it would be found that the War Department has not of its own motion taken up this matter, but underneath it all is the fine Italian hand of some people who hope to blackmail those who have been engaged in irrigating land and raising crops on the land so irrigated. That is the worst this company has been doing. If they have not the right to the use of this water, let the question of the ownership of the water be settled in the courts. It is not for us to assume that the water belongs to the Federal Government in the sense it can levy heavy burden on those who use it for irrigation. We endeavored to secure time for the consideration of this measure but were denied it, and can not secure time to even state the case. If the principle involved in this legislation is generally adopted, no appropriation for irrigation in the West is safe; no riparian owner in the East is secure. The vicious theory that one can own water as a property right apart from its beneficial use is established.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate on the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to close debate on the pending amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2 of the amendment, after the word "provided," insert the words: And with such provision for the periodical readjustment of rentals as he may deem just, equitable, and expedient.

Mr. MANN. Where does that amendment come in?

Mr. WILLIS. After the word "provided" in the printed bill, line 2. Mr. Chairman, this is the language that is suggested by the Secretary of War. In my judgment, it is necessary in order to protect the rights of those who are to purchase water from this company. It seems to me we ought to adopt some proposition to protect the rights of the consumer.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not understand by the word "rentals" that it means the price for which the water shall be sold to individual users, but only the price that it shall be sold to the successful bidder?

Mr. WILLIS. I understand, in the plan outlined by the Secretary of War, that he was talking about the rentals from the direct purchasers from the Government. But in my judgment, as I have introduced the amendment, if it should be adopted, it would apply to the question of rentals paid by the consumers of the water.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is clearly mistaken, and that is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not understand the difference in the provision as reported from the committee and the recommendation of the Secretary of War, or he would not offer this amendment. The recommendation of the Secretary of War from which the language of the gentleman is taken was that the Secretary of War be authorized to grant a lease of the surplus waters, and provided that the lease should contain provisions for the periodical readjustment of the rents to be paid by the lessee to the Government. The provision offered as an amendment by myself, which was the provision determined upon by the committee, was that the right to the surplus waters should be sold under sealed bids to the highest bidder. The committee can see how absolutely impossible it is for a person to submit a bid for the use of waters for a period of 25 years, if at the end of 10 years some one is to have the right to modify his rental. The purpose of the committee was to give the prospective bidder a sufficient period of time within which he might erect the necessary work and arrange for the amortization of his expenditures, and know how much he was to pay during that period. The purpose of the Secretary of War was not to have bids submitted in a sealed form, but to enable him to negotiate with prospective bidders and to provide for a definite rental for the first 10 years, and have a provision that after the first 10 years the department might modify, within certain limits, the compensation to be paid. They are two entirely distinct propositions. If the Secretary is to be given authority to lease to whomever he may select, the gentleman's provision would be proper, because at the end of 10 years the water might be of so much more value that whoever would be the lessee would properly be requested to pay an additional rental; but if bids are to be invited and prospective purchasers are to submit a bid stating what they are willing to pay for this water, and then there is to be a provision that after he has offered, under sealed proposals, the highest price he is willing to pay, at the end of a certain period of years the Secretary of War can compel him to pay more, there will be no bidders at all, and the water will continue to be used by the persons who now have it.

One of two things should be done—either the water should be sold under sealed bids to the highest bidder or else the Secretary of War should be given discretion to negotiate with whichever one of these parties he determines it is best to negotiate with, and to arrange the terms of the lease with the right to rearrange the rental. This provision has nothing to do with rentals to be paid by other users of the water.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman desires more time, I would be glad to ask unanimous consent that it be granted to him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I have no desire for more time.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no more time. The gentleman can take the floor in his own right.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy any considerable amount of time, but I understand perfectly the difference between the proposition of the Secretary of War and the proposition made by the committee. I am not confusing the two at all, but it seemed to me, and still seems to me, after listening with great care to the explanation made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that unless this amendment or some such amendment shall be adopted there is no power residing anywhere in any branch of the Government to protect the consumer of the water.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The consumer of the water will be the purchaser under the lease, and no one else will use the water.

Mr. WILLIS. That may be true or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no question about it. Nobody will purchase this surplus water who is not in a position to utilize it on land. Of course, at present the water company disposes of it to another company; but the other company consists of the same persons, and they use the two companies so to juggle the profits from the water company and the sugar company that the earnings of neither company will ever be so excessive as to invite the attention of the taxing power of the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that even from his standpoint the amendment he has offered will not accomplish its purpose. The power to adjust rentals does not mean, as the gentleman seems to think, the power to determine the price at which the water shall be sold to the ultimate consumer, assuming he is a different person from the lessee, but it simply means that every 10 years the right in the Government shall exist to fix the terms of the lease to the successful bidder under the bid. I suggest to the gentleman that there is language in that act that is as broad as skill can draft, for the purpose of giving to the Department of War full control.

Mr. WILLIS. Where is that language? That is what I am looking for.

Mr. SHERLEY. Very well. The gentleman will find it in the latter part of that act, and with the drafting of it I had something to do. The language is, "upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of War may determine."

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will find the language in line 22 of page 60 of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, it was my object not to undertake in this short way to pass upon all of these various conflicting ideas as to the length of lease and its terms, and so forth, but to give to the War Department full power, and to take action to prevent this company continuing to use water for nothing.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, just a word, and I will yield the floor. I have no doubt that the gentleman had that purpose in mind, but I do not find the language, Mr. Chairman, in this amendment which was offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that would accomplish the purpose indicated. What I am trying to get is a power to reside somewhere—in the Secretary of War, for example, as proposed in my amendment—to protect the ultimate consumer of this water; and if you do not have in here some provision of that kind, if you pass the bill, this is what you will have done: You will have created an absolute monopoly in this company for 25 years, with no power reserved to the Government to regulate rates for the protection of the consumer. The gentleman says it is all one and the same company. If that is true, if the water is not going to be sold to anybody else, then this question I have been suggesting will never come up, and the Government will not be called upon to exercise this reserved power, even if this amendment be adopted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Personally I have no objection to the provision giving to the Secretary of War the right to regulate the rentals charged by the purchaser, but if the pending amendment be adopted there will be no bids, because nobody will submit sealed bids to pay for the use of this water for a period of 25 years if the right is reserved to some official to increase that rate periodically.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to say one word in conclusion. It seems to me the adoption of this amendment is absolutely necessary to protect the rights to the consumers. If you pass the bill without this, there is no protection to the purchasers of water.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The provision to which the gentleman calls attention was not included to protect the ultimate consumer, but for the purpose of adjusting the compensation between the purchaser and the Government.

Mr. WILLIS. I understand that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment to the amendment will be approved by the House. The matter of the grant of water-power rights, as well as that of granting the water itself, is one of the questions that this House must shortly deal with and in a serious mood. I have observed that our friends upon the other side have been bringing in bills during this session granting rights to individuals and to water-power companies concerning the use of water in streams over which the Government assumes control, without public advertisement and without limitation or provision for compensation for the use of such water or water power whatever.

Now, if we were dealing with a franchise in a country community and a borough council had to consider the problem, it would probably require public advertisement of the proposed franchise with the view of getting something out of it for the people.

It is commonly believed that the United States has a property right not only in the water power derived from navigable streams, but in the use of the water itself, and it is wise that an amendment such as this should be added to any bill which proposes to dispose of water or water rights belonging to the Government or with regard to the use of water power over which the Government has control.

In the Philadelphia North American, on July 26 last, appeared an article which the Democrats who are fathering these measures in the House might well read and ponder over. It did not deal with the grants of franchises in Alaska to corporations or to millionaires. It dealt with the grant of rights in certain Democratic States where it was proposed to take control of water power and leave out of consideration altogether the matter of compensation or remuneration to the public for the privileges accorded.

Merely to show the trouble that is brewing with regard to these bills, and for the information of gentlemen upon the other side, I read these headlines from the North American of July 26 last:

Democrats help grabs of water-power sites; people's rights ignored. No compensation is required of Arkansas concern for vaulable grant; free gifts planned for 16 other companies. Reactionary majority in House plays into hands of trust; attitude is that those who protect public are dreamers.

I desire, further, to read one paragraph from the article for the information of the House:

The opening wedge for wholesale grants of water-power rights to electric companies without compensation to the people or restriction of any kind was driven in the House of Representatives to-day.

With the Democratic leaders opposing compensation and other conservation policies, the House put the final seal of approval on a water-power grant of incalculable value to the Dixie Power Co., which proposes to construct a dam across the White River near Cotter, Ark. The action was taken on a conference report, the Senate having amended the House bill so as to provide that the State of Arkansas could regulate the rates of compensation charged for the electric energy developed.

There was no mention in the bill to which this article refers of the rights of the consumer, no reservation as to time or rates, but a simple grant to the company to do, so far as this Congress is concerned, substantially as it pleases. In other bills——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio was designed in his mind, in the first place, to cover rentals of water power for the users of water who may purchase it. I think the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Kentucky were correct in the assumption that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, inserted where it comes in, would only cause a readjustment of the rentals to be paid by the concern purchasing the right from the Government, but I find there is nothing in the bill or amendment on the subject of an adjustment of the amount to be paid by the users of the water power; how much of this power is used by the company, either directly or indirectly, which now has the right, and how much of it is sold to other concerns?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My impression is that it is probably all used by the company, although not directly, through another organization, which is controlled by the same people.

Mr. MANN. I remember I happened to be one day in the Committee on Appropriations for a few moments when this was under discussion, and I heard this question asked, I think by the gentleman from New York, and my recollection does not accord with his as to the reply. Of course I have not gone into it, and I do not know anything about it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I may add, so far as the committee is concerned, it will have no objection to an amendment which gives to the Secretary of War, or any other official of the Government, the right to regulate the price to be charged by the purchaser of this surplus water.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was the intention to give power to deal with all of these matters, and I think that the language plainly does it, because, in substance, it says upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of War may deem fit, not inconsistent with the provisions of this section.

Mr. MANN. Let me suggest to the gentleman that I inserted in the original dam act a provision authorizing the Secretary of War to impose such conditions as he might please before he approves the specifications for the dam, and I insisted to the Secretary of War and to the then President, Mr. Roosevelt, that he had the power to regulate the charges which should be made, and that under that provision he could require them to pay rental in addition. I have not yet been able to persuade the War Department that they had that power, and if they do not think they had it in that case, I do not think they would think they had it in this.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman was right in his construction then, but I am perfectly willing that there be included here any proper language that the gentleman may suggest. But how that language could be construed otherwise, I can not understand.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest this to the gentleman on that point: If it be true that this water power is all to be used by the purchaser from the Government, or most of it is to be used by the purchaser from the Government, I am not at all sure but that there ought to be a provision put in there authorizing the Secretary of War to fix the rates at which it can be sold, because we are selling our power now, and it may be that we would not get nearly as good a price for it if perchance the Secretary had the authority to cut down the price at which it could be sold to a lower rate.

We are in the position of offering something, as the gentleman says. I do not see the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in the Chamber at present to contradict the statement that we own and are offering to sell something under this to the highest bidder, and ought to offer it on the terms that will be best for us.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. I inadvertently overlooked the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, after looking at the record, that I find my recollection is correct. The contention is that there are 500 acres of taro lands controlled by this company. They claim that it would take in excess of 6,000,000 gallons daily.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that the debate on the pending amendment be closed.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will give me five minutes to discuss this particular amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest to the gentleman that he can talk on the next amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. I demand the regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I insist on my motion.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that debate on the pending amendment be closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 27.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. MANN and Mr. FITZGERALD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 24.

So the motion to close debate on the pending amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2 of the amendment, after the word "provided," insert "and with such provision for the periodical readjustment of rentals as he may deem just, equitable, and expedient."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, however, That no waters shall be disposed of under the foregoing authority now used by others under claim of right until such claims have been finally adjudicated upon their merits in the courts of competent jurisdiction in favor of the United States. Such claimants to have the benefit of this provision only upon filing with the Secretary of War, within 90 days after the passage of this act, a bond of indemnity in an adequate amount and with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of War, conditioned upon the payment to the United States of the full rental value of all waters used or consumed by such claimant from the 14th day of January, A. D. 1912, to the date of such final adjudication. And conditioned, further, upon the institution, as soon as practicable, of litigation to adjudicate such conflicting rights or claims and to prosecute the same diligently to final judgment."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal this afternoon about the appropriation of this water by the water company that is now using it. That company obtained its right during the days of the kingdom in Hawaii. It paid $750 a year in rentals to the kingdom of Hawaii for this valuable right.

Soon after the Government of the United States came into possession of the islands this company expended something like $335,000 for the construction of a dam 80 feet high for the purpose of impounding the water and its distribution to the users below. The right that it held was to expire in the early part of January of this year. Along in 1909 the company began to negotiate with the officers of the United States for a renewal of such right as it had, in order that it might continue the impounding of the water. I may say that the dam is on the company's own land. About that time Col. Anderson, who was in command in the islands, submitted a report to the War Department suggesting that the company be allowed to use this water upon certain conditions. One of the conditions was that the Government be furnished free of charge all the water it might require for military purposes, and also that the Government should be supplied with such hydroelectric power as it might need at actual cost. Another condition was that the company was to construct bridges across ravines, chasms, and canals, so that the land might be available for the use of troops in case of maneuvers.

So far as Schofield Barracks are concerned, nobody knows at this day whether the War Department intends to continue that as a military post. I was in Hawaii a year ago, and there was considerable question at that time as to whether Schofield Barracks would continue to be maintained as a military post. The cost of transporting supplies from Honolulu is quite expensive, and I believe there has been a recommendation that the permanent barracks be established nearer the seaboard toward Honolulu.

The gentlemen have stated that this company gets the water for nothing. Under the provisions of its grant it was to furnish free to the Government the amount of water that might be necessary for military purposes at Schofield Barracks.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated on the floor that it was the greed of these people that brought this matter to a head. The company contended that under the provisions of the act of Congress of 1909 they were only compelled to furnish the water at the dam, but in all fairness the gentleman should have added that subsequently they agreed to put in a reservoir on the military reservation at an expense of $200,000. They agreed to go to the headwaters of this stream and to furnish the military barracks with all the water that might be required for military purposes free of charge. They agreed to do all the things that were required of them under the terms of the act of 1909.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was after the War Department decided that this water right should be put up at auction, if it could be, so as to get what this water is worth to the United States. They never offered to do it before that.

Mr. KAHN. I want to be perfectly fair in the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, we can all afford to be fair in this matter. As has been stated by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], this question of water rights, and especially the right of the Government of the United States, because it happens to own some land on a stream, to appropriate all the water that it does not use for its own purposes and sell it, is a big and important question, in which all the people of the United States are vitally interested.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I should like to yield to the gentleman, but I am afraid I can not get any more time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nobody suggests that the United States wants to do what the gentleman says. It admits certain rights to the water.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, but the very purpose of this act is to do the very thing which I suggest. Now, as far as the position of the War Department on this question is concerned it has backed and filled, faced front, and faced back on several occasions.

In July, 1909, the Judge Advocate General handed down an opinion that the company had no rights there. On the 20th of September, 1909, only two months later, the same Judge Advocate General announced the following opinion:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
September 20, 1909.

Office of the Judge Advocate General, inviting attention to the report of this office dated July 20, 1909 (second indorsement hereon), and also to the fifth indorsement hereon by the constructing quartermaster at Honolulu.

While there is no express grant in the act approved February 6, 1909 (Public—No. 216), to the Wahiawa Water Co. of the water rights appurtenant to this reservation, such a grant would probably be included in the grant of the right of way for reservoirs, canals, and their laterals on the reservation, and appears to be assumed in the proviso that the company "shall furnish free of charge all the water needed for post or encampment purposes," etc.

In regard to the suggestion of the constructing quartermaster that the best solution of the question of water supply would be the repeal of this grant, it may be observed that there is no reservation in the grant of the right of repeal; and such rights as the company acquired under the grant can be resumed by the United States only after condemnation proceedings. As stated above, the grant is upon the proviso that "during the occupation of said military reservation by troops the said company shall furnish free of charge all the water needed for post or encampment purposes," etc., and the company should be called upon to meet the requirements of this proviso. Of course, any pipes leading from the water reservoirs of the company on the reservation would have to be put in at the expense of the United States, as it is not believed that the act could be construed as requiring the company to put in the pipes, etc., required to deliver the water where needed for military uses.

GEO. B. DAVIS,
Judge Advocate General.

Not only that, but the Secretary of War himself went before the Senate Committee on Appropriations when an amendment similar to this was offered on the sundry civil bill in the Senate and made the following statement. I read from page 21 of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate. This is as recently as July 1. The colloquy between the chairman of the committee, Senator WARREN, and the Secretary of War reads:

The CHAIRMAN. Of course that goes back into the riparian rights and irrigation rights, and all that, and the priority, and we have had to clear that up with the Supreme Court of the United States, and priority of right will overthrow almost anything else. It overthrew the riparian-rights doctrine in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Secretary STIMSON. Yes. The United States has a right to do what it is now doing, to furnish its own water now, leaving the title to the remaining water to a fair judicial ascertainment afterwards.

Now, that is the very thing that the amendment which I have offered intends to do, namely, to get a fair judicial ascertainment of this matter.

Mr. HOBSON. Is that the substance of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely. The situation with regard to the use of this water is this: There are two sugar companies operating on opposite sides of the island. One is using the water at the present time, and, as everyone knows, water is an important commodity for the raising of sugar. There is another company on the other side of the island. And, by the by, if the War Department were to lease this water to that other company it would all have to be carried from the watershed in which it is now impounded to an entirely different watershed, and the taro patch owners below the dam would not get a drop of water under the amendment that was made germane to this bill under the rule that has been adopted.

The owners of these taro patches have a prescriptive right that was given them under the laws of Hawaii while Hawaii was a kingdom, and have utilized some of this water under their prescriptive right during all the years that have intervened, a right that has never been questioned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman from California have five minutes more.

Mr. BURLESON. I object.

Mr. KAHN. I do not desire to take up the time of the House unnecessarily, but I have consumed very little time, and this is an important question. I think the committee ought to be fully informed before the vote is taken.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman has just consumed 10 minutes. Everybody on this floor is thoroughly familiar with this provision and the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more time. I am very much interested in his remarks.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not object to two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the time of the gentleman from California be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BURLESON. I object.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman has not the floor to make the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MANN. The Chair had not recognized the gentleman from Kentucky when I made my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky was on his feet at the time the gentleman made his motion, and the Chair recognized him at that time.

Mr. MANN. The Chair can overrule the parliamentary law, but we shall not make any progress by it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is true that the Wahiawa Water Co., that is resisting the proposed legislation, had certain rights that grew out of a lease that came from the Crown. That lease expired in 1912. Prior to its expiration in 1909 the company came to Congress and presented a bill giving them an easement, a right to go upon the land owned by the Government of the United States, and there build certain ditches and laterals. They had a right to the use of that land up to 1912, but after that time that right would be lost.

Now, they had built a dam which impounded the waters of both the north and south forks of the Kaukouahau River. The waters of the south fork rise on the Government reservation. As I said, they had the right to so impound the water as to cover a part of the Government land under the lease which expired in 1912; but at the end of that time they would be trespassers to the extent that they had water on the Government land.

So they came in and asked permission to continue to impound the water on the Government land and for certain rights in the way of laterals.

They did not claim, and in the brief that has been filed by their attorneys on page 29 they admit that they did not expect to get, and did not seek to get, any rights to the surplus waters that rose upon the Government reservation, and to which the Government had the title, as admitted by everyone, subject only to the right of the owners of the taro lands, which are something less than 300 acres; and the right of these taro landowners to the water, as testified to, could in no sense use up all of the water that could be impounded on the Government reservation out of the south fork.

Now, when this water company presented their bill the War Department said we will approve it if there are put upon it certain conditions requiring this company to do certain things. And now this House is confronted with this unique proposition—that conditions that were put upon a mere easement for the benefit of the Government are said to be of such a peculiar nature that they, by indirection, confer upon this company the right to surplus waters that are worth $40,000 a year.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. For a question.

Mr. KAHN. Under the terms of my amendment, if this company has no right to the water——

Mr. SHERLEY. I will deal with that in a moment.

Mr. KAHN. I want to complete my question.

Mr. SHERLEY. But the gentleman must not take up my time.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman has taken my time.

Mr. MANN. That is different.

Mr. SHERLEY. No, it is not different; I am trying to use the gentleman from California fairly, but the temper of the gentleman will not expedite him in getting permission to interrupt. I will yield in my time as I please and not as the gentleman pleases. Now, the reading of the act itself will plainly disclose that there is absolutely no right granted. The strange proposition is made by the amendment of the gentleman from California that the Government shall voluntarily becloud its own title. That is what it means. We stand here as representatives of the Government. If you believe, as I believe, that there is not a shadow of a claim for these people, what reason is there for the Government to voluntarily becloud its own title and throw into the courts a matter of litigation that may run for years and years. So far as the taro landowners are concerned that have rights that they can protect now, they have superior rights, and it is not necessary to put in this provision to protect them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. KAHN and Mr. GUDGER objected.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentlemen will not object. We can afford to be gentlemen over here.

Mr. KAHN. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, I have not withdrawn my objection, and I object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close on the amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were ayes 76 and noes 25.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered. The Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. SHERLEY, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 78 ayes and 17 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KAHN) there were 22 ayes and 73 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 60, line 7, after the word "reservation," insert the following: "And any moneys realized for said lease shall be covered into the treasury of the Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate has been closed on all amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, under the direction of the committee that all debate on the amendment and all amendments thereto be closed. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and, on a division (demanded by Mr. KAHN), there were—ayes 19, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 61, line 2, after the word "section," insert the following: "Provided further, That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, reject all bids and report his action to Congress."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York as amended.

The question was taken; and, on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN), there were—ayes 76, noes 17.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War be authorized and directed: First, To make all necessary and proper detail of officers of the United States Army to make such surveys, measurements, and estimates as may be necessary in providing a sufficient supply of good water for public use upon the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th days of July, 1913, upon the battle field of Gettysburg, in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, upon the commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg, and to make all necessary provisions and perform all necessary acts in connection with bringing upon said battle field upon said occasion such sufficient supply of good water fit for drinking and other purposes connected with and incidental to such occasion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 61, line 5, by inserting after the word "that" the following: "Within the limits of the appropriation hereinafter made, and the sum furnished by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for such purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

There is appropriated one-half of such sum as may be necessary to carry out the foregoing provisions of this section, not to exceed the sum of $150,000, to continue available during the fiscal years 1913 and 1914: Provided, That out of the sum of $250,000 heretofore pledged by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania by act of the general assembly of that Commonwealth, adopted on the 14th day of June, 1911, the commission appointed by the governor of Pennsylvania, in accordance with said act and having charge of such celebration, shall set aside and appropriate a sum equal to the amount above appropriated, to wit, the sum of $150,000; so much of which as may be necessary shall be expended for the purposes provided in this section, under the sole direction of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That until the said commission shall adopt a resolution agreeing that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania shall bear one-half of the expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions of this section, and shall furnish to the Secretary of War a certified copy of such resolution, no part of the sum appropriated in this section shall be expended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 62, line 15, by inserting before the word "not" the following: "Said one half."

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. I desire to ask the gentleman if the words "veteran of the Civil War" include those who participated on both sides? That is, if the Confederate veterans are there fraternizing with the Federal troops in the celebration, whether this is broad enough to permit the use of the appropriations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is intended to cover both. The committee incorporated in this bill the joint resolution passed by the Senate, and it was prepared, I am informed, by those who are particularly interested in the celebration, and is intended to take care of those who participated on both sides.

Mr. HOBSON. Would the gentleman object to the words "Federal and Confederate" being inserted after the word "veteran" so as to be sure to cover it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if there is any necessity for that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this matter was up once before in connection with the resolution which was passed, and I am quite sure it was then stated that this language, either by preparation or examination, would be construed by the department to include both Federal and Confederate soldiers. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] is one of the members of the commission of the House and Senate upon the subject. I do not know that he made the statement, but it came up in connection with a resolution which we passed. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I would say that the fiftieth anniversary battle-field commission has already extended invitations to camps of Confederate veterans.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, my only point was, and evidently it is clear, whether under the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York the language was broad enough to include in its provisions both the Confederate and the Federal veterans.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The amendment I offered was to make certain the amount that was to be contributed by the Government at $150,000. It had no relation to what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt about it, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOBSON. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to now return to page 42 for the purpose of offering the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 42, after line 21, insert:

"To pay Marshall Pickering and Charles L. Williams, messengers in the majority and minority caucus rooms, at the rate of $1,200 per annum each during the fiscal year 1913, $2,400."

Mr. MANN. That is in conformity with the resolution which has been already passed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the House adopted the resolution the other day, which was presented by the Committee on Accounts, and this is to carry it out.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to return to page 42 for the purpose of offering the amendment which the Clerk has reported? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, some two months ago, when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill was being considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the paragraph appropriating for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing had been reached, I offered an amendment which, in effect, required all currency issued to all national banks for circulation to be uniform. As that amendment embodied new legislation, it was ruled out on a point of order.

Last Saturday I introduced a bill, H. R. 26115, having the same purpose in view. I wish to state to the House frankly that while the bill introduced by me states the purpose of the proposed legislation, it is my intention, when the bill is considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency, to submit a revision and amendment of all the sections of the national banking laws affected by the proposed change. Or, better still, if that committee shall consider the reorganization of our monetary system at the next session of Congress, I shall urge the incorporation of the principles of my bill, in case a bond-secured currency is to be continued.

The convenience and economy of the reform proposed by me can not be denied. Practical banking men whom I have consulted approve it. The time for making the change is opportune, because Treasury officials are already considering the advisability of changing the size of the currency. If this should be done new plates for both sides of more than 36,000 different kinds of national-bank notes will have to be engraved and a supply of each kind printed. Under the plan proposed by me there would be only eight, or nine at most, different designs, or one design for each denomination authorized.

At some future date, when the House is ready to consider currency legislation, I hope to discuss at some length the benefits to be derived from the change proposed by me. For the present I shall content myself with inserting here as a part of my remarks a statement of suggestions prepared by Mr. John G. Herndon, who has evidently given the subject very thoughtful consideration:

SUGGESTIONS FOR A UNIFORM BANK NOTE BY ELIMINATING THE NAMES OF NATIONAL BANKS FROM THE CURRENCY ISSUED TO THEM, AND FOR A UNIFORM COIN CERTIFICATE TO TAKE THE PLACE OF THE PRESENT GOLD AND SILVER CERTIFICATES, UNITED STATES NOTES, AND TREASURY NOTES OF 1890.

(By John G. Herndon.)

The law requiring the names of national banks to be printed on the notes issued to them, and that said notes shall be signed by the president or vice president and cashier of the bank, should be repealed, and the Government should issue in lieu of said notes a uniform bond-secured currency certificate, just as gold and silver certificates are now issued.

The Government issues certificates of deposit—both gold and silver—which are based on the gold and silver deposited in the Treasury and subtreasuries, and it should also issue certificates of deposit—the suggested new currency—based on United States bonds when deposited in the Treasury.

There are at this time more than 7,200 national banks for which the Government has had engraved plates representing the different denominations of national-bank notes—$5, $10, $20, $50, and $100—and from these plates are printed more than 36,000 varieties of notes—an average of five for each bank.

Under the plan here outlined only five kinds of plates would be required, or six at most, as it would be very desirable to have a $1 certificate in addition to the five denominations now printed. Furthermore, banks should have issued to them notes of any denomination desired, instead of being restricted in the amount of small bills furnished them, as is now the case.

The redemption of national-bank notes for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1910, together with the new plates furnished, cost the banks more than a half million dollars, as is shown by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1910, and the cost for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, is greater still, amounting to about $550,000.

These are only two of the many items that enter into the expense of redeeming the national-bank currency, but they are sufficient to show the enormous annual saving that might be effected if the plan here suggested were adopted.

If this plan were adopted the old notes could be called in and the new notes issued in lieu of them, or the new notes could replace the old ones as fast as they were sent in for redemption. Even if the latter plan should be decided on—and it would be the more economical—it would not be long until the new currency would have entirely supplanted the old.

This plan, however, does not contemplate the destruction of the six hundred millions of national-bank notes stored in the Treasury vaults. Those notes should continue to be issued until the stock on hand becomes exhausted, when the suggested new currency certificates should take their place.

If adopted, this plan would save the engraving, storing, and handling of many thousands of plates in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; the printing and storing in the Treasury vaults of notes of every national bank in the country, amounting to over $600,000,000; and the assorting of the many thousands of different kinds of national-bank notes, first by districts, then by States, then by cities and towns in each State, and then by banks in those cities and towns, when sent in for redemption.

It would also save the cost of the notes in the Treasury vaults of all national banks that fail, consolidate, or retire from business, as those notes are utterly worthless under the present system when a bank goes out of business.

It would save the bank officials the enormous task of signing the present style of notes.

It would also be a check on counterfeiting, as six plates would take the place of the many thousands now in use, thus reducing in that proportion the number of possible imitations.

The counters and assorters in the Treasury, and the public as well, would soon become acquainted with the six varieties of new notes, but it would be almost impossible for them to ever familiarize themselves with the 36,000 varieties under the present system, which number is ever increasing.

If a bank desired to retire temporarily or permanently either a part or all of its currency, there would be no necessity for destroying any note so turned in for destruction unless it was unfit for circulation on account of being worn or mutilated, as it could be immediately restored to circulation in place of a similar note that had been destroyed and for which a new note would otherwise be issued.

Inasmuch as the suggested new currency would not bear any distinctive features, there would be no necessity for keeping an individual account of issues and redemptions with each of the 7,200 national banks, as is now done, and said accounts would stand as originally made except in cases of changed conditions.

The Government refuses to accept the present national-bank notes in payment of certain obligations, but at the same time will receive those notes in exchange for United States notes, and the banks can then pay their obligations with the latter currency, as it is called "lawful money."

All national-bank notes thus received are destroyed unless they are fit for reissue. Notes redeemed and destroyed are charged against the bank which issued them, and new notes are substituted therefor, which notes, when signed by the president or vice president and cashier of the bank, are again ready for circulation.

The Government then calls on these several banks whose notes have been redeemed to deposit United States notes equal in amount to the sum so redeemed, and thus the endless chain goes on.

This is a roundabout way of doing business, and is costly in time, energy, and money. Besides, it accomplishes no good purpose that would not be subserved if the suggested new currency were given the powers now enjoyed by United States notes in so far as they apply to the payment of obligations.

If this were done, there would be no necessity for requiring the redemption of national-bank notes in United States notes, as the new currency would meet all the requirements in the case and could always be supplied on a moment's notice.

Neither would there be any necessity for the 5 per cent redemption fund, unless the banks, in order to obtain gold, should desire the privilege of exchanging this suggested new currency for United States notes, just as the present national-bank currency can be exchanged for United States notes.

In that event all United States notes exchanged for this new currency would be charged against the 5 per cent redemption fund, and each bank would be required to return to the Treasury, in proportion to the amount of bond-secured currency certificates issued to it, its share of United States notes in exchange for an equal amount of the new currency, which United States notes when so returned would be placed to the credit of the 5 per cent redemption fund.

This would place this new currency on a par with gold and should overcome all objections that might be offered to it.

When the banks send in national-bank notes for redemption much time is necessarily consumed before the money can be counted, the amounts verified, and new currency (national-bank notes) issued in exchange, and this fact probably accounts to some extent for the plan adopted of redeeming those certificates in United States notes, as United States notes can be forwarded at once without waiting for the assorting of the national-bank notes. New national-bank notes would, of course, follow later on, and in due time the banks would be requested to return to the Treasury in United States notes a sum equal to the national-bank notes so redeemed.

When notes of the suggested new currency become worn or mutilated they should be exchanged for new notes, just as gold and silver certificates are exchanged for new notes of those issues when they become unfit for circulation, but the Government would never be called upon to redeem those notes except when a bank desired to withdraw its deposit of bonds.

You will please note the distinction that is here made between redemption and exchange. If the holder of a $10 silver certificate presents it for redemption he is given 10 silver dollars on surrender of the certificate, which is then destroyed, because the deposit on which it was based has been withdrawn. This same rule would apply to the new bank notes. When a bank desires to withdraw its bonds it surrenders the certificates of deposit issued to it by the Government when it received those bonds on deposit and the certificates are then destroyed, as the deposit of bonds on which they were based has been withdrawn.

This new currency certificate should be issued not only to national banks, but to any bank, trust company, or even private individual who owns United States bonds and desires to deposit them with the Government as security for a loan of the new certificates equal in amount to the face value of the bonds deposited.

As is well known, many millions of these bonds are not owned by national banks. In fact, there are at this time more than two hundred millions of United States bonds not on deposit with the Government either as security for national-bank circulation or deposits of public moneys, and if the owners of those bonds were granted the privilege of depositing them with and receiving from the Government as a loan a like amount of the suggested new currency certificates, just as national banks are permitted to do under the present system, it would place all bondholders on an equal footing, and the charge that the Government grants special privileges to national banks would no more be heard. Furthermore, this increase in the circulating medium in times of currency stringency would prevent money panics, and that, too, without endangering in the slightest degree the financial fabric.

I would also suggest that the Government issue a uniform coin certificate in lieu of the present gold and silver certificates, United States notes, and Treasury notes of 1890.

These suggested new certificates should be redeemable in coin, leaving the matter of the kind of coin to the election of the holders of the notes.

The following is a statement of the United States Treasury at close of business July 9, 1912:

RESERVE FUND.

Gold held for redemption of $346,681,016 of United States notes and $2,923,000 of Treasury notes of 1890	Coin	$100,000,000
	Bullion	50,000,000
			$150,000,000

TRUST FUNDS.

Held for the redemption of the notes and certificates for which they are, respectively, pledged.

Gold	Coin	$889,430,903
	Bullion	151,712,466
			$1,041,143,369	Gold certificates outstanding 1,041,143,369
Silver dollars			480,843,000	Silver certificates outstanding 480,843,000
Silver dollars of 1890			2,923,000	Treasury notes outstanding 2,923,000
			1,524,909,369	1,524,909,369

It will be seen from the above that nearly 75 per cent of these obligations of the Government are redeemable in gold, and as it is the policy of the Government to maintain the parity of the two metals—gold and silver—the suggested new coin certificates would fit in with this policy, as they would be redeemable at the pleasure of the holder in either gold or silver. If, however, there should be objection to this policy, the matter of the coin to be used in the redemption of these certificates could be very safely left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 25970), and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 20.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Has the Chair declared the vote? I would like to have that determined, as it affects the vote. Has the Chair declared the vote?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declared the vote, and the gentleman from Illinois demanded a division, and the Chair announced the ayes were 91 and the noes 20.

Mr. MANN. And I made the point of order that there was no quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can not get a vote through that way. We have a right to determine the vote.

The SPEAKER. The vote is in the affirmative.

Mr. MANN. It takes a quorum a make a good vote.

The SPEAKER. Of course, and the Chair simply announced the number of votes cast. Now the gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. And I asked whether the Chair announced the result.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw his point?

Mr. MANN. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Wednesday, August 7, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, August 7, 1912.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5817) granting to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, the jail building and fixtures now upon the abandoned Fort Assiniboine Military Reservation, in the State of Montana, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. POU, Mr. MAGUIRE of Nebraska, and Mr. HEALD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 4838. An act to amend section 96 of the "Act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911;

S. 7012. An act to permit the construction of a subway and the maintenance of a railroad under the post-office building, at or near Park Place, in the city of New York;

S. 7195. An act to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River;

S. 7163. An act authorizing the State of Arizona to select lands within the former Fort Grant Military Reservation and outside of the Crook National Forest in partial satisfaction of its grant for State charitable, penal, and reformatory institutions; and

H. R. 21888. An act providing for the sale of the United States unused post-office site at Perth Amboy, N. J.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition signed by Mrs. T. A. Stout and 461 other citizens of Sheridan, Wyo., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PERKINS presented a memorial of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., remonstrating against the adoption of the 50 per cent cargo clause in the pending Panama Canal bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5145) authorizing the city of Hot Springs, Ark., to occupy and construct buildings for the use of the fire department of said city on lot No. 3, block No. 115, in the city of Hot Springs, Ark., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1019) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 7415) granting to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. a right of way through the Fort Wingate Military Reservation in New Mexico, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BACON:

A bill (S. 7426) for the relief of Hugh H. Gordon (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 7427) for the relief of Edgar Allan, jr.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 7428) granting an increase of pension to Lucy L. Norton; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment relative to the sale and lease by the Secretary of War of surplus waters pertaining to the military reservation at Schofield Barracks, island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 25970), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE COTTON SCHEDULE.

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 25034) to reduce the duties on manufactures of cotton, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will withhold that announcement. There is a resolution which comes over from a former day of which the Chair had not been advised. It will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 372, submitted by Mr. KENYON on the 6th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 3345) to amend the act of July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," and that the same be laid before the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I only want to explain the purpose of the resolution. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] desires to be present. I wish that a messenger may be sent for him.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest to the Senator, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, to let the resolution lie over without losing its place.

Mr. KENYON. Until to-morrow?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; until to-morrow.

Mr. KENYON. If it may be laid over without prejudice, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, let that course be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the resolution will lie over until to-morrow, retaining its place.

COOSA RIVER DAM, ALA.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 7343) to authorize the building of a dam across the Coosa River, Ala., at the place selected for Lock No. 18 on said river.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I very much dislike to interfere in any business important to any Senator, but if we are to lay aside these conference reports, especially when we have reason to expect that there may be trouble in finally passing the bills in another quarter, I fear we shall never get to the end of the term.

If this bill can pass without any debate, I do not wish to object. But I wish to reserve the privilege of objecting if it is to lead to extended debate.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to be heard on the bill when it is brought up. I have certain amendments to propose.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that the matter I wish to close is a conference report which ought to be disposed of; and it will take just the time required for a vote unless something of which I am not advised develops.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If I could get unanimous consent to consider this bill immediately after the disposition of the conference report to be called up by the Senator from Wyoming, I would have no objection. I make that request.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill has gone to the calendar, and there are a great many other bills on the calendar the consideration of which is desired by those interested in them. I understand this bill is going to lead to some lengthy discussion. If that be the case, Mr. President, I hardly think it proper to take it up at this time. I dislike to object to the consideration of the bill. I have no objection to it myself personally, but I believe it is not proper at this time to allow a discussion of the bill which would take up all the morning hour.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no disposition in the world, Mr. President, to hinder in any way the disposition of the business of the Senate. I will be perfectly willing if any agreement can be reached in a reasonable time when this bill can have consideration to make an arrangement or agreement of that sort.

If the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Wyoming will suggest a time reasonably near when we could consider the bill, I have no disposition in the world to interfere with other business of the Senate. But I am exceedingly anxious to have the consideration of this measure at an early time. In 10 minutes I can satisfy the Senate it is a bill which ought to pass in the interest of everybody, not only in Alabama but in the entire country.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that I am quite positive there will be plenty of time to take up bills on the calendar after the appropriation bills are through, and I know there will be no disposition whatever to hold back this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that at some time during the remainder of the session I can get consideration of the bill. But it is a Senate bill. It must pass the House, and every day of delay endangers its final passage.

I do not think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] cares to speak at any length on the bill. He has spoken on this same subject quite a number of times. If he has anything new to present to the Senate it will be developed during the course of his discussion. I want to take but a few minutes myself on the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the bill is going to be discussed, because the Senator from Ohio has already so stated. Therefore, Mr. President, I shall object to the consideration of the bill now. I will speak to the Senator——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. [Putting the question.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays. I do it very reluctantly, of course, but I see that it is not the disposition of the Senate to consider the bill at this time. However, I want to say to the Senate that at some future time and at a very near time I propose to call the bill to the attention of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senate to take up the conference report on House bill 24023, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to be recognized before we determine whether that shall be done without objection. I brought up yesterday, and gave way on account of an objection by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the matter of the pension appropriation bill sent over from the House. A motion was made and was then pending which I understood would be taken up this morning before any other business outside of the routine business and would be proceeded with. I desire to have it disposed of. All I am asking is that the Senate shall disagree to the proposed amendments of the House to the Senate amendments and ask for a further conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks for the present consideration of the conference report on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that the matter of the pension appropriation bill was laid over with any mortgage on the day. The matter I am bringing up, if I am correctly informed, will take only the time necessary for a vote, and then I shall be out of the way. I appreciate the anxiety and haste which the Senator from North Dakota feels regarding his measure; but we must first dispose of the business before us.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that is true, I will withdraw the request until after we get a vote on the pending report.

Mr. WARREN. I so understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will renew it as soon as we dispose of the conference report on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I merely rise to a question of information. I should like to know from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee what disposition, if any, has been made of House bill 56, which was passed by the House and sent here some time ago. It has reference to the question of restricting or governing the so-called gambling in cotton futures. I should like to know what has become of it.

Mr. WARREN. Can not the Senator wait until we vote on the conference report?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is just a question of knowing whether any disposition has been made of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will notice that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee is not in his seat.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand that there are some members of the Judiciary Committee here who might give me that information, because I propose to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be brought before the Senate; but I should like to know if a subcommittee or some one has been appointed to look after the bill and when we may expect a report upon it.

Mr. WARREN. As that does not refer at all to the measure we have taken up, I wish the Senator might withhold that request for the present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The only point was that I would just like to know if anything has been done at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. Ought not the bill to be really before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It was sent to the Judiciary Committee on the question whether or not it is constitutional, and I suppose it is considered there just the same as before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have another bill before them of a similar character.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the Senator from Wyoming that the Senate shall proceed to the consideration of the conference report. Without objection, it is before the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference report having been taken up for consideration, that is the question before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the Senate is ready to vote upon this conference report and I do not desire to detain the Senate further than to make a single statement with reference to the Commerce Court.

I was not present when this matter was voted upon before it went to conference, and I had no opportunity to state my views in regard to it. I do not propose to do so now at length, but I was not quite willing to cast my vote or to have the record completed without some explanation in regard to it.

I was opposed to the creation of a commerce court at the time it was created, and for the same reason that I opposed it I am now in favor of its abolishment. I do not sympathize with that view which would abolish the court, because of some opinions rendered or some decisions made. I would not favor the abolishment of a court because it rendered a decision or decisions with the law of which I did not agree.

Therefore I did not desire that the record should be closed without submitting my reasons for being opposed to the court, and those are the reasons which actuated me when I was opposed to its creation, to wit, the inefficacy and, in my judgment, the inexpedlency of creating special courts.

Now, Mr. President, without taking the time of the Senate, as I know the Senate desires to proceed to a vote, I wish to insert in the RECORD some brief remarks made during the discussion of this matter when the bill was originally before the Senate under date of June 3, 1910, at page 7364.

If I may have that permission, I will permit the matter to come to a vote without further discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am quite aware of the desire to take a vote, and I am not going to say more than a word. But as I am going to cast my vote for this bill, I feel that I should like to say before doing so that I have not in anywise changed my views with reference to the Court of Commerce. I vote for the bill for the reason that, in my opinion, there are provisions in it which ought to become a part of the law of the land. I have great hope that the argument which has been adduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] will prevail at some time, and that that portion of the bill which I think most unfortunate will be eliminated by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, to the effect that the Court of Commerce is unconstitutional.

"But, Mr. President, I am opposed to the creation of this court, even if it be technically within the Constitution. I know that even if it be within the letter of the Constitution, it is not in harmony with the theory of those who created our system of Federal courts. I know it is not in accord with the foundation principles of our Federal judicial system. I believe that this system in its completeness, in its finish, in its reach and power and jurisdiction, in its divorcement from the turmoil of party strife in a nation controlled by parties, is the most original conception, the richest heritage handed down to us by that generation of giants. This is not a fanciful objection upon my part.

"I would earnestly plead with the legislative department of this Government to let the judicial system as it was created by the fathers alone. It has stood for 100 years just as it was created, the admiration and wonder of all men. Lawyers, statesmen, and jurists from every clime under the sun have pronounced it efficient and adequate for the juridical duties and obligations of this great Government. If you need more circuits and more districts, create them; if you need more judges, appoint them. If some of the questions which are coming before the court should be advanced over others by reason of the public interest, and the statute is not now sufficient, change the statute and advance the cases; but do not mar the system; do not change the fundamental principles; do not alter revered and ancient institutions, without great and controlling and impelling reasons. Here is a system which has been tested and tried and vindicated, and we are engrafting upon it a principle in utter violation of the principles upon which the fathers built it.

"If you say that this court is necessary, I submit to you the unchallenged facts and figures in this record in answer to that contention. The courts as at present organized are ample and efficient to discharge the duties imposed upon them. If you say that the courts of our country at present are unable and unfitted to perform these duties, I refuse to join with you in that libel upon our judiciary system and the challenge to its efficiency.

"No one who is interested in this question will soon forget the half-hearted and apologetic defense made by the learned lawyer from New York [Mr. ROOT]—and I speak with the utmost respect—in defense of this court. The sum total of his argument was that, as some one had suggested that these were complicated questions, he yielded his judgment against the creation of special courts and was willing to vote for it. I think I quote practically his language. He said, 'I am inclined to yield.' Mr. President, a judiciary system which has stood for 100 years should not be changed upon an 'I am inclined to yield.' It should only be changed upon profound conviction and after it has been impeached by its own incapacity. He said, 'I am inclined to yield my predisposition against the creation of these courts, because these questions are complicated ones.' They say that they must have a court of experts, and yet, Mr. President, they go to the court, whose efficiency and whose ability they challenge, to get their experts. They say they must have a court better fitted and better qualified, and yet they go to the court whose efficiency they challenge to make up the court especially fitted for this work. Our lives, our liberty, our property, and these institutions themselves are under the control and domination and at the disposition of our judiciary system as it is now found; these things must travel in their old accustomed way, but rates and railroad matters are so powerful and potent as to engraft upon our judiciary system a principle unknown to those who created it.

"I might be perfectly willing, Mr. President, and I think I am, to yield upon all ordinary matters to the suggestion of those who are better qualified to judge, better qualified to shape policies than myself—and I think that is a very good policy to adopt, because all legislation is a matter of compromise—but. Mr. President, in defense of our judiciary system I take a stand The mob in the streets must obey its orders, the rich and powerful must yield to its judgments, and the Congress of the United States ought to respect it and let it alone. It stands before the American people to-day as the most nearly complete and perfect tribunal which has to do with the welfare and interests of the American people. You and I can do nothing to the perfection of that system, which has upon it the stamp of approval of Hamilton and Jay and Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Ellsworth.

"If there are incompetent judges, if there are superserviceable judges, unfrock them and drop them from the place they dishonor, but do not change the entire judiciary system I wonder, if it were within the power of the judiciary system to make some radical change in the legislative department, what would happen to the Congress; and yet this great body, unable to help itself, without control of the purse or the sword, has no protection against the tyranny of political bodies, except what is found in the Constitution and in the respect of the people of the United States.

"It is within the power of Congress, outside of the domain of the Constitution, to cripple and hamper and embarrass the judiciary system of the United States. That ought to make us, as suggested by my colleague [Mr. HEYBURN] to-day, all the more anxious to protect it as it stands and permit its functions to be performed as they have been performed.

"While I say I am going to vote for the bill, I thought that I could not do so without putting into this record my unalterable opposition to this Court of Commerce. What influence I have here will be exerted against it, and it will be exerted everywhere that I can exercise it, until we come back to the system which has proved and justified itself in these 100 years." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 3, 1910, pp. 7364–7365.)

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the vote on this matter further than in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] with reference to the transfer of these additional circuit judges to ask to have inserted in the RECORD section 201 of the judicial code, which provides for the assignment of these additional circuit judges eo nomine to the various district courts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The insertion will be made as requested by the Senator from Utah, without objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SEC. 201. The five additional circuit judges authorized by the act to create a Commerce Court, and for other purposes, approved June 18, 1910, shall hold office during good behavior, and from time to time shall be designated and assigned by the Chief Justice of the United States for service in the district court of any district, or the circuit court of appeals for any circuit, or in the Commerce Court, and when so designated and assigned for service in a district court or circuit court of appeals shall have the powers and jurisdiction in this act conferred upon a circuit judge in his circuit.

Mr. WORKS. The section of the code referred to by the Senator from Utah was called to my attention subsequently to the making of my remarks on the subject and completely covers my suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I simply want to say that I shall vote against the conference report, but solely on the ground that, in my opinion, the provision relating to the civil service, as it is incorporated, is vicious in its tendency, and I think it is of a character so serious that I can not accept the report without a protest.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who is absent, and will therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator from Idaho is paired on this vote with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well. With that understanding I will vote; I vote "yea."

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. FOSTER's name was called). I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER], and ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote in the affirmative, and therefore I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MCLEAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. PERCY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. PERCY] is necessarily absent, and is paired. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I do not see him in his seat, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). On account of my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM (after having voted in the affirmative). I neglected to state that I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], but I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I find I can make a transfer of that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], which would leave me at liberty to vote. I vote "nay." If the Senator from Massachusetts were present, he would also vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. I am requested to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am requested to announce that the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. I make this announcement for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—30.

So the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I offer a concurrent resolution, which I ask to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25) was ordered to lie upon the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be instructed in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, to strike out all of the second paragraph of Senate amendments 511, 512, 513, and 514, as agreed to in conference and concurred in by the two Houses, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"All cases pending and undisposed of in said Commerce Court are hereby transferred to and shall be deemed pending in the district court of any of the judicial districts within which the original cause of action brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission arose, such district to be designated by the complainant; and the venue of all suits and proceedings hereafter brought to enforce, set aside, annul, or modify any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be in any of the judicial districts within which the original cause of action brought before the commission arose.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Chair has already laid before the Senate the message from the House of Representatives on the pension appropriation bill (H. R. 18985). I now renew my motion made yesterday that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate and ask for a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] moves that the Senate disagree to the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives to the Senate amendments and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] moves that the Senate concur in the House amendments. The latter motion has precedence. The question is on the motion to concur in the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. SHIVELY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashhurst	Crawford	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Cullom	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Bailey	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Dillingham	Massey	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Fletcher	Nelson	Smoot
Bourne	Gallinger	Newlands	Stone
Bradley	Gronna	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Brandegee	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Swanson
Bristow	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Thornton
Bryan	Jones	Perkins	Townsend
Burnham	Kenyon	Pomerene	Warren
Burton	Kern	Reed	Wetmore
Catron	La Follette	Root	Williams
Chamberlain	Lippitt	Sanders	Works
Clapp	Lodge	Shively
Clark, Wyo.	McCumber	Simmons

Mr. ASHURST. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] is unavoidably detained during the day. He is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the roll call of the Senate, 62 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate disagree to the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, the Chair to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate concur in the amendments proposed by the House of Representatives. The latter motion has precedence. The question is on concurring in the amendments proposed by the House to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I simply desire to state that the matter is substantially in the same condition that it was when we voted on it two days ago, the only difference now being that the abolition of the pension agencies is to take place, according to the amendments of the House, on the 31st day of December instead of at the present time, but the amendments adopted by the House abolish the pension agencies this year.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has stated the situation precisely as I understand it. The provision as it first came from the House would have gone into effect and abolished the pension agencies on the 1st day of July. The House amendment postpones the abolition of the agencies to the 31st day of December of the present year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call attention to the fact that the House has proposed amendments to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 2, 3, and 4. Amendments Nos. 5, 9, 10, and 11 are Senate amendments to which the House further disagrees. Therefore the vote now to be taken is as to the amendments Nos. 2, 3, and 4, those being the ones upon which the Senator makes his motion. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate concur in the House amendments to the Senate amendments Nos. 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair, as I have stated, but upon this vote I am released. Therefore I desire to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I transfer the general pair which I have with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I have transferred it to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and will vote. I vote "nay." I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], and as he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay," I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I withhold my vote on account of the absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], with whom I have a general pair.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I desire to announce my general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], now transferred to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and desire to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to announce the absence from the city of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. He has a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. If the Senator from Wisconsin were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] and therefore desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. ASHURST. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence from the Chamber of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day, in order that I may not be obliged to repeat it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I announce the pair between the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], and will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. JONES. My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably absent from the city, and I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Ashurst	Gronna	Newlands	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate concur in certain amendments of the House, the yeas are 28, the nays 28. So the motion fails.

The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate Nos. 2, 3, and 4, and that the Senate further insist upon its amendments upon which the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

Mr. GALLINGER. And ask for a further conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And ask for a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and others demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and refrain from voting.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], and transfer it to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and its transfer as previously announced and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] who is absent. For that reason I withhold my vote. I will let this announcement stand for all subsequent votes to-day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

So Mr. McCUMBER's motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. SHIVELY conferees on the part of the Senate at the further conference.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNHAM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 18960, the agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to say, so that my vote on the previous roll call shall not be misunderstood, that I am personally in entire sympathy with the contention of the House. I think these agencies ought to be abolished. I have said so heretofore on the floor of the Senate. But after the roll call at which the Senate refused to concur in the amendments of the House it seemed to me that if the Senate should refuse a further conference with the House the entire bill would be hung up in the Senate and we would be embarrassed in determining in what way to proceed and dispose of it. So it appeared to me the better plan would be to send it back to conference.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what became of the amendment on page 49, amendment No. 85?—

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed and required to select, classify, and segregate, as soon as practicable, all lands within the boundaries of national forests that are suitable and fit for agricultural purposes, and as soon as such lands have been thus selected, classified, and segregated the same shall be open to settlement and entry under the homestead laws, and the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated for the purpose aforesaid.

Mr. BURNHAM. Replying to the Senator from Idaho, we found it was impossible to retain the Nelson amendment in the form in which it was adopted by the Senate, and it was amended as follows:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed and required to select, classify, and segregate, as soon as practicable, all lands within the boundaries of national forests that may be open to settlement and entry under the homestead laws applicable to the national forests, and the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes aforesaid.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I presume the conferees did the best they could with this amendment, and I am not disposed to oppose the report or to criticize the conferees. The conference report has been sent back once, and I have no reason to hope that we could secure any different result by sending it back again, so I shall not ask it. But I do want to say a word, in order that this record may leave a protest against the method by which the provision was taken out of the bill.

The amendment proposed provides as follows:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed and required to select, classify, and segregate, as soon as practicable, all lands within the boundaries of national forests that are suitable and fit for agricultural purposes, and as soon as such lands have been thus selected, classified, and segregated, the same shall be open to settlement and entry under the homestead laws, and the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated for the purpose aforesaid.

I think as the Senate hears this amendment read each Senator will naturally inquire what can be the possible objection to this amendment. It provides for the classification and segregation of the agricultural land within the forest reserves and provides that after classification and segregation they shall be open to entry under the homestead laws of the United States.

The facts, as I know them to be in that portion of the country where this is particularly important, are that hundreds and thousands of acres of agricultural lands have been incorporated in these forest reserves. They are not timberlands. Upon them no timber has ever grown. They are not valuable for any other purpose than that of agriculture. Hundreds and thousands of American settlers are seeking lands for the purpose of making homes. Some of them are our best agricultural lands, and for no sound reason we are denied the right to make homes upon them.

It was the desire of those who were urging this amendment to have these lands classified and segregated by the department. It was left exclusively under the control and under the supervision of the department. If they were not agricultural lands, they would not be classified; if they were not agricultural lands they would not be segregated, and they could not be entered until in the judgment of the department they had been so classified and segregated. The department would not classify mineral lands or power sites or timberlands as agricultural lands. These lands would not be subject to entry until it had been adjudged that they were fit only for agricultural purposes. It seems incredible that anyone could be found so short-sighted and so unwise as to insist that our agricultural lands should remain idle against the thousands who want to reduce them to cultivation. It is conservation gone mad.

What possible objection, Mr. President, can there be to the settling up of our agricultural lands by our own people? What reason can be assigned for holding them within the reserves under such conditions that they are practically precluded from being settled?

Mr. President, after this was inserted in the bill as an amendment, a number of good people in this country became excited over the proposition and immediately began a campaign against it. I do not propose to assail the motives and purposes of those who began the campaign and carried it on so successfully, but those good people are misinformed as to the facts and conditions which surround the situation in the West. They seem to think that after they have been segregated as agricultural lands some one may take them up as timberlands or as power sites. A man who has had any practical knowledge or any information concerning the situation should know that it would be impossible for a man to secure a power site under the name of a homestead entry under such conditions. The West is just as much opposed to the securing of power sites under the name of some other entry and the monopoly of power sites and the acquisition of mineral land as timberland or vice versa as our good friends who oppose this measure. The difficulty lies in the fact that we know as a practical proposition it can not be done. They seem to be unaware of that fact and therefore by their urgency make it impossible for us to acquire our agricultural lands at all. We do not assail their motives; we challenge their knowledge and we impeach their wisdom. Any fair man familiar with actual conditions will hold they are in the wrong.

I do not hesitate to say, with the information which I have gathered myself from observation, that there are thousands of acres of fine agricultural land in these reserves within our own State upon which timber has never grown, in which there is no mineral, which could not be used for power sites, and which must inevitably, if used at all, be used for agricultural purposes.

That land lying there idle pays no taxes, it does not help us to build up the community, and does not furnish the means by which we can build up and strengthen our State. It is idle—consecrated and dedicated to idleness, while hundreds, yes, as shown by the facts for the last five years, hundreds and hundreds of thousands of American citizens are passing beyond these lands into the Dominion of Canada for the purpose of securing homes. The statistics show that in the last five years 500,000 American citizens have gone across the line, leaving land more fertile and better adapted to their desires, seeking land under another flag.

I am satisfied, as I said, that if those who knew the situation could have a fair hearing before those who are uninformed as to it, they would not permit their prejudice and their bias to continue to hold up the lands under these conditions.

Mr. President, the convention which met at Chicago declared among other things:

> We favor such fair and reasonable rules and regulations as will not discourage or interfere with actual bona fide homesteaders, prospectors, and miners in the acquisition of public lands under existing laws.

I suppose, Mr. President, that was put in there to mollify the feelings of the West upon this subject. It was put there, I presume, for the purpose of satisfying the western people that they could afford to support the party which makes such a declaration, and that they would deal in fairness with the prospector, the miner, and the homesteader in the future.

I have no reason to criticize, except that in view of what has happened in the past there must be something more than a declaration of a party platform to satisfy the people of the West that they are no longer to be tied up and bottled and prevented from development as they are entitled to develop as a people.

Now, here is a good opportunity to demonstrate that we mean what we say in our platform. We have adopted a platform, and we come here before a Republican Senate. I am going to read the other platform in a few minutes that will entitle us to appeal to a Democratic House. We have adopted this platform, and the West now asks for the simple proposition of opening our agricultural lands, and opening them under the classification and segregation of the department, and certainly no one will contend that the department is going to classify as agricultural lands lands which are not agricultural. Certainly, no one will contend, in view of the past 10 years' experience, that we are going to get lands classified which are fraudulent in their classification and are really not agricultural lands.

But this one simple proposition is in the inception of the effort to secure better treatment of settlers rejected, and why? What possible reason can be assigned for it? Who wants agricultural land dedicated to nonuse? Why should we not have homes upon them, for I repeat that it would be impossible under this provision to secure power sites, and so forth, under homestead entries? We want no frauds, but we want room for the brave settler who comes in good faith to make his home with us.

I do not believe, Mr. President—and I have made some examination, otherwise I would not state it—I do not believe that there is a power site in the possession of an individual to-day, in our part of the country, which was acquired under a homestead entry. Certainly, if so, it was carelessness in the officers, and I do not believe such a fact exists.

The convention which met at Baltimore said, among other things—

> The public domain should be administered and disposed of with due regard to the general welfare. Reservations should be limited to the purposes which they purport to serve and not extended to include land wholly unsuited therefor. The unnecessary withdrawal from sale and settlement of enormous tracts of public land, upon which tree growth never existed and can not be promoted, tends only to retard development, create discontent, and bring reproach upon the policy of conservation.

Mr. President, that is a splendid declaration and it is literally true. This policy tends to bring discredit upon real conservation. It brings into discredit those great fundamental principles which would make our resources the wealth of the people.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. May I ask the distinguished Senator from Idaho to read the next paragraph? It is even more pertinent.

Mr. BORAH. I am glad to read it. It is as follows:

> The public-land laws should be administered in a spirit of the broadest liberality toward the settler exhibiting a bona fide purpose to comply therewith, to the end that the invitation of this Government to the landless should be as attractive as possible; and the plain provisions of the forest-reserve act permitting homestead entries to be made within the national forest should not be nullified by administrative regulations which amount to a withdrawal of great areas of the same from settlement.

That is a good plank for a platform. It will be many years, however, before it is put into a law. This is not a party question, and I hold both the parties now in power responsible. Both parties have lacked either courage or knowledge. I speak with entire frankness, for I speak for a great people, a brave people, who are honestly seeking to build up those great Northwestern States, and I speak for them regardless of party lines.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will permit me, I think they will start to put it into law about the 5th of next March.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt the start will be made; it is the finish that I am interested in.

Now, I want to read alongside of these two declarations from the Republican and Democratic platforms this amendment, so that we will know that the Democratic House and the Republican Senate have started.

Mr. BAILEY. In the other direction?

Mr. BORAH. In the other direction.

This is the amendment agreed upon by the conferees:

> That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed and required to select, classify, and segregate, as soon as practicable, all lands within the boundaries of national forests that are chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes, and that are not needed for public purposes or for use by the public, and as soon as such lands have been thus selected, classified, and segregated, the same shall be open to settlement and entry under the homestead laws applicable to the national forests, and the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes aforesaid.

The western settler and the western people will not be quick to believe in the good faith of these declarations made upon the part of the two great parties.

We have an opportunity to give an assurance that we are going to carry out these platforms; and I want to say, Mr. President, that the men who return to the Congress of the United States from the Western States, from the western portion of this country, either to this body or the other one, will be more definite and positive and give the people of the western country a better assurance than the mere declaration of a party platform, in my judgment, before they get back here. They will have to satisfy the people that they have both the purpose and the courage to stand against these unreasonable and impractical theories, which would send that region with its imprisoned wealth back to the owls and bats.

The western people have had declaration after declaration for the last 10 years, and they have had a constant going in the other direction for the last 10 years. Not only our power sites and our mineral lands are tied up, but even our agricultural lands are withheld from entry. The people of this country know as a whole that it is wrong, or else they would not put it into the platform that they propose to discontinue it. But a cabal, which seems to exercise a remarkable influence over these two great bodies, an organization composed of fifty or a hundred people who never saw the country west of the Mississippi River except from a Pullman-car window, is able to defeat legislation here which every man knows who knows the facts ought to be enacted into law. We are under the influence of those who never spent a day on a farm, who never knew of the yearning for a home that the settler feels when he goes upon the western lands to secure an abode for his wife and child, who never looked upon that display of purpose and of patience exhibited in that struggle which snatches from the grip of the desert the place which he is to call his own.

The man who criticizes the western settler and denounces him as a land thief would not stay there overnight, where the land settler is required to stay three years. The men who denounce these people who are building up the western country and making a great commonwealth out of deserts have never bared their breasts to the hardships which they encounter who are building up that part of the country. Around these men who preach this doctrine are hundreds and thousands and millions of acres of abandoned lands.

What a magnificent thing it would be if these theorists and faddists would turn their attention to the rehabilitating of the abandoned land around their own doorsteps instead of riding on Pullman cars through the West and telling those hardy settlers how to make homes and how they should live in order to comport with the decent rules of citizenship. I do not wish to be harsh, but I serve notice, once and for all, that this impudent lying about the western people will be met and met openly.

No, Mr. President; I wish to say to the Democratic Party and to the Republican Party that this is a live issue in that part of the country which is yet waiting for the energy to develop it. I want to say that no candidate and no platform from President down will get my support in this campaign who or which does not convince me that this hypocrisy has been eliminated and that the West is to come into its own. It is a matter of life and death with the new Commonwealths of the West, and we will not accept their declarations made in Chicago and in Baltimore as conclusive when we stand here and meet defeat every time we ask a mere pittance at the hands of the Republican and Democratic legislators. I shall not apologize for my party, and I shall not hesitate to criticize the opposition party.

I do not know what the third party has declared at Chicago upon this subject. I presume that if some of them who are there in full force had their way, they would not only not declare as the others have declared, but some of them would shut up the West entirely and make it a colony for the East. When we hear from them, we shall determine what we shall do as to them. I am not particular now who has the principle—that is, where it is found—but upon a question which involves so vitally the growth and development of my State and the whole West I propose in my services here to hold up to the judgment of all men this unfair treatment from which we have too long suffered. Glittering promises will not suffice; we want results; we want legislation. I invite you all, the candidates of all parties, to the forum of the West in the coming campaign. We will promise that you will have a chance to be definite and certain before the "ides of November" if you come.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. ROOT. I would be very glad if the Senator from Idaho would point out for the information of Senators who are situated as I am, who are desirous of information, the practical difference between the amendment as it was put into the bill by the Senate and the amendment as it is reported by the conference committee. The one, I perceive, provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall select, classify, and segregate lands that are suitable and fit for agricultural purposes, and that those lands shall then be open to settlement, while the other provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall do the same thing in regard to lands open to settlement and entry under the homestead law.

Mr. BORAH. Applicable to national forests.

Mr. ROOT. Applicable to national forests.

Mr. BORAH. There is the crux of the whole question.

Mr. ROOT. There, I suppose, comes the difference; and I should be glad if the Senator from Idaho would tell us just what that difference is; in other words, in what respect the laws applicable to the national forests fail to come up to the measure which is prescribed in the original Senate amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am very glad to discuss that briefly. If the amendment should be adopted as it was originally proposed, as soon as these lands were classified and segregated all the homestead entryman would have to do would be to go and file upon the lands and comply with the homestead law. He would have the homestead law before him with its terms, and he would know that when he should have complied with the homestead law he would get his title.

The act of June 11, 1906, provides for making homestead entries within a forest reserve. Upon the face of that act it would appear to be nothing more than the application of the general homestead law to the forest reserves, but in its practical operation, as it is administered by the department, it is found to be practically a dead letter for this reason: I have a letter here, which I once read to the Senate, which illustrates the situation pretty well. A man made application to enter a homestead within a forest reserve. He was written to by the chief forester, or, rather, the man who is in charge of that district, that he could take that land and try it for one or two years, and that if at the end of two years the Forestry Bureau should come to the conclusion that he had not made a success in making a ranch out of it, then they would lease it to him, if he desired still further to remain upon the land. That is a practical illustration of the manner in which they permit people to make entries within the forest reserves.

Our desire was to have the land so segregated that, when the homesteader went upon it, he would have no one to pass judgment upon him as to whether he had succeeded or not, if he satisfied the law officers or those representing the Government, that he had complied with the law; but that is not now sufficient within a forest reserve. They may come to the conclusion at the end of a year or two years that it is not well to have a farm. I could cite a great many instances where, after a man had been upon a ranch for one or two years, they came to the conclusion that they wanted it for a ranger station. I know of more than one instance of that kind.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, would the Senator from Idaho be satisfied with an amendment to this amendment conveying to the State of Idaho all the public lands in that State?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President, I would; but I know that it is impossible for us to get it.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] will vote for that, I am sure; I know that all the Senators from the West will, and I believe all the Senators from the South will. While we have a common interest in that land, it is theoretical, because the cost of administering the public-land system of this country about absorbs the receipts from the sale of lands, and when we finish this work it will have cost the Government all it receives from the sale of the lands to dispose of them. Therefore our apparent interest is not a real one.

I know—and I know it because of the experience of our own State—that a State can administer its great landed property to better advantage and with more exact justice than can the United States. The States are closer to these lands; their people are more immediately interested in them. The States will take better care of the lands in them and dispose of them more according to the condition of their people. If the Senator would like to have it, I would almost guarantee him, if he will propose an amendment to that effect, that he can carry it. There is not a Senator here who does not know that a State can better determine what is a right and what is a fair and what is a wise disposition of the land.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator from New York is ready to vote for the proposition.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from New York is unable to say how he would vote upon the proposition of the Senator from Texas. He can, however, say this: That he would not vote for that proposition without having much more information and having given it much more consideration than it is possible for him to give during the remaining days of this session.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, would the Senator from New York permit me——

Mr. ROOT. Permit me to say—and then I will yield—that I do not think the suggestion of the Senator from Texas is a practical aid now toward reaching a conclusion upon the proposition presented by the Senator from Idaho. It is too large a question to be disposed of now upon this conference report; it involves beginning over again; there is nothing in the conference report that opens the door to it, and manifestly we can not consider that question now. I now yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I only wanted to say to the Senator from New York that no question is too large to settle promptly if a mistake—should a mistake be made which can be measured in dollars and cents; and no mistake we could make in this matter would injuriously affect New York or Texas in any other way than in the mere matter of dollars and cents. If we convey our interests—and that is all it amounts to—if we convey our interests in those lands to the States in which they are situated, and leave their people to deal with them, all we can possibly lose is whatever our interest might net us or might net the common Treasury. I want to say to the Senator from New York that whether this land is kept as a forest or converted into a ranch or made into a farm concerns the people of Idaho very nearly, while it does not concern the people of New York at all; and, consequently, I think that New York could well trust her brothers in Idaho to settle this question for themselves. One reason why I am so earnestly in favor of this proposition is that I come from the only State outside of the original 13 States which never had an acre of United States land in it; and we have experienced none of the hardships, none of the injustices, none of the follies connected with the administration of our lands and their disposition such as I hear recounted on this floor at every session of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Nor have you injured your State, either.

Mr. BAILEY. No; we have not retarded its development; we have not imposed a hardship upon anybody; we have not taken anybody's land, as was done in Idaho in the case just recited by the Senator from Idaho.

Now, I ought to have less confidence in their wisdom than the Senator from New York, because until recently they have been voting his ticket oftener than they have mine, but, notwithstanding that they have agreed with him in politics rather than with me, my contact with their Senators here and with their Members in the other House entirely satisfies me that we can trust them with our interests in this common estate. I would love to see that done, the Land Office closed up, and the end written to this chapter, because it has not been a very gratifying chapter to American pride, American patriotism, or American intelligence.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I must still refuse to consider the proposition of the Senator from Texas as being a serious one for consideration at this session of Congress. There are many very important questions that must be considered.

Mr. BAILEY. What are they?

Mr. ROOT. The whole subject of the reclamation of arid lands, which involves the action of the United States under existing laws and the effect upon that development of such a change, the whole subject of forest reserves, and the effect upon them of such a change.

Mr. BAILEY. How does that affect the State of New York when the lands are in Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, everything that affects the prosperity and the development of this country affects my State. The representatives of the older States are very apt to allow subjects of this kind to pass upon the argument and expression of wish and opinion by the representatives of the Western States, and not to address their minds to them; but we really have a deep interest in them, and, I think, perhaps we do not always do our duty in giving to such questions the consideration they are entitled to receive.

Upon this question, raised by the Senator from Idaho, it seems to me that the question presented is whether the agricultural character of the land is to be determined before the settler goes in or whether he is to go in leaving the determination of it to be made at some period after he has begun his occupancy. Is not that practically the case?

Mr. BORAH. That is true; and, of course, in the latter event the settler will never go in.

Mr. ROOT. Upon that I am with the Senator from Idaho. I think when a settler is going onto land which he is to have if it is agricultural, the question whether it is agricultural ought to be determined before he gives up a portion of his life and his labor to reclaiming that land. Upon that, so far as my vote will affect the situation, I am ready to vote for a provision that requires that decision to be made in the beginning, instead of after the settler has spent a year or more on the land.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me for just a moment?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do not understand the Senator from New York to mean that I am not interested in whatever concerns the prosperity of the Western States——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, far from it; I had no such thought.

Mr. BAILEY. Although he emphasized the fact that he was interested. I am sure he is; but I am also sure he is not more deeply interested than I am. The difference between the Senator from New York and the Senator from Texas is largely a difference that runs through our whole political opinions. I am willing for the happiness and prosperity of those people to be determined as largely as possible by those people themselves, while the Senator from New York and those with whom he has been in the habit of acting politically rather desire to exercise a supervision over their prosperity.

The lands in Idaho can never affect the people in New York, except in that remote and indirect way that all parts of this country are necessarily affected in a degree by whatever affects any part of this country. I am willing to believe that the State of New York is affected in a remote degree by the manner in which they enforce the laws against theft, murder, and arson in Idaho; and yet that is not an interest which I think entitles the people of New York to exercise any voice in the laws of Idaho which punish murder, theft, and arson. We must leave those questions to those people, and I want to leave the administration of their landed affairs to them, because I believe the land more nearly affects their prosperity and their happiness than any other kind of property or any other municipal regulation there. It involves the question of whether or not men can become home builders and home owners, and that goes to the very foundation of this Republic. I would rather trust the people of Idaho to distribute this land in a way to contribute to their happiness and their prosperity than to trust the Senator from New York or the Senator from Texas, because, no matter how well disposed we are to do the best, we lack the intimate knowledge of the conditions which exist there, and the refusal to give this land to the States in which it is located must proceed upon the theory that they are yet too young to know how to make the best use of it.

I am sorry the Senator from Idaho did not specify with a little more particularity the people who are sitting in comfortable offices in New York, looking out on the whirl of Broadway, and yet assuming to control the destinies of Idaho. I think they are the Conservation Society. I have no doubt they mean well; I am willing to admit that they are patriotic; I am willing to admit that they are intelligent about some things; but I have no hesitation in saying that they know less about Idaho than does the Senator from Idaho; and, indeed, I am willing to pay him the compliment of saying that, if they should live a thousand years, they could not learn as much about it as he knows now. Let those gentlemen, if they want to conserve the resources of this country, help the people to obtain these lands and make them into farms, and then help them, by wise advice, to preserve the fertility of the soil.

That is the kind of conservation we want, and the people of New York, densely populated as it is, and the people of Texas, thickly settled as the best part of that State is, have no right to impose their judgment upon the people of Idaho as to what is best for the people of that State.

And notwithstanding the fact that I am disappointed that the Senator from New York refuses to vote for this proposition, I believe that if it is ever put squarely to the Senate of the United States it will be adopted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to conclude my remarks before the hour of 12 o'clock. I will say that the people of Idaho and the people of the West, in my opinion, are perfectly willing that the timberlands which are forested, which really produce timber sufficient to justify their being in a forest reserve, shall remain in the forest reserve until the matter is settled in the proper way.

There is no considerable sentiment in my State, and I do not believe there is in the West, in favor of eliminating from forest reserves forest lands that are forest lands in truth and in fact. While we feel we would be able to take care of them if they were turned over to us, we have not asked it, because we know that our good friends in the East would feel they were wasting them to do so. We do not desire to have these forests taken possession of by large corporations. We do not want them to come under the control of monopolies. We want them in an intelligent and practical way reserved for and made useful to the people.

Mr. BAILEY. You have more interest in it than they have.

Mr. BORAH. Truly so. But we understand the public sentiment that prevails in regard to this matter, and we do not want anything done which will result in denuding our lands of those great forests which still remain and are practically the only virgin forests in the United States. We are willing to be patient on this matter if we can only have a reasonable and practical administration of these reserves. If at last it is thought wise to turn them over to the State, you will find that we are not unmindful of our responsibility—but I am not going to discuss that now.

Secondly, we do not desire to interfere yet with the proposition as to power sites. We understand perfectly the diversity of opinion upon that subject, and while we have our views in regard to it, we accede to the views of the East, that there should be some practical method devised by which the power sites of this country should be controlled and dedicated to the use and the interest of the people at large and not made a monopoly.

We have, as I say, decided views as to what should be done with them, but we have not been urgent. We realize it is an important matter. But, Mr. President, I submit, in all fairness and in all candor to the Senate, that the question of opening our agricultural lands is an entirely different proposition. We must have those in order to make our homes. There can be no possible monopoly of them. The method of farming in the arid regions necessarily brings about small farms. Intensive farming cuts large tracts into small farms, and if to-day a man had 160 acres he would cut it into 40-acre tracts in time. They are doing that constantly, and just as soon as a piece of land passes into ownership from the Government it is almost invariably true in that country that it passes in smaller areas to settlers who come into that country.

We ask for nothing and we plead for nothing at this time as definite action, except to have our agricultural lands open to settlement under such conditions as the settler will accept. The Senator from New York asked the practical question, What is the difference here? The difference here is that a settler, limited in means, very little to go upon, no bank account, will not experiment on a farm for six months or a year or two years and have some representative of the Government—and it does not make any difference how honest he may be—who never plowed an acre of ground in the world tell him he thinks that is not a good place to make a farm.

There is but one man in the world who can determine whether or not land will make a farm in that country, and that is the man who has the industry and the courage and the energy to go there and reduce it to a farm. After the department has classified the land, then leave it to the settler under established law to determine whether he will make a farm of it. I know of a tract of land, known as the Twin Falls tract; seven years ago it would have worried a jack rabbit to secure from it enough to eat between sunup and sundown—a perfect desert. I do not know truly within my knowledge a man who would have said at that time that it could be reduced to cultivation. It was not known where the water would come from.

But finally energetic and courageous men conceived a scheme of bringing the water upon the land. They put it upon that land, and to-day there is in the midst of that tract the town of Twin Falls, with eight to ten thousand people, and the tract is covered with farms that look as well settled and as well groomed as the farms in northern Illinois. It is extremely fertile land when water is put upon it, and no one can determine whether it is wise to try this except the man who is willing to invest his courage and his energy in developing it. But he will not have himself supervised and audited by some one who will say to him: "You can not make a farm here, and you must quit." He wants to know, and if he raises the material, if he raises the product of the farm, that is his proof. But it is not the proof with the other man.

Mr. President, I have said this much with no hope in the world of getting any result here, because I realize that in all probability the conferees have done all they could do, but I realize another thing—that this is a question of education. The western people are misjudged. Their situation is unfamiliar to the eastern people, and very few men take the broad view of it of my friend, the Senator from Texas, and others who have spoken here. But the great mass of the people in the East believe we are unfit to deal with these questions. They offer advice about that of which they know nothing—a condition of mind which seems neither to dampen their zeal as volunteer guardians not disturb their singular assurance.

Mr. GALLINGER. A single remark, with the permission of the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator from Idaho does not quite understand the eastern people on this proposition. I do not think the East feels that way at all toward the West. The Senator suggested that if this thing should go on, the West would become a colony of the East. I do not know the people who have held up the amendment the Senate put in, which I favored and favor now, but I think the people of the East as a whole have a very great and abiding interest in the development and prosperity of the West, and I regret that any severe criticism should be cast upon that people in a matter of this kind.

I agree fully with the Senator from Idaho in his contention. I think he is absolutely right. I heard read the letter in which the writer calls attention to the man who went on a tract of land and cultivated it; I have forgotten for how long, but for quite a length of time; and then some agent came along and told him that it was not fit for agriculture and he had better get off of it; and I believe the man did. It was a great outrage.

Mr. BORAH. The agent never accepted his application. He simply rejected it. The settler had nothing else to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I, as one Senator representing an eastern constituency, want to say to the Senator from Idaho that I have been greatly interested in what he said this morning, and that there are other years coming, we hope for all of us, and I will gladly join with the Senator—I know my colleague will, and I feel sure all the conferees on this bill will—to straighten this matter out in the future. It ought to be straightened out. Whether or not we are ready to turn over these public lands to the States is quite another question. I apprehend the State of Idaho would not want to take the forest reservations and administer them and pay the cost of administering them. But there may be other public lands which we ought to donate to the States.

I simply wanted to say this one word: I hope the conference report will be agreed to. I feel sure the conferees have done the very best they could. I know, from talking with two of them, that they were in full sympathy with the Senator's contention, and I feel confident that in the near future this matter will be adjusted to the satisfaction of the Senator and his colleagues from those magnificent States, one of which the Senator so ably represents.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this is the second time a report has come to us from the conferees to whom this agricultural bill was referred. When it was before the Senate the first time, the Senate rejected the report, and the rejection was due to the fact that the conferees had yielded two measures which the Senate had placed in the bill. One was the measure which has just been discussed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and the other was a provision for a market division in the statistical bureau of the Agricultural Department.

Those are the two measures which caused the Senate to send the bill back to the conferees and now the conferees are again before the Senate, having abandoned in conference the very two measures which the Senate insisted should be accepted by the other House.

I sympathize with the views presented by the Senator from Idaho. I am sure that in many instances the settlers in the Western States have not received that treatment which they might justly have expected, due partly to the laws themselves and due in part to unwise administration by special agents of the Government who in an unnecessary way have handicapped the settlers in the enforcement of their legal rights.

I hope, Mr. President, in the near future not only may we begin, but finish, legislation which will either, with proper restrictions, turn these lands over to the States, or if they are to be retained by the National Government, with the laws so amended and so broadened, with the administration required to be so much more generous, that our settlers may no longer have cause for complaint, and that their Senators and Representatives will say to Senators and Representatives from other parts of this Union "you have met us halfway, and you have helped us take care of the interests of the men who have come into our section to build their homes."

Mr. President, with reference to the market provision, which has been abandoned, I am earnestly in favor of that measure. It has received the indorsement of the leading officers of the various organizations of farmers. They are satisfied that the Government should not only help stimulate more productions from the farms, but that the Government should furnish information, through the Agricultural Department, which will facilitate the better marketing of what they produce.

The object of the creation of this bureau in the Agricultural Department is to gather information in this country and abroad and furnish it to the farmers—educational in part and practical in its immediate use; that the farmer after having increased his production may make the increase in the more varied lines coming from diversified crops; that he may have more knowledge about where and how he can best dispose of his increased products.

They believe, as many consumers believe, that the proper development of such work in the Agricultural Department will bring the consumer and producer closer together, will facilitate purchases by consumers more directly from the producers, and will enable the farmer to obtain a better price for what he raises, while at the same time the consumer will buy for a less cost many things which he is now compelled to use.

Mr. President, I shall not oppose this report, not because in any sense I abandon the measure which the bill contained, but the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has unanimously reported the measure as a separate bill. It is now pending be-before the Senate as a separate bill.

I understand that one of the reasons given was opposition from the Secretary of Agriculture. On inquiry I find that that opposition was limited to the fact that the amount of compensation provided for the head of this division is not sufficient to enable the Secretary to obtain the character of man whom he thought should take charge of it. I shall ask when the measure comes before the Senate an increase of $1,000 a year for the chief of this division.

The measure already having been discussed and the Senate having passed it as a part of the appropriation bill, I shall ask the consent of the Senate at an appropriate time to take up the separate bill. I shall modify it to conform exactly with the terms contained in the appropriation bill; and the terms being then the same, I feel that I can justly ask the consent of the Senate to take it up by unanimous consent and that it will pass without consuming any of the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am informed that in all probability action can be had upon the pending conference report within a few minutes. I give notice that as soon as it is concluded I shall demand the regular order. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I had about concluded what I wished to say. A similar measure is pending before the Commerce Committee of the House, although that bill places this division or bureau in the Department of Commerce and Labor. I am advised that they are ready to report it favorably. Therefore I have every reason to believe that by abandoning it in the appropriation bill, if the Senate gives its consent to take it up for immediate action—perhaps to-morrow morning—it can go to the House at once, and that the passage of the measure during the present session will not be delayed by my yielding, so far as the Agricultural appropriation bill is concerned.

I shall support the report of the conferees.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I wish I were able to say something in addition to what has been so ably said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on the effect of striking out the Senate amendments, which granted the right of locating homes on agricultural lands within the forest reservations. The instances which he cites of hardships and uncertainty in the efforts of the home-seeking people to find rest within the great reservations applies probably with more force to that State which I in part represent than to any other part of the Union. I could cite many instances of attempted settlements within these reservations which meant disappointment to the home seeker, until now no one will attempt to make a home within these great restricted boundaries, hampered as they are not only with the uncertainty of their title at last but with the harassment and worry of rules, regulations, and restrictions that the settlers in other parts of the country are free from.

If I could defeat this conference report, I would do so. I am not satisfied with it, but recognize that the conferees on the part of the Senate have done all in their power to preserve the bill as it left the Senate.

Senators may be sure that the West will never be settled, that its mighty resources will never be developed as long as you keep such provisions as the one contained in this bill and insist on striking down the broader homestead settlement on forest reservations contained in this bill as it left the Senate.

It is no wonder that Americans go to Canada when such restrictions are thrown around them in their native land. People will go now any place to find a home that offers them, no matter at what cost of labor and time, a real home for themselves and their children.

As the Senator has so well said, present legislation, with the rules and regulations which it permits, has dedicated to everlasting silence those mountain sides and the intervening valleys, on which orchards could be grown and farms cultivated.

The House seems to have made a wholesale slaughter of the Senate amendments to the Agricultural bill, and among the corpses I find, on page 64, one of my own amendments, which was a small appropriation of $5,000 for the purpose of investigating means of destroying a new pest that had invaded the great alfalfa fields of the Salt River Valley. That appropriation has not only been stricken out by the conferees, but the general sum for like purposes has been largely reduced in this report. But this is a small matter, and amounts to little in comparison with the great questions which have been presented here with such ability by the Senator from Idaho.

Senators, you will not settle an acre of the public domain now within the forest reserves until behind such settlement there is a law regulating the right of the settler against all comers. He will not attempt to locate except when supported by such a guaranty.

We in the West had rather see an apple orchard loaded with its fruit or a vinyard purple with its rich fruit on these mountain sides than to see a desert and silent and homeless forests of pine trees. A home is better than a forest-reserve headquarters, and that is the question involved in this legislation. Whenever the voice of wisdom and experience shall be heard all over this country I have no doubt that the position of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] will ultimately find full expression in our law.

I am firmly convinced that every State should have the land within its borders, knowing that where the local interests of the people are concerned that those interests will be best preserved by the people most interested.

Foreign landlordism under the operation of a government is fully as obnoxious as individual absentee landlordism.

For the reasons thus briefly stated I would defeat this conference report if I could.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I am going to take only a few moments, but I wish to call attention to one provision of the bill about which I think the Senate should know. I am sure that the conferees have allowed it to go out on account of the lack of knowledge of what is involved.

After a conference with the officers of the Agricultural Department, they brought to my attention a fact that is of vital importance to every American citizen who is interested in the value of our farm products. In the grading of our cotton there is a difference in the price as fixed by the world, according to color and foreign matter, varying from $2.50 to $15 a bale. The Agricultural Department, in addition to grading this cotton, desires to test the tensile strength, the yarn-making strength, the cloth-making strength of the lowest and the highest grades of the same variety of cotton.

We have two great classes in which our cotton falls, the gulf and the upland. In both these there are nine grades. The ordinary variation in price is a quarter of a cent a pound "on" for grades above middling and a quarter of a cent "off" on grades below middling to the last two grades, then anywhere from 2½ to 3 cents, or $10 to $15 a bale, "off" for the lowest grade.

As far as these experiments have gone they have proved that the tensile strength of these different grades does not vary one particle; that so far as the yarn-making power of the lowest grades are concerned, it is as good as the highest grade of the same variety.

I made further inquiry as to the bleaching qualities of this cotton, and I am assured that the process that bleaches the whitest and best is exactly the same process that would bleach the blackest and the lowest grades, and I desired experiments to prove the cost and results in bleaching these different grades.

Therefore the farmers of this country are entitled to know whether there is an arbitrary fixing of prices between their grades or whether these grades are practically of the same value.

I asked how much it would take to put sufficient machinery in the Agricultural Department for them to test all these grades so as to give a fair knowledge as to its tensile strength and the per cent of the loss incident to the manufacturing of the different grades. They said an additional appropriation of $4,000 with the aid already in the bill would enable them to do this work. This for the enlightenment of those who produce the textiles that clothe 900,000,000 people and of which textile America has a monopoly.

In this conference report I see that the pitiful sum of $4,000 is stricken out. When compared with the magnificent results that might accrue to the growers of this material from this knowledge, this act is surprising. The head of that department informed me the other day that upon the strength of the belief that the $4,000 would be passed he had already made arrangements for the installation of the machinery to experiment along the lines suggested for the benefit of the southern cotton growers, as to what is the real difference in the grades as tested by their intrinsic qualities.

In order to expedite the passage of the bill I am going to vote for the conference report, but I am taking this occasion to register my protest against men being on the Agricultural Committee who know nothing about agriculture. In your Committee on the Judiciary you have no farmers. You compose it of the best lawyers you have. I insist that the right way to do is upon the Agricultural Committee, as near as possible, to get those who are farmers or who have such a knowledge of farming as to make them capable of deciding the questions that affect the agricultural interests of this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

AMERICAN TOBACCO ABROAD.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Senator from Connecticut if he will allow me to make a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report, without objection, will be received.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 7409) to constitute a commission to investigate the purchase of American-grown tobacco by the Governments of foreign countries, to report it back favorably without amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill. It will lead to no debate, I am sure. It is a bill of just a few lines.

Mr. LODGE. There will be no debate. It will merely require the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to create a commission consisting of three Senators, to be chosen by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be chosen by the Speaker. Such commission is empowered to investigate the conditions under which the governments of foreign countries purchase American-grown tobacco, and whether there is any combination or understanding between the representatives of said foreign governments with a view to depressing the price of American-grown tobacco. The commission shall report the results of its investigations to the Congress. The sum of $10,000 to defray the expenses of the commission, including the expenses of witnesses and clerical work, is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I had intended to demand the regular order, but the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] has a small matter that he wishes to have disposed of.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is House bill 24121, which has come back from the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. JONES, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS DAVIDSON.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask permission to report favorably from the Committee on Pensions the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 346) to correct an error in an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved June 19, 1912, and I ask for its immediate consideration. It is merely a joint resolution to correct an error.

Mr. REED. Before consent is given, I should like to hear the joint resolution read.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me state to the Senator there was a mistake made in one of the private pension bills. It is a mere clerical error and this is for its correction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to correct and amend the paragraph in an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved June 19, 1912 (Private, No. 26), granting an increase of pension to one Thomas Davidson, so as to read as follows:

The name of Thomas Davidson, late of Company G, Seventeenth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS ON SCHOOL HYGIENE.

Mr. ROOT. I report back from the Committee on Foreign Relations the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) requesting the President of the United States to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene. A similar Senate joint resolution, which has already been reported favorably, is now on the calendar. I ask for the present consideration of the House joint resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the House joint resolution be read.

Mr. LODGE. It is just the same as ours.

Mr. CULBERSON. It has passed the House?

Mr. LODGE. It has passed the House, and is exactly the same as the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. They are identical?

Mr. LODGE. They are identical.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall not object to its consideration, but I give notice that after it has been disposed of I shall demand the regular order.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) authorizing the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to send representatives to the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene will be indefinitely postponed.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, which is House bill 21969.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] gave notice that he would desire to address the Senate at this time. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to strike out, in lines 13 and 14, on page 6, the words:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, there are four propositions in the bill that appeal to me as being of extreme importance.

First. The question of construction of the treaty between this Nation and the British Government;

Second. The form of government that shall be provided for the control of the Panama Canal and the Canal Zone;

Third. The question of free tolls to American ships; and Fourth. The question of the exclusion from the use of the canal of railroad-owned ships.

I shall not take up the time of the Senate in discussing the first two of these propositions. I have never doubted the correctness of that constructoin of the treaty with Great Britain which gives to our Government the right to allow the passage of its ships through the Panama Canal free of toll. Any other construction of it would take away from the Government practically all of the benefits resulting from ownership or sovereignty.

There is another matter, Mr. President, that I desire to suggest in connection with this question. There is a very sharp division of sentiment upon this question. There are very diversified views as to the construction that should be placed upon the treaty. We are confronted now, as the representatives of this Government, with the question as to which one of these constructions we shall place upon the treaty.

Shall we, by the vote that we shall give upon this question, place upon it the construction that is most unfavorable to our Government, since the question is one of doubt? If so, we, in effect, estop the Government from claiming that construction that is favorable to it, and admit that the British Government is right in insisting that we should treat our own ships precisely as those of other nations are treated.

It was maintained here the other day that a vote of the Senate upon an amendment that was offered to the treaty when under consideration expressly providing that we should have that right was an estoppel upon the part of the Senate to claim the construction that I now contend for. What would be said of us if at this time, when the question is directly presented, we should by a vote of the Senate place that construction upon the treaty? Certainly from this time on the Government would be estopped to deny that that construction should be placed upon it, and in honor it would be bound to carry out the treaty as thus construed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Georgia in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Suppose Congress should in its wisdom decide that it was a wise policy not to exempt those vessels from tolls, but should at the same time declare that it did not take that position at all, because it made any admissions as to Great Britain's construction of the treaty, would we then be estopped?

Mr. WORKS. If the action of the Senate showed that it was proceeding wholly upon the merits of the question as to whether American ships should be allowed to pass through the canal free or not, and if the other question as to the construction of the treaty were excluded by the action of the Senate, then, of course, it would have no such effect. But as the bill is now presented it is impossible that we should vote upon this question upon any such theory as that; and as it is contended by Senators upon the floor of the Senate that the unfavorable construction should be placed upon the treaty, if we should vote to that effect then it amounts to a declaration on the part of the Senate to that effect.

Mr. President, the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that instead of allowing our ships to pass through the canal free we charge them with the tolls and then repay them, does not appeal to me. It was expressly admitted by the Senator from Massachusetts that that would be a pure evasion of the treaty. I believe that the Government of the United States should be just as honest in dealing with its contracts with other nations as an individual citizen of this country should be in dealing with his contracts.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I did not say it would be a pure evasion of the treaty. I said it would be a pure evasion of the treaty if we accepted the proposition that we were required under that treaty to make no difference in tolls on our own vessels.

Mr. WORKS. Certainly; I understand. I do not want in any way to misrepresent the views expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, but that would be the effect of it. The Government of the United States would enter upon a rebating system. Rebating has become quite unpopular in this country, and I am impressed with the idea that the Government should not embark upon anything of that sort.

With respect to the form of government to be established in the Canal Zone, I have not given that question any great study or consideration. I have been content to be guided by the investigations that have been made by the committee and the discussion on the part of other Senators. Therefore I am not going to enter upon any discussion of that question.

I want to say, Mr. President, that if it were not for the fact that the sentiments and wishes of the shippers and business men of my own State have been misrepresented upon the floor of the Senate, I probably should not have felt myself called upon to say anything at all with respect to this bill. Yesterday morning there was placed upon the desks of Senators a document upon the front page of which appears the following statement:

PANAMA CANAL LEGISLATION.

The following is a complete list of the class A and class B members of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce. These two classes represent the only members of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce who have the right to vote at elections or to hold office as a director of the chamber of commerce.

The names marked with a dash have signed a protest against the action of the directors of the chamber of commerce in advocating that no railroad owned or controlled ship operating in transoceanic trade should be permitted to engage in coastwise traffic through the Panama Canal in connection with such transoceanic trade.

The names marked with a star have wired directly to Senator BRANDEGEE, chairman of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, protesting against said attitude of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, and requesting that the 50 per cent proviso at the end of the first paragraph of section 11 of the Panama Canal bill should be stricken out.

THE PROTESTING MEMBERS ARE MORE THAN 53 PER CENT OF THE TOTAL REGULAR MEMBERSHIP OF THE CHAMBER.

Additional members are constantly being added to the list of those protesting against the action of the chamber of commerce in this matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to inquire what kind of document that is. Is it a public document printed at public expense or is it a private document circulated by parties who are responsible for it?

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator from Kansas will bear with me, I am coming to that very question in a moment.

Mr. President, I felt and expressed my surprise that any such document as that, anonymous in its character, for which nobody was responsible, should have been placed upon the desks of Senators. I inquired of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the chairman of the committee, for information on the subject, and he informed me that it had been done by his direction, which, of course, made it authoritative; but, in order that I may comment intelligently and fairly upon this question, I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether the compilation that is contained in this document was made by the committee of which he is chairman as a result of investigations that were held or of the hearings before that committee?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In response to the inquiry of the Senator from California, I would say no. The compilation was made at my request by Mr. Schwerin. He is the manager and vice president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. He called at my office, having heard that I had received some eight hundred or a thousand telegrams from members of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, and asked me if he might look them over. I told him "certainly." Mr. Wheeler, who is the agent or attorney of the directors of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, and who takes the opposite position in this controverted question from Mr. Schwerin, had previously asked the same privilege of me and I had accorded the same privilege to him. Similar telegrams had been sent, and I think an equal number, to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], had been introduced in the Senate, and I think laid upon the table, because the committee had at that time reported. I have therefore not introduced the telegrams which have been sent to me, but I was very glad to avail myself of the offer of Mr. Schwerin to have the telegrams assorted and compared with a list of the members of the chamber of commerce, so that it might appear what proportion of the membership had signed them, and whether they were in fact from members of the chamber of commerce. I will say at the same time that I asked him if he would have a copy made of the telegrams in print, which he has done, and which I shall also ask to have laid upon the desks of Senators so that they may see the telegrams, because it is difficult when telegrams are laid upon the Secretary's desk in a bunch to have all the Senators see what they are.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether the matter of making such use of these documents as has been suggested was authorized by the committee of which he is chairman?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no. They were sent to me. I brought them down here and asked one of the pages to lay them on the desks of Senators, just as I expect to do with the telegrams themselves when they are ready for distribution.

Mr. WORKS. Further, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he has or whether he has had any means of determining the genuineness of these telegrams or how they were inspired, if at all?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course I have had no personal conversation with the gentlemen who sent them out in San Francisco, but I have the original letter from the gentleman who purports to be chairman of the committee who secured the telegrams, which I shall be glad to show the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. Capt. Barneson?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; and whenever the Senator requires, either now, if he will give me time to go to my committee room, or later, I will present to the Senate what I suppose is his original signature vouching for the authenticity of the telegrams and sending certain evidence to that effect.

Mr. WORKS. I may say in this connection, Mr. President, that, unfortunately, Capt. Barneson, who appears as the chairman of one of the committees of the chamber of commerce, has in fact been the representative of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. in this whole transaction, and has not, as I claim, been acting in good faith with the members of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco.

My colleague, as has been suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, some time ago introduced something like 800 telegrams, I believe, accompanied by the statement that they were 800 telegrams from members of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco and others. It was my particular object and purpose, in speaking to the Senate to-day, to expose the origin of these telegrams and to point out to the Senate that they are not in any sense representative of the views of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, and that a great many of them were sent entirely without authority.

In this connection, I desire to call attention to some correspondence with respect to that question; but I desire to say, before commenting upon the telegrams, that I do not intend by what I shall say to reflect upon my colleague or upon the Senator from Connecticut. I have no doubt that they have acted conscientiously about this matter, but without understanding the exact conditions, as I shall now endeavor to present them to the Senate. I first call attention to a letter, of date July 12, from J. A. Eveleth, secretary of the Wholesale Fruit Produce Merchants' Credit Association of San Francisco, to Hon. J. R. KNOWLAND, one of the Representatives in Congress from the State of California, as follows:

WHOLESALE FRUIT & PRODUCE MERCHANTS' CREDIT ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.,
San Francisco, Cal., July 12, 1912.

J. R. KNOWLAND, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing a list of parties to whom I wish you would forward a copy of your speech in Congress on the Panama bill, delivered May 16 of this year, if you have not already done so.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. has presented a resolution to the association, which they wish us to indorse, condemning that part of the bill now pending which affects their interests, or, properly it might be said, the interests of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co.—

Now, I call the attention of Senators to that fact. Here is the secretary of one of the largest produce associations of San Francisco, made up of various business men, who are members of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of San Francisco, and it shows that the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., that is, in fact, owned by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., has inspired these telegrams, has asked these associations that a protest be sent in from them against the passage of the bill; and I shall show a little further along that the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. has furnished the form of resolution to be passed by these associations in the furtherance of that object.

The letter continues:

This will come before the association at the regular monthly meeting on the first Tuesday in August, and I would much like to have your speech in the hands of every member before that time.

Thanking you, I am,
Very truly, yours,
J. A. EVELETH,
Secretary.

I also read a telegram from Col. William Matson, of San Francisco, a member of the chamber of commerce, to Mr. W. R. Wheeler, who has been mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., June 29, 1912.

W. R. WHEELER,
New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Capt. Barneson is circulating petition among members of the chamber of commerce for signatures in an endeavor to have the chamber of commerce reverse its action as covered by its resolution regarding railroad ownership of steamship lines operating through Panama Canal, adopted March 11, 1912. I have been informed on very reliable authority that yesterday the force of the purchasing agent's department of Pacific Mail were going around in automobiles endeavoring to get signatures to this petition from the people they do business with and purchase from.

WM. MATSON.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I notice, as the Senator from California read, he referred to some alleged action of the chamber of commerce. What date did he mention?

Mr. WORKS. I have not mentioned the date, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator read a date.

Mr. WORKS. I will come to that feature of it directly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has already mentioned the date in the letter that he has just read of some alleged action of the chamber of commerce of the 12th of some month. I did not catch the month.

Mr. WORKS. No; the date of the letter, I will say to the Senator, is the 12th of July. The date of the making of the speech by Mr. KNOWLAND was the 16th of May of this year. I think those are the only dates that are mentioned in the letter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the Senator to say that somebody was trying to reverse the action of the chamber of commerce, which action was taken on a certain date. Was I mistaken?

Mr. WORKS. No; the date has not been mentioned. I think the Senator is mistaken with respect to that; but we will come to that, so that the date can be fixed, if that is the desire of the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What was the action of the chamber of commerce to which the Senator has alluded?

Mr. WORKS. That I am going to disclose fully before I am done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. WORKS. I also call attention to another telegram to the same person, Mr. Wheeler, of date July 5, by Mr. James K. Lynch, chairman of the Traffic Bureau of the Chamber of Commerce.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 5, 1912.
(Received July 6, 1912.)

WILLIAM R. WHEELER,
New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Robbins McIntosh and other members of executive committee think best have Congressman KNOWLAND appear as guest and address meeting of board of directors of the chamber on 9th. We all feel that our present position is a good one, and a general meeting of the chamber at this time, when so many are out of town, might be controlled by Pacific Mail henchmen, who are extraordinarily active. Have seen your letter to MANN; congratulate you again on the work you have accomplished. The line-up of signatures to protest is amusing. Leaders are firms under business obligations to Pacific Mail and the others fall for bull about American flag. Would just as easily sign petition on the other side if asked. Under circumstances don't consider it necessary for Teal to appear.

JAMES K. LYNCH,
Chairman Traffic Bureau, Chamber of Commerce.

I also call the attention of the Senate to a letter from A. W. Sperry, secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, to Mr. Wheeler, of date of July 6, 1912:

TRAFFIC BUREAU OF THE SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
San Francisco, Cal., July 6, 1912.

Hon. WILLIAM R. WHEELER,
New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WHEELER: I inclose herewith several newspaper clippings which will be of interest to you.

The Pacific Mail have representatives on the street endeavoring to get signatures to a petition opposing your (50 per cent) amendment, but as many members of the chamber are calling up the bureau and also officials of the chamber for information concerning the same I am afraid they are experiencing much difficulty in obtaining signatures. I have personally stopped four signatures to the petition, and Mr. McIntosh and Mr. Robbins, I know, have done as much. The list which they have compiled is a very funny one. Names are either down for the purpose of being seen in print or on account of absolute ignorance of the situation, or because of railroad or steamship influence. The latest report is that the Pacific Mail have used the name of the First National Bank as sympathizing with their views. I advised Mr. Lynch of this, and he was ready to go out on the street and hold an indignation meeting.

A. W. SPERRY, Secretary.

I also call attention to a telegram of July 25 from Mr. Sperry to Mr. Wheeler:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 25, 1912.

Hon. WILLIAM R. WHEELER,
New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Have heard through Messrs. Scott, McIntosh, and others of several instances wherein signers of Pacific Mail petition opposing Wheeler amendment regret their action, acknowledging lack of familiarity with subject time of signing.

Am mailing you to-night copy of letter from prominent commission merchant who signed under misapprehension.

A. W. SPERRY.

The letter referred to in the telegram is as follows:

A. GALLI FRUIT CO.,
San Francisco, Cal., July 23, 1912.

PRESIDENT CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
San Francisco, Cal.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed letter handed to all the members of our credit association explains itself. The writer wishes to state, however, that the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. has circulated a petition in this neighborhood which a number of our members have signed, and among the number ourselves, under a misapprehension. Your letter explaining the action of our chamber of commerce here, together with the Chambers of Commerce at Portland, Seattle, New Orleans, and New York, was not received until after this petition was circulated, and the writer signed the petition after hearing only one side of the argument and is willing to acknowledge the error after reading the communication from you.

The subject is an intricate one with which very few of us are familiar, and without considerable study, which few in our line of business have time to give it, the question is one hard to understand.

The inclosed letter indicates the action to be taken at our meeting held the first Tuesday in each month (the next one on Tuesday, August 6), and if convenient, the writer believes that it will be worth while if you will have some one present who will explain the situation as the chamber of commerce understands it. If on receipt of this letter you will communicate with our secretary, Mr. J. A. Eveleth, he will give you full information regarding the time of the meeting, etc.

Thanking you in advance, we are,
Yours, truly,
A. GALLI FRUIT CO.
EDWARD H. WHITE.

Then follows a copy of a letter that was sent out by the secretary of the association as follows:

OFFICE OF THE WHOLESALE FRUIT & PRODUCE MERCHANTS' CREDIT ASSOCIATION.

To members:

At the last regular meeting of the association, held Tuesday, July 2, a communication was received from the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., the substance of which we hereby give you.

A motion was duly made, seconded, and carried that this be given to each member of the association, with the request that they give it proper attention and act upon it at the next regular monthly meeting of the association, which will be held on the first Tuesday in August at 2 p. m.

The question will be upon the adoption of the resolution as framed by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. which we are now giving you.

We trust that every member will be sufficiently interested in this matter to give it due consideration and be present at this meeting to act upon it.

Very truly, yours, J. A. EVELETH, Secretary.

Then follows a resolution which was sent out by the secretary of the association, which, he says, is a resolution prepared by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. I have already indicated by what I have said and by what is contained in these different communications that this whole movement was on the part of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., and that these parties who were under obligations to that company and who were ignorant of the conditions have been induced to sign the protest and to send out the telegrams, or permit them to be sent out, through the influence of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., and not otherwise. The resolution that was prepared by the steamship company and submitted in that way is as follows:

Whereas there is now pending before the Senate of the United States legislation known as "the Panama Canal bill," the first paragraph of section 2 of which provides as follows: That no ship owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by any railroad company, or in which any railroad company has any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly or indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner), shall be permitted to enter or pass through the Panama Canal if engaged in the coastwise trade between ports of the United States. That any ship of American registry, however owned or controlled, shall be permitted to operate through the canal in transoceanic trade to and from oriental or European countries; said vessel on its way to and from said foreign countries shall be permitted to do a coastwise trade between ports of the United States and intermediate foreign ports: Provided, That this shall not be permitted to any ship owned or controlled in whole or in part by any railroad company, except those engaged in said transoceanic trade, nor shall any coastwise trade be done by any ship unless on a voyage to or from such transoceanic ports, and not to those of Canada, Mexico, or any Central or South American port: Provided, That no such railroad owned or controlled ship shall pass through the canal unless at least 50 per cent of its cargo, in tonnage, is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That we can not too strongly condemn any legislation which will in any way hinder the operation of American ships or in any way prevent the up-building of the American mercantile marine; and be it further

Resolved, That this association now places itself on record as being in favor of extending every possible assistance, legislative or otherwise, to American ships, and particularly those in the foreign trade.

I also call the attention of the Senate to a telegram sent to Mr. Wheeler by the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, by M. H. Robbins, jr., president, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 23.

W. R. WHEELER,
New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Officials Pacific Mail circulated petition worded about like wire to DILLINGHAM, repeated back by you. From best information obtainable wires were sent by Pacific Mail over names of signers to petition. Those interviewed deny sending wires, but petition so authorized.

Senators can see how the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. operated. We are accustomed to that sort of thing out on the Pacific coast. We understand the methods of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. and the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., owned by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. They procured, in the first instance, the signing of a petition by these parties, in which it was stated that telegrams might be sent under their names protesting against the passage of this bill. None of them, it is fair to assume, saw the telegrams or knew their contents, and these are the telegrams that have been received both by my colleague and by the Senator from Connecticut:

Some interviewed acknowledge did not know purport of document signed. Following wired Senator PERKINS: "Answering yours 21st, telegrams referred to are personal, from certain members of chamber, presumably sent following their signatures to petition circulated by transportation companies interested, authorizing telegrams to be sent in members' names. They do not represent official action of this chamber. As names and signatures are unknown to us, can not acknowledge receipt on your behalf, as requested. Attitude of chamber of commerce is expressed in its resolution of March 11, copy of which you have.

I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to that date, which, I presume, is the date of the action of the chamber of commerce.

"This resolution was unanimously adopted by the board of directors of chamber and represents opinion of a large majority of its members. In obtaining signatures to the petition all influence was exercised on those from whom Pacific Mail purchases supplies and with whom it has business relations. Please file this communication with Senate committee and reaffirm chamber's attitude as expressed in resolution referred to."

SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
H. M. ROBBINS, Jr., President.

Then, I call attention also to a letter of July 18, to Mr. Wheeler from James K. Lynch, from which I read the following:

The situation has been very embarrassing since the campaign was started by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. to obtain signatures to their petition. Some of the signers since stated to different members of the committee, myself among others, that they regretted having signed, but the habit of signing appears to be incurable.

Your amendment to the Senate bill limiting the amount of coastwise cargo the steamers might carry to 50 per cent of the total cargo was, of course, intended only as a limitation, in order to insure some degree of good faith in the proposed sailing from New York to Hongkong via San Francisco and was in no way our choice or desire. This was fully understood by all the members of the board of directors of the chamber of commerce, but has been ingeniously distorted and misrepresented to the community and the members of the chamber.

I believe that the great majority of the members fully support your position on a fair statement of the case, divorced from all personalities. The furious attack that has been made upon this provision is, however, of some value in clearly indicating the absolute bad faith of Mr. Schwerin's proposal. I hope with you that Congress will relieve him of any embarrassment in this matter by excluding his ships entirely from the coastwise trade as long as there is either railroad ownership or control.

Mr. Robbins has rendered very valuable service in keeping things in line, and he has had to regard not only this particular case, but the existence of the chamber, which, as you know, has been so recently organized and contains so many discordant elements that it is no easy task to keep them going in the right direction, which for all of us should be the welfare of San Francisco. Comparatively few of the members are capable of rising beyond their own interests, and they are not even able to look at their interests with sufficient perspective to enable them to see that the temporary advantage means future disadvantage, if not ruin. It is the old story of the time when the Central Pacific Railroad tied up the shippers with contracts and drove off the clipper ships. I sincerely hope that the matter will be settled at this session of Congress. I see it is somewhat complicated through the international question that has been raised by the Foreign Office of the British Government, but it does not appear to me that England or any other country can justly object to free tolls for coastwise ships.

* * * * * * *

Very sincerely, yours,

JAMES K. LYNCH.

Bearing upon this question is a letter written by Mr. Barneson, who has already been mentioned, to Mr. Robbins, president of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, in which he takes issue with the board of directors with respect to the attitude of the chamber on this question, and a reply to that letter, by the executive secretary, as follows:

JUNE 28, 1912.

M. H. ROBBINS, Jr., Esq.,
President San Francisco Chamber of Commerce,
San Francisco, Cal.

DEAR SIR: I have copy of your circular letter of June 27 addressed to the members of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, and desire to state that in the circular mentioned you directly avoid the point at issue, to which I will again refer, namely, the question as to whether or not the board of directors support Mr. Wheeler in the rider which has been placed in the bill under discussion before the Senate, reading as follows:

"Provided further, That no such railroad owned or controlled ship shall pass through the canal unless at least 50 per cent of its cargo, in tonnage, is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports."

The comparison drawn between the common ownership of competing and parallel railway lines and competing steamship lines owned by railroads assume that the railroad would control the waterways as it would control a common-owned competing and parallel railway line, and this is, of course, an absurd deduction. A railroad owned or controlled steamship line would be in actual competition with other lines, and it is well known that the ocean can not be controlled in the same manner that avenues of land transportation are.

Without holding the same views as to control of water transportation, it has been conceded that railroad owned or controlled ships should not use the canal in purely coastwise trade, and what is asked is that the coastwise trade should not be barred to American ships, no matter by whom they may be owned, using the canal in foreign trade, and that control of rates should be by intelligent regulation and not destruction of existing lines however owned.

The Chamber of Commerce of New York is in accord with the position taken by so many of your members, which is directly opposed to the position taken by the board of directors. The chambers of commerce of the coast are unquestionably following the lead set by the directors of this chamber, which, I claim, is not in accord with those of its members who are most vitally interested in every possible increase of facility for the carrying of freight through the canal, both for the coast and across the Pacific under American ownership.

The position taken by the directors of the chamber, which I believe does not represent the opinion of its membership, is one of discrimination against a particular interest, and, in my opinion, is directly opposed to the articles of incorporation of the chamber; the purpose of its formation, under clause 2, being to "advance, foster, and encourage domestic and foreign trade, commerce, and industry, and promote the public and commercial welfare and interests of the city and county of San Francisco, the State of California, and the Pacific coast; to establish and maintain a commercial exchange in the city and county of San Francisco; to promote the interest and convenience of its members; to inculcate just and equitable principles in trade," etc.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN BARNESON.

SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
San Francisco, Cal., June 29, 1912.

Capt. JOHN BARNESON,
Care General Petroleum Co., Alaska Commercial Building.

DEAR SIR: Your letter to President Robbins, who is absent from the city, has been duly received, and I am instructed by Vice President Horace H. Allen to transmit his reply to the same, as follows:

In your letter you make this statement:

"You directly avoid the point at issue, to which I will again refer, namely, the question as to whether or not the board of directors support Mr. Wheeler in the rider which has been placed in the bill under discussion before the Senate."

At the time of the meeting of the committee (of which you are chairman) with the board of directors on June 25, it was clearly stated, in answer to a question of your own, that the attitude of the chamber was fully expressed in the resolution adopted by the board of directors on March 11, 1912.

After your committee had presented arguments in support of its belief that the position taken by the chamber was erroneous, the directors gave careful consideration to the views presented, and, after a full discussion of the matter, authorized the president to notify you of the board's conclusion. This was done in a letter under date of June 26, reading in part as follows:

"I am instructed by the board of directors to advise you, in reply to your letter, that after mature consideration and taking into account the present stage of canal legislation negotiations in Washington, we feel that we are not justified in receding from the resolutions already passed with which you are familiar." (Mar. 11, 1912.)

Believing that other members might also be under a misapprehension in reference to the attitude of the chamber upon the question at issue, President Robbins issued the circular letter under date of June 27, to which you refer in your letter now under reply.

The position of the board, as expressed in the circular letter of June 27, was telegraphed to Mr. Wheeler, and his reply is as follows:

"Your letter completely covers the situation and describes accurately the position that I, as the chamber's representative, have all along assumed."

It would seem that the position of the chamber had been made entirely clear, and it is evident that the Senate substitute, in its original and in its present form, is adverse to the resolutions of the chamber.

The additional statements made in your letter, in support of the position which you so strongly believe to be correct, will be brought to the attention of the board, and the board will welcome you or any or all of the members of your committee, should you desire a further presentation of your views, as it would seem impossible to thoroughly discuss the problem through the medium of correspondence.

One thing must, however, be said in response to the statement of your belief that the position of the chamber is directly opposed to the articles of incorporation and the purpose of the chamber's formation and is "one of discrimination against a particular interest." You must concede that the members of the board of directors sincerely believe that their position tends to foster and encourage those factors that make for the general good.

The directors will be the first to welcome proof that they are wrong in any position they may take on any matter.

Yours, very truly,

_____,
Executive Secretary.

Then follows the circular letter referred to in this communication, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
June 27, 1912.

To the members of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce:

Some misapprehension seems to have arisen regarding the attitude of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce as to the legislation now pending in Congress relative to the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad companies and engaged in the coastwise traffic. The chamber, on March 11, 1912, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this chamber is unalterably opposed to the operation through the Panama Canal of any railroad owned or controlled ships engaged wholly or partly in coastwise traffic. We also reiterate our position, formerly expressed, that we favor and strongly urge upon Congress the enactment of laws that will exempt from canal tolls all ships sailing under the American flag engaged in coastwise traffic."

In brief, the reasons leading the board of directors to this conclusion are as follows:

The policy of existing law prevents the common ownership of competing and parallel railway lines. A competing steamship line owned by a railroad, or in common therewith, holds the same menace to competition, and should, with equal reason, be prohibited. Two railroads owned in common can not be expected to enter into actual competition, nor can the owners of a steamship line be expected to actually compete with a railroad which they also own.

The greatest benefits to be derived from the completion of the canal will arise from the encouragement of the building and operation of a sufficient number of ships to adequately carry the tonnage offered and from the maintenance of true sea-level rates. These benefits, in their fullest measure, can not be hoped for unless the conditions under which ships will operate are fairly equal.

A railroad could operate its steamships temporarily without a profit, or even at a loss, and thus discourage independent steamships from engaging in a competition in which they would be at a prohibitive disadvantage. If the building and operation of independent steamships is discouraged, and the field is left to railroad owned or controlled ships, we must, then, be in a position of having to look to the railroads themselves for benefits which the canal was constructed to bestow.

A railroad having an investment of $500,000,000 in railway lines and an investment of $25,000,000 in steamship lines can not conceivably permit the smaller investment to injuriously affect the larger.

The attitude of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce in this matter is in accord with that taken by the following organizations:

The Merchants' Association of New York.
Boston Chamber of Commerce.
Portland (Oreg.) Chamber of Commerce.
Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce.
Seattle Chamber of Commerce.
Tacoma Chamber of Commerce.
Oakland Chamber of Commerce.
Astoria Chamber of Commerce.
San Diego Chamber of Commerce.

This is a question of principle vitally affecting the entire country, and particularly the Pacific coast, and should not be considered purely in its local application.

Yours, very truly, M. H. ROBBINS, Jr., President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In the letter which the Senator from California read a moment ago, in alluding to the action of the chamber of commerce the writer said the chamber of commerce had passed the resolutions. Does the Senator understand that the chamber of commerce had any meeting whatever on the question?

Mr. WORKS. No. I do not think that meetings of the full membership of the chamber of commerce are ever held, in fact.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of how many members does the chamber of commerce consist?

Mr. WORKS. I think something between three and four thousand.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When the writer of the letter refers to the action of the chamber of commerce he means the action of the 21 directors and trustees, does he not?

Mr. WORKS. Oh, certainly. The action of the representatives of the chamber of commerce—the board of directors—through this circular letter, was sent out to all the members of the chamber of commerce, giving them opportunity to act upon it, if they desired, and the only action that has resulted from it, as I have pointed out, has been through the action of interested parties who are desirous of defeating this legislation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator state what proportion of the actual voting membership of the chamber of commerce has sent telegrams asking that the 50 per cent restriction be stricken off as to the Pacific Mail Line if allowed to go through the canal?

Mr. WORKS. That I am unable to state. I have only the information that has been compiled by the general manager and vice president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., at the instance of the Senator from Connecticut. I have not myself been over that to determine what number of persons have acted one way or the other.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator states there were 800 telegrams received by his colleague from members of the chamber of commerce on that matter.

Mr. WORKS. I said it was so stated by my colleague—that there were 800 telegrams from members of the chamber of commerce and others. My understanding is that something over 500 of those were members of the chamber of commerce; and I want to call his attention to this further fact: If the Senator desires to do so and will examine those telegrams he will find that large numbers of them are duplicated in this way: A member of the chamber of commerce will sign for himself as an individual; then he will sign as president of one corporation, vice president of another, and secretary of another corporation, and in that way multiply the number of telegrams. I think it will be found in one case that one man who acted in that way sent five telegrams, which reflected only his own sentiments. Therefore the number of telegrams actually sent, whatever may have induced the sending of them, has been materially increased by such methods.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, any duplication should be corrected, but the question remains whether a majority of the voting members of the chamber of commerce have sent telegrams protesting against this 50 per cent restriction or not. The Senator does not know about that. I will myself put in those figures later.

Mr. WORKS. I should not want to give my own word, because I do not know. The statement I have had with respect to it, from persons who profess to know, is that not nearly one-half of the chambers of commerce have sent such telegrams. I am undertaking to point out the manner in which the telegrams were procured and by whom they were actually sent as indicating, whether sent in the names of these persons or not, that they do not express the sentiment of the people who sent them, but are the acts of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.

Mr. President, I have here the views of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Los Angeles, my home city. So far as I know, no telegrams have been received from the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles protesting against the enactment of this bill. This document is in print, and is of some length, but it points out very clearly not only the attitude of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles in respect to it, but of other chambers of commerce all along the Pacific coast who were acting in conjunction with the Los Angeles chamber.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Los Angeles, Cal., July 18, 1912.

ACTION OF THE LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE IN FAVOR OF FREE TOLLS ON AMERICAN SHIPS THROUGH THE PANAMA CANAL, AND IN OPPOSITION TO RAILWAY-OWNED SHIPS ENGAGING IN COASTWISE TRADE THROUGH THE PANAMA CANAL.

To the members of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce.

GENTLEMEN: The prospective opening of the Panama Canal for business has presented some serious questions for the consideration of the commercial bodies, the business interests and the people of the Pacific coast. Two of the most important questions are:

"First. Freedom from tolls for American ships engaged in the coastwise trade through the Panama Canal; and

"Second. The prohibition of ships owned wholly or in part by transcontinental railway companies from operating through the Panama Canal."

Upon these two important questions the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce has taken a decided stand, and the board of directors think it desirable that the membership should fully know what this action has been, and the reasons therefor. While the position taken by the board has been published from time to time, doubtless there are many who have not given it careful consideration.

On October 2, 1911, a meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast was held in San Francisco, at which the Chambers of Commerce of Los Angeles, San Francisco, San Diego, Oakland, Portland, Tacoma, Seattle, and Spokane, as well as several of the chambers of commerce of the interior districts, were represented. There also were present at this meeting United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS, and Congressmen JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND and E. A. HAYES, Mr. KNOWLAND being the only representative from the Pacific States on the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

At this meeting the following preamble and resolutions were adopted by a unanimous vote of the chambers of commerce represented:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of the great national policy, amongst other things, of providing for the national defense, of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries, to provide through natural methods and to prevent monopoly of transportation, means for transportation between the various sections of the Union at the lowest possible cost, to build up and expand our commerce with foreign nations, and incidentally to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine: Be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through the canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows:

"'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting as a wise amendment to the interstate commerce law a provision prohibiting interstate commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefits of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards, which this canal was constructed to secure.'"

October 4, 1911, these resolutions were also adopted by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce in its individual capacity, and certified copies thereof were transmitted to each Member of the United States Senate and House of Representatives.

The bill providing for the operation of the Panama Canal was duly introduced into the House of Representatives with neither of the foregoing provisions, which are regarded as most important on the coast, inserted. An amendment, however, was adopted in the House of Representatives, freeing American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the payment of tolls, and also preventing the operation of interstate railway-owned ships from operating through the canal, and the bill in that satisfactory form was sent to the Senate.

In the Senate the bill was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and by that committee an amendment was inserted known as section 11, which is as follows:

"SEC. 11. That no ship owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by a railway company, or in which any railroad company has any interest whatsoever, by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly or indirectly, through any holding company or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner, shall be permitted to enter or pass through the Panama Canal if engaged in the coastwise trade between ports of the United States. That any ship of American registry, however owned or controlled, shall be permitted to operate through the canal in transoceanic trade to and from oriental or European countries. Said vessel on its way to and from said foreign countries shall be permitted to do a coastwise trade between ports of the United States and intermediate foreign ports, provided that this shall not be permitted to any ship owned or controlled in whole or in part by any railroad company except those engaged in said transoceanic trade, nor shall any coastwise trade be done by any such ship unless on a voyage to or from such transoceanic ports and not to those of Canada, Mexico, or any Central or South American ports: Provided further, That no such railroad owned or controlled ships shall pass through the canal unless at least 50 per cent of its cargo in tonnage is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports."

The new provisions of section 11 are not in conformity with the position taken by this chamber, and the following statement in regard thereto was adopted by the board of directors and transmitted to United States Senators JOHN D. WORKS and GEORGE C. PERKINS, and to each of the California Members of the House of Representatives, June 12, 1912:

"STATEMENT OF POSITION OF LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE ON PANAMA CANAL BILL.

"The Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce heartily approves the action of the House of Representatives and the United States Senate in placing in the Panama Canal bill an amendment which provides freedom from tolls for American shipping engaged in coastwise trade, and it also approves the amendment by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate, which provides that American shipping engaged in foreign trade may enjoy freedom from tolls upon entering into contract with the Government that such shipping shall be subject to impressment into the naval service of the United States in times of war.

"This chamber has also taken position in favor of the exclusion of ships owned and controlled, either wholly or in part, by railway corporations from being permitted to pass through the Panama Canal. It can not, therefore, approve the action of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, which would permit American shipping engaged in foreign trade to also engage in coastwise traffic on the same voyage through the Panama Canal. Our reasons are these:

"We have no desire to cripple the transcontinental railways in their proper line of business. We are, however, most earnest in our desire for real competition, not only between individuals and corporations which may use the Panama Canal, but between water transportation through that canal and transportation by the transcontinental railways.

"And these railways are so powerful, and their interest is so great in preventing actual competition between the Panama Canal and their own lines, that we seriously fear that real competition would be prevented if they were permitted to transport goods from one American port to another in ships engaged in either the domestic or foreign trade, passing through the Panama Canal."

July 3 and 6, 1912, wire communications were received from Mr. R. P. Schwerin, president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., stating that that company had raised $12,000,000 to build four American steamers, and with these four to create a fleet of eight steamers operating through the Panama Canal from New York to Hongkong, all steamers touching outward and homeward at San Pedro and San Francisco. Mr. Schwerin called attention to the attitude taken by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, and desired this body to reconsider its action, and especially to oppose that portion of section 11 which reads as follows:

"Provided further, That no such railroad owned or controlled ship shall pass through the canal unless at least 50 per cent of its cargo in tonnage is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports."

Mr. Schwerin adds: "We stand for all the balance of the section, and we ask your assistance that this portion of section 11 should be stricken out, as it would create a situation impossible for practical operation."

To the foregoing communication the following answer was sent to Mr. Schwerin by wire, July 10 1912:

"The board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce have given careful consideration to your telegram of July 3 to former President Slauson and of July 6 to the present president of the chamber, in regard to the provisions of bill regulating traffic through Panama Canal.

"I am instructed by the board of directors to say that the position heretofore taken by this chamber, based upon the recommendations of President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, favoring the prohibition of interstate railroads owning or controlling ships engaged in trade through the Panama Canal, has been readopted on numerous occasions by this chamber, as well as by the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, representing the Chambers of Commerce of Los Angeles, San Francisco, Oakland, San Diego, Portland, Tacoma, and Seattle. Having given your able statements of the situation careful consideration, this chamber is still unable to alter or modify its views upon the question. Letter will follow.

"H. Z. OSBORNE, President."

The letter which followed recited the recommendations of President Taft, heretofore referred to, and the statement of the position of the chamber of commerce with respect to the Panama Canal bill, as heretofore set forth, and closed as follows:

"The foregoing statement fairly expresses the position of the chamber.

"You state the opposite opinion strongly and impressively, but, as heretofore stated, the board of directors feel sure that to permit transcontinental railways to operate ships engaged in coastwise trade through the canal would be likely to prevent real competition, as was set forth in the statement of President Taft to Congress in the paragraph quoted.

"Regretting that we are unable to agree with you on so important a matter, and with great personal esteem, I am,

"Very respectfully,

"H. Z. OSBORNE, President."

The board of directors regard the matter of competition through the canal as of vital importance and believe that there will be great danger to free competition if the transcontinental railway companies, with their enormous capital and power, are permitted to operate ships engaged in the coastwise trade through the Panama Canal.

* * * * * * *

Respectfully submitted.

H. Z. OSBORNE, President.

Attest:

H. B. GURLEY, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, reference has been made in some of the communications to the 50 per cent provision of the canal bill. That resulted from the amendment which was made to the bill by the Senate committee. In order partly to test the good faith and sincerity of the representatives of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. and others who were claiming the right to have their ships pass through the canal, although owned by railroad companies, there was a provision inserted that in order to be entitled to the use of the canal they must carry at least 50 per cent of freight destined to foreign ports. That provision, as it will be seen, is being vigorously contested by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. In these telegrams that have been sent, in the protest that has been procured by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., they refer expressly to this provision of the bill and protest against it.

Mr. President, in the hearing before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals it was testified by this man Schwerin that the coastwise business was only an incident to their traffic; that what they were seeking was foreign trade; and when pressed to know how much of the freight they expected to carry or did carry was coastwise trade, he said not exceeding 10 per cent.

Now, after making that statement before the committee, and reiterating it time and again, when it is proposed to allow his ships to go through the canal with 50 per cent of coastwise trade, his company protests against it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator from California understand that they protest against that provision if the 50 per cent is taken for some period of months or a year, or does the company protest if the provision should be construed, and probably it would be, so as to require that each cargo should contain 50 per cent?

Mr. WORKS. I think, Mr. President, that the provision in the bill is ambiguous in respect to that matter. I do not think it provides specifically one way or the other.

Mr. SIMMONS. My understanding, if the Senator will pardon me, is that the steamship companies complain that under the provision as it is written in the bill they would have to have 50 per cent on each voyage, and that might bring about a very great difficulty. I understand they do not object to the provision, provided its application is so construed or the bill is so drawn that it would admit of the construction, that they were required in a given period of time to carry 50 per cent of such commerce.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

Mr. WORKS. Excuse me for a moment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I may be mistaken about that, but I have gotten that impression from an amendment somebody sent to me, accompanied with a letter suggesting that change.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not remember who sent me the amendment, and I have misplaced it.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he places that construction upon the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am rather inclined to fear it might bear that construction—so as to apply to each cargo.

Mr. WORKS. I have been interviewed by Mr. Schwerin. I think I know what are his views on the subject, and it would not make the slightest difference whether you give one construction or the other to this portion of the bill you will find the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. protesting against it just the same.

Mr. THORNTON and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield, and to whom?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. THORNTON. I did not understand there was any ambiguity in the amendment. I understood that each ship, in order to pass through the canal, must have 50 per cent of its cargo destined for oriental ports, going that way, or from oriental ports in returning, and it was for that reason that in my address to the Senate yesterday I stated I did not see how that could be practically put into operation, for it depended upon circumstances that the ships could not control. I will read the provision of the bill:

> That no such railroad owned or controlled ship shall pass through the canal unless at least 50 per cent of its cargo in tonnage is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports.

To my mind, it is perfectly plain that it means that each ship on each voyage must have 50 per cent of its cargo either for the Orient or from the Orient to this country.

Mr. WORKS. I am not very much concerned about the construction that is to be placed upon the proposed amendment to the bill, because I am opposed to the whole amendment to section 11, in whatever form it may be placed. I believe in the absolute exclusion of all railroad-owned ships from the use of the canal in the coastwise trade. We have had our experience out on the Pacific coast with that condition of things.

The Southern Pacific Co. has for years owned and controlled the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. It has throttled competition on the waters of the Pacific, and it will continue to do so if it is permitted the use of the canal under the conditions as they exist at the present time.

Only a short time ago reliable and responsible parties—shipowners—were proposing to establish a line of ships to connect with the Salt Lake Railroad Co. at the port of Los Angeles, plying between that port and the Orient. Every arrangement was made between the Salt Lake road and the shipowners to establish the line. Everything had been agreed upon satisfactorily between them. But the Southern Pacific Co. owns 50 per cent of the Salt Lake Railroad Co., and when the negotiations had been concluded the president of the Salt Lake Railroad Co. said he would have to refer the matter to the president of the Southern Pacific Co.

The Southern Pacific Co. was interested in what would be a competing line. It was running and operating the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., and nothing was heard from that time on of the proposition to establish a line from Los Angeles to the Orient.

Of course, the Southern Pacific Co., being the owner of one-half of the stock of the Salt Lake Railroad Co., was in a position where it could prevent the making of any such contract as would bring any steamship company in competition with its own steamers.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to some declarations made by Mr. Schwerin as indicating his lack of good faith in dealing with the question of this amendment authorizing the passage of their ships through the canal if they were carrying 50 per cent of freight for the Orient. At a hearing before the committee, this occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. How does their tonnage to go through the canal compare with the tonnage you anticipate running through the canal—when they get their new boats completed, how much tonnage will they have?

Mr. SCHWERIN. They will be in a position to carry 1,250,000 tons per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. And the four ships which you are having built of 37,000 tons each will carry——

Mr. SCHWERIN (interposing). Our present four and the four which we are building would carry coastwise 162,000 tons of freight.

The CHAIRMAN. As compared with over a million?

Mr. SCHWERIN. As compared with a million and a quarter.

The CHAIRMAN. And you propose, as I understand your claim, that these will engage in the foreign trade and only want the privilege of stopping at Pacific coast ports? What proportion of your business do you estimate would be coastwise?

Mr. SCHWERIN. I estimate that the coastwise business would be 10 per cent of our foreign trade.

The CHAIRMAN. Once more: What part of your business is passenger and what part is freight? State it in revenue.

Mr. SCHWERIN. As a matter of revenue, I should say that 90 per cent of our tonnage is in passenger business.

Then, I have here a number of extracts from Mr. Schwerin's statement before the committee bearing upon this question, and without taking up the time of the Senate to read those statements I will ask leave to insert them in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SCHWERIN'S INSINCERITY.

HEARINGS BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE.

(Page 1056.)

Mr. SCHWERIN. If we have seven or eight thousand tons of Oriental cargo and have 2,000 tons of spare space, and a shipper wants to send his San Francisco freight out by us—no; it can not go.

Mr. J. A. MARTIN of Colorado. You want to do both coastwise and foreign business?

Mr. SCHWERIN. Only coastwise business when we have open space.

Mr. EVARTS. All that we are asking is to go into this foreign trade, to be permitted to do the foreign trade. * * * Now, there isn't a transcontinental railroad company that has any intention of putting a single ship between New York and San Francisco.

HEARINGS BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. SCHWERIN. These ships are American ships. * * * We want to operate them, not in coastwise trade—that is not our trade—we want to operate them through the canal in the oriental trade, but we want the right that an American bottom ought to have—that is, if we have empty space we can fill it coastwise. * * *

(Page 2645.)

Mr. SCHWERIN. I ask you to let us build these ships, not that we want to go into the coastwise trade, but, as I stated before, to continue in the oriental trade. * * *

(Page 2657.)

Mr. SCHWERIN. You entirely mistake this proposition. We do not want freight from New York to San Francisco. We want freight from New York to the Orient. The freight to San Francisco is merely incidental.

* * * * * * *

Senator CUMMINS. There is a good deal of freight between the two coasts that must pass somehow or other?

Mr. SCHWERIN. There are plenty of ships that will carry it—American ships.

Senator CUMMINS. You want to carry your share, do you not?

Mr. SCHWERIN. No, sir; I am after the oriental traffic. I consider that within a year, probably, after this line is operating we would have as much oriental traffic as we wanted or could carry.

Senator CUMMINS. And you would cease to do business between the two coasts?

Mr. SCHWERIN. Except passenger business.

* * * * * * *

SENATE COMMITTEE HEARINGS.

Mr. EVARTS. The trade from New York to the Orient will be done by eight ships sailing every two weeks. We expect eventually to fill these boats practically full for the oriental trade. We may not do so at first. Suppose we do not do it at first; the eight ships average, say, 10,000 tons each. Suppose we make it the worst possible and say we do not fill half of them for the Orient; suppose there was 5,000 tons in each filled for San Francisco; that would make 10,000 tons a month or 120,000 tons a year. * * * There are 120,000 at the very outside. We probably will carry eventually only oriental cargo, and we may not carry any coastwise cargo. But assume the very worst; that is, that we carry 120,000 tons a year; is that going to throttle the canal? Is this ruinous competition? * * *

Mr. EVARTS. A ship engaged in the foreign trade loading for the Orient, and simply loading for San Francisco the space which is not loaded for the Orient, could not in any serious way interfere with the port-to-port business through the canal

Suppose we should load for the Orient, and suppose at the beginning—it would not be for long after this line is established, but for a period of time suppose in the beginning we are short 5,000 tons a ship. That would be 10,000 tons a month or 120,000 tons a year. * * * How can that be any serious menace to anybody?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, it occurred to me that if you could devote such a portion of your whole as you wanted to to the carrying of goods from New York and loading and unloading any portion that you wanted to at the canal, at Panama or Colon, and then proceed to stop at every port up the Pacific coast, that might be quite a substantial indulgence in domestic coastwise commerce, which would be inconsistent with the policy of the Government prohibiting railroad-owned steamships from going through the canal, if they should adopt that policy.

Mr. SCHWERIN. This new line is being presented in good faith and contemplates the operation of steamers from New York to the Orient, and does not contemplate a coastwise line from New York to Pacific coast ports. I wish you would bear that in mind, for it seems to me, in view of the fact that to-day we have none of this business and that is the business we are going after, and the coastwise business is merely incidental, full weight of this statement must be considered as against Mr. Boole's irresponsible statement of the Harriman lines competing with themselves for oriental traffic.

(Page 300.)

Mr. SCHWERIN. * * * As I have stated, the entire potentiality of the vessels must be utilized in order to make it profitable, and if it failed to fill with oriental cargo—it may be a thousand or fifteen hundred tons—it should be able to earn on that space with coast cargo.

(Page 594.)

Mr. SCHWERIN. Our idea is not to take Pacific coast cargo unless compelled. We do not want Pacific coast cargo; we want the long-haul cargo; that is what we would naturally go after.

(Page 782.)

The CHAIRMAN. * * * What proportion of your business do you estimate would be coastwise?

Mr. SCHWERIN. I estimate that the coastwise business would be 10 per cent of our foreign trade.

The CHAIRMAN. Once more: What part of your business is passenger and what part is freight? State it in revenue.

Mr. SCHWERIN. As a matter of revenue, I should say that 90 per cent of our tonnage is in passenger business.

Mr. WORKS. The views of the people generally on the Pacific coast with respect to legislation of this kind are very well stated in some editorials which I have clipped from the San Francisco Chronicle. I have one of date of Friday, July 12, 1912:

[Editorial from San Francisco Chronicle, Friday, July 12, 1912.]

The British embassy has requested, through the State Department, that final action on canal legislation be deferred until a statement can be filed on behalf of the British Government. Senator BRANDEGEE, in charge of the bill, replies in effect that the necessity for action is urgent, but that any statement filed before action will be carefully considered.

While it is not safe to assume knowledge of the statement until it is made, our State Department is presumably well acquainted with British views of the proper interpretations of the treaty, and the statement in the dispatches that the objection is to the prohibition of the use of the canal by ships owned by railroads which are natural competitors of the Panama route may be correct.

If that be the case, one finds it difficult to imagine what ground for the objection the British Government finds in the treaty. We are unable to discover anything bearing on that subject at all.

But, at any rate, if such a prohibition is good for the people of the United States it is equally good for the people of Canada, who will certainly benefit as much as we will be competition between ships and railroads.

The Canadian Pacific Railroad, which is heavily subsidized by Canada, operates ships both upon the Atlantic and Pacific, which is an excellent thing as tending to reduce freight rates, good for the railroad as contributing to increase the volume of its traffic, and quite within the legitimate functions of a transcontinental carrier.

But it is not good for Canada, any more than it is good for the United States, that ships owned by transcontinental railroads shall be operated through the canal.

Everybody understands the reason, which is that such ships will not make rates which will diminish the profits of the railroads which own them, nor will any competing regular lines make rates lower than the railroad-owned ships, because that would invite a rate war in which the losses would be carried by the proprietary railroad until competition was driven off.

This is not a matter of theory but of experience. For years the Southern Pacific Co. used its Panama line not to promote cheaper sea rates, but to prevent them. And by that conduct, continued through many years, it forfeited all claim to any considerations of equity, even if there had been any, which there were not. Having put itself in the position of a public enemy, it must expect to be treated as such, because there is no other safe way to treat it.

The whole wretched business is deliberately and intentionally obscured. Nothing will prevent the Pacific Mail ships from using the canal if the Southern Pacific Co. will dispose of its Pacific Mail stock. And if it does not desire to do that it has only to dispose of its Panama line and go out of that business.

The Canadian railroads have now no investments in the Panama route. It is not to the interest of the Canadians that they should ever have any such investments. Any canal legislation which will make such ownership impossible is in the interest of the Canadian people, no matter what the Canadian Government, possibly inspired by Canadian railroads, may say about it.

I also desire to include in my remarks an editorial from the same paper on the 14th of July:

DEFINES POSITION OF CHAMBER ON CANAL—EXPLAINS THE OPPOSITION TO ITS USE BY COASTWISE SHIPPING OWNED BY RAILROADS—SAYS IT'S AN OLD FIGHT—CHAMBER OF COMMERCE JOURNAL WILL TELL OF THE FIRM STAND TAKEN BY THAT BODY.

The opposition of the chamber of commerce to the use of the Panama Canal by coastwise shipping owned or controlled by railroads is to be fully defined in the forthcoming number of the Chamber of Commerce Journal. In part the Journal will say:

"This is one of the most serious questions of economic policy now before the people of this country. Nothing less than the efficiency of the Panama Canal as a factor in transportation depends upon the outcome. The people of San Francisco have a particularly vital concern in it, and the directors of the chamber have unanimously taken their position in the matter for these reasons:

"First. San Francisco, in common with the rest of the country, has a right to the benefit of free, open, and fair competition among carriers, and to the lowest freight rates that such competition will produce.

"Second. It will not get the benefits if the railroads are permitted to operate ships through the canal or control their operation.

"Third. A railroad can not honestly compete with itself, whether by means of box cars or ships.

"Fourth. Steamer lines owned by railroads would be used by their owners to drive other shipping out of the canal business and prevent any more from engaging in it. The railroads would doubtless be glad to absorb the loss in order to destroy competition.

"Fifth. Having abolished such competition, the steamer lines would merely continue to hold the route for their owners.

"Sixth. The economic effect would be exactly as if the canal had never been dug.

"Seventh. To bring about that result is the main interest of transcontinental railroads in the pending canal bill, and, we believe, the explanation of the fight they have been making for permission to operate ships through the canal in the coastwise trade."

"The chamber of commerce demands that no railroad-owned or controlled shipping be permitted to use the Panama Canal in coastwise traffic to any extent, or in any proportion, or on any conditions whatever.

RAILROADS WILL CONTROL.

"Two railroads owned in common can not be expected to enter into actual competition, nor can the owners of a steamship line be expected actually to compete with a railroad which they also own.

"A railroad having an investment of $500,000,000 in railway lines and $25,000,000 in steamship lines can not conceivably permit the smaller investment injuriously to affect the larger.

"The greatest benefits to be derived from the completion of the canal will arise from the encouragement of the building and operation of a sufficient number of ships to carry adequately the tonnage offered, and from the maintenance of true sea-level rates. These benefits, in their fullest measure, can not be hoped for unless the conditions under which ships will operate are fairly equal.

"A railroad could operate its steamships temporarily without a profit, or even at a loss, and thus discourage independent steamships from engaging in a competition in which they would be at a prohibitive disadvantage.

"If the building and operation of independent steamships is discouraged and the field is left to railroad-owned or controlled ships, we must, then, be in the position of having to look to the railroads themselves for benefits which the canal was constructed to bestow.

"The opposition of the chamber to the use of the Panama Canal by vessels going coastwise and owned or controlled by railways was not conceived in a corporation-baiting spirit, nor was it aimed at any particular steamship or railroad company. Its purpose was to defend the commerce of San Francisco against any possibility of transportation monopoly and to prevent a bitter disappointment of the hopes which the people of this city have been warranted in basing upon the canal as an economic factor.

A GREAT QUESTION.

"The question is larger than that of any one railroad or steamship line, and the possible loss to the coast is far greater than any one corporation could cause. If half the oriental trade develops that we may reasonably expect, the volume of shipping in the Pacific will equal, and probably exceed, that in the Atlantic. Not 3 but 8 or 10 transcontinental railroads will have their termini at San Francisco. They will be compelled by economic necessity to keep fleets of great vessels to feed their lines at this end and to carry to China and Japan the products of the Middle West. If these fleets are permitted to use the Panama Canal, the same economic necessity will compel them to combine against independent shipping, and with the railroads willing to defray operating losses, drive this independent shipping out of the coast-to-coast traffic.

"In this matter the merchant, the manufacturer, the home owner, the workingman are all interested in some degree. Some are more concerned with it than others, but the city and the whole Pacific coast have a vital interest in the question, and this organization would be of little value if it did not recognize that interest now and do its utmost to defend it.

"Opponents of the course of the chamber have suggested regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission as a protection against unfair competition and its inevitable monopoly. But, as shown in the letter above, the proposal has been put squarely up to the Interstate Commerce Commission by the President of the United States, and the commission asserts that it does not believe it could 'secure to the public the same favorable rates which would result from unrestrained competition.' In other words, it does not believe the difficulty, if created, can be handled that way, and does not think it should be charged with the performance of an impossibility. It would seem to be the part of common sense not to permit the danger to arise.

"Nobody can doubt that if there were no railroad-owned or controlled steamships there would be a tremendous volume of independent shipping to use the canal, and that the effect on transcontinental freight rates would be of the greatest benefit to the trade of this city and coast. Hence the elimination of railroad-controlled ships as a factor in canal business could cost us nothing important, while their admission to the canal could be relied upon to work out its entire destruction in an economic sense. San Francisco, Oakland, Los Angeles, San Diego, Seattle, Portland, Tacoma, the coast in general, would never derive from it any more benefit than the transcontinental railroads were willing to concede.

POSITION OF CHAMBER.

"As the Panama Canal bill stands at this writing, in the form in which it was reported back by the Senate committee, it provides that a railroad-controlled ship may use the canal, provided half her cargo is going to or coming from a foreign port. The insertion of this proviso was merely a temporary compromise. The position of the chamber has been that no railroad owned or controlled vessel should be permitted to use the canal at all in the coastwise trade, and that is still its position.

NOT A NEW FIGHT.

"There is nothing new about this fight, except its form. It is part of the old railroad opposition to any Panama Canal at all—an opposition that for at least 30 years has been unremitting in vigilance and astonishingly clever in device. Never avowing its origin or showing its hand, it sought, by means of misleading statistics in editorials and magazine articles to make the people believe there was no use digging the Panama Canal; that if the Panama Canal were to be dug it ought to be dug at Nicaragua, and if at Nicaragua, then Panama was better; that if it were dug nobody would use it, because it would still be shorter from New York to Hongkong by way of Suez; and finally if the Government in its unwisdom was bound to dig it, it should be a sea-level canal—in other words, one that could not be finished in a generation. And such a reach did the opposition have that a high official of the Colombian Government, explaining Colombia's failure to renew the French concession, once assigned as one reason 'the transcontinental railroad lobby at Bogota.'

"Members of the chamber that have signed the petition in opposition to the stand of the chamber in this matter ought to reflect on these things and ask themselves which policy is the more likely to 'keep the American flag on the seas' in a way beneficial to commerce and the country—permitting railroad vessels to run the independent shipping out of the business, or making the field inviting to independent owners by securing them against unequal competition from the railroads.

"The San Francisco Chamber of Commerce has stood, and will continue to stand for the exclusion from the canal of the unfair competition of railroad owned or controlled ships in the coastwise trade in order that there may be fair and lasting competition among independent lines."

This editorial explains specifically the position of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco as set out in the Chamber of Commerce Journal.

In an editorial in the same paper, of date July 15, 1912, this statement is made:

Never forget that the argument for the Pacific Mail in this case is wholly trumped up. It can get the use of the canal either by securing a divorce from the Southern Pacific Co. or by abandoning its coastwise traffic. If it will do neither, let it take the consequences.

It must be remembered that it does not come before the public with clean hands. It has violated all its obligations in the past, and has no claim to the slightest consideration. Whatever it gets is a matter of grace.

Mr. President, I might take up the time of the Senate in the discussion of the merits of this question of free passage and the exclusion of railroad-owned ships from the canal, but instead of that I have gone through the testimony of the various witnesses who appeared before the Senate committee, and have culled out in a brief way from that testimony the statements that each of the witnesses made relating to this subject. I ask leave, instead of commenting on the testimony myself, to include, as a part of my remarks, the statements made before the committee.

I do this mainly because they are men who have made a study of these questions. They are much more competent to pass upon them and determine what is right and just as between the public and the shipowners and the railroad owners, and I think what they say upon the subject will be very much more valuable than anything I could say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the matter referred to will be inserted in the RECORD as requested.

The matter referred to is as follows:

(Page 86.)

STATEMENT OF MR. ADRIAN H. BOOLE, OF WASHINGTON, D. C.

Prior to 1907 I had been engaged continuously in the over-sea steamship business in this country for 25 years.

* * * * * * *

Now, tolls on our domestic commerce—going from coast to coast—is an entirely different matter, it seems to me. And, were I not an advocate of shipping, I would strongly urge free tolls on that class of shipping, because any toll will be a tax on the consumers of the country; it will not affect the steamers carrying the traffic. And any toll on domestic commerce is not only going to increase the cost of its transportation on the water, but it will on the land also, from coast to coast, as, in the adjustment of their rates to meet new conditions, the railroads will take into account the cost to a steamer between coasts. But I do not wish to be understood as asking for free tolls for coastwise shipping, being a shipping man.

The charge of a toll will not destroy water-borne traffic through the Panama Canal; it may hamper it a bit, but it will not kill it. But what will kill it will be monopolistic control of our coast terminals and the steamers by the railroads interested in regulating that kind of competition with themselves. And if the canal is to serve any useful purpose for the people who have built it, that sinister control must be prohibited by law from using the canal. But I will speak about this a little later.

Senator BRISTOW. If it will not disturb Mr. Boole, I would like to inquire if there is any more reason why one should earn interest on the money that is invested in the Panama Canal than on the money that is invested in the improvement of the Mississippi River or New York Harbor?

Mr. BOOLE. I do not think so. My opinion about the function of this canal is that it should be operated in the interest of our people, the proprietors of the canal, and the only way I can see how that may be done is to let their commerce go through free; that is, our own domestic commerce. Where the buyer or seller has to pay the transportation, the cost of interchange has got to be borne by either the one or the other, and, therefore, you have got to tax the industries of the country if you are going to impose a toll on domestic commerce. That does not aply on foreign commerce from this country. You can make the buyer in the foreign country pay the toll, if you can get it out of him in competition with other countries, but you can not do that where your buyer is in your own country; and then, remember, he has been already taxed to build the canal—the same as you have.

Now, if this prohibitive feature of the bill aims to prevent the making of any terminal arrangements that carry with them preferential or discriminatory conditions, then some remedy for the situation as it exists to-day in Boston, and in most of our ports, should be created in the bill. I am not opposing the segregation of rail and water interests, but merely wish to point out what seems to me a danger in enacting incomplete regulatory legislation.

I may add that this very matter is dealt with somewhat in the present rivers and harbors bill in the House, H. R. 21477. I would like to insert it at this point, but I will not take the time to read it.

The matter referred to is on page 61 of H. R. 21477, and is as follows:

"(a) The general location and description of water terminals and the extent and method of their use by water carriers and their general efficiency, and whether open to use by all water carriers on equal terms, and such information as may be accessible as to the terms and conditions of use.

"(b) Whether physical connection exists between such water terminals and the railroads or railroads serving the same territory or municipality, and also whether there exists between any of the water carriers operating upon waters under improvement or heretofore improved and any railroad or railroads, a mutual contract for interchange of traffic by prorating as to such long-distance traffic as may be desired to be carried partly by rail and partly by water to its destination."

Senator BRISTOW. Are you through with that feature of the matter?

Mr. BOOLE. Yes, sir.

Senator BRISTOW. The provision of the bill referred to simply requires that any steamship that uses the canal shall have exactly the same privileges over any railroad and over all railroads, and that there can be no agreements between that railroad and one particular line to the detriment of any other steamship line that seeks to use the canal, and that the railroads will have to treat all the steamships upon exact equality. That is what is sought to be provided for in the bill.

Mr. BOOLE. Certainly; and this question of terminal control is as important as anything else, because if you do effectuate the use of the canal for independent shipping and the railroads then control all the tidewater frontage of what practical use is it? Of no use at all.

* * * * * * *

Now, with the indulgence of this committee, I propose to analyze the proposition which the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. is now urging before Congress as justification for railroads to control competing water routes and to operate such steamers through the Panama Canal. I will leave it for the members of this committee to deduce whether the real purpose sought is disclosed in the argument used.

On March 5 last Mr. R. P. Schwerin, vice president and general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., of San Francisco, appeared with counsel before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House. The Pacific Mail Steamship Co., as you all know, is controlled through stock ownership by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., which in turn is part of the great Harriman system of transcontinental railroads. The president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. is Mr. Robert S. Lovett, chairman of the board controlling the Harriman roads.

Mr. Schwerin stated to the committee that his company was desirous of building four fast passenger steamers of something like 17 knots speed, so as to keep the American flag on the ocean. Mr. Schwerin's interest in the American flag and his references to it are profuse throughout his testimony. I would like to read some of them just to show the marked affection of the Southern Pacific Railroad for the American flag, but I will not take the committee's time to do that.

Mr. Schwerin stated that these four steamers were to cost $3,000,000 each, and the picture was pressed upon the committee that it would cost $2,000 a day to operate each steamer (the interest on the investment alone would amount to $600 a day). It was also distinctly stated that they were to be built primarily for the oriental trade; not for the coastwise trade, but for the oriental trade, and they were to trade from New York to the Orient.

Mr. Schwerin's exact words were:

"It seemed to me that if we could run from New York to the Orient, operating a line of some 25,000 miles, and passing through the scenic route of the canal, and to the Pacific coast of America, and to the Hawaiian Island ports, and to the Japanese ports, and to the Philippines, and finally to Hongkong, that we would create a tourist route unequaled in the world. We could never live on the Pacific Ocean on freight business alone. That would have been absolutely impossible. Our life and blood depended on the passenger business, and therefore it would be manifestly ridiculous for us to build ships operating on this line from New York to the Orient unless we undertook to handle a large class of passenger business of the highest type and of the highest revenue."

Now, $12,000,000 were to be spent on just these four steamers, to trade from New York to the Orient, not from San Francisco, where the company already has large and expensive terminals and where the vessels would best and most directly serve this controlling stock interest in the company, namely, the railroad-stock interest, but from New York, where they would divert valuable oriental traffic from this railroad interest, already controlling the steamship project.

Not only that, but where these expensive steamers would have to meet the keenest competition in the world, via the Suez route, with the cheaply operated foreign "tramp," which Mr. Schwerin distinctly stated fixed the rate for the mail steamer. The "tramps," furthermore, were to have the advantage of a route 1,500 nautical miles shorter than the one proposed by Mr. Schwerin for his four steamers. The distance from New York to Hongkong via Suez, Colombo, and Singapore (the usual route traveled from the westward) is 11,673 nautical miles, but the distance from New York to Hongkong via Panama, over the route proposed for these four steamers, is 13,188 nautical miles, viz, New York to San Francisco, 5,262 miles; San Francisco to Honolulu, 2,100 miles; Honolulu to Yokohama, 3,445 miles; Yokohama to Manila, 1,753 miles; and Manila to Hongkong, 628 miles; total, 13,188 miles, against but 11,673 for the foreign tramp.

Now, that difference of 1,515 miles would save at least six days' steaming for the tramp, and for the size of steamer loading to the Orient it would be worth at least $3,000 to the owner, so that that amount, in addition to all other economies from the cheaper cost of operation, would all go to intensify the competition for these fast and expensively operated steamers proposed by Mr. Schwerin. But that situation has no terrors for the project. Mr. Schwerin made it very clear that he was going after the oriental trade from New York.

Mr. BOOLE. Volume 4 of the hearings before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Mr. Schwerin testifies as follows:

"On the contrary, I shall do my level best to develop all the business to the Orient through the canal that I can possibly develop."

As the House committee had no bill before it that contemplated in any way the inhibition of railroad-owned steamers from engaging in any foreign trade whatsoever, the fact was pointed out to Mr. Schwerin. The suggested legislation then before the committee did, however, contemplate the prohibition of all railroad-owned steamers from using the canal for coastwise business, but only the coastwise trades were under consideration. Mr. Schwerin then explained that these four steamers were to be built too large for the oriental trade—the trade for which they were intended—and he therefore might find it necessary at times to fill up space at New York out of coastwise traffic; he disclaimed that as being his intention, however, unless driven to it, but before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce he admitted he would probably have to.

Mr. Schwerin made it very clear in his testimony that any prohibition against railroad-owned steamers using the Panama Canal, if enacted into law, would cause his oriental-steamship project to fade away, notwithstanding it was totally unaffected by such legislation.

Mr. BOOLE. I would limit their use of the Panama Canal to foreign trades that were noncompetitive trades. I would prohibit their using the canal as a commerce destroyer; that is, using their ships through the Panama Canal as commerce destroyers in competition with themselves. If you want real live competition, you have got to take these two instrumentalities, the railroads and the water lines, and keep them separate; and I do not see how you can allow them to have a common ownership and then regulate that common ownership. The only effectual way is to separate it, and separate it by law. Now, whether that is the proper thing to do in this Panama Canal legislation, whether you want to go that far or not, so as to make this legislation general, as Mr. Teal suggested in his testimony the other day, I am not prepared to discuss; but I do think that the Panama Canal legislation should include in it an inhibition against its use by railroads.

Senator O'GORMAN. Do you believe generally, excluding all consideration of the Panama Canal itself, that generally there should be a divorcement of railroad interest from local shipping interest in the country?

Mr. BOOLE. You are speaking now as a general proposition?

Senator O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. BOOLE. I think there would be a very much healthier condition in the country.

* * * * * * *

Senator BRISTOW. Excuse me, Mr. Boole, but did not Mr. Evarts state that he was the general attorney for the Southern Pacific Railroad?

Mr. BOOLE. No; he did not; he said he was counsel for the Harriman system.

Senator BRISTOW. Oh, the Harriman system.

Mr. BOOLE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not know of personal knowledge what his relations are, but it goes without saying that the counsel of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., and its general managers, if the majority of the stock of the Pacific Mail Co. is owned by the Southern Pacific Co., is in such a relation there that it does not, in my opinion, make any difference whether a man is counsel for one or the other.

Senator TOWNSEND. And I am very certain that it was shown here that Mr. Evarts, while connected with the Harriman lines, was connected with the Southern Pacific.

The CHAIRMAN. My personal impression is, though it is simply from hearsay, that when Mr. Lovett became president of the Southern Pacific after Mr. Harriman's death, Mr. Evarts, who was then assistant counsel under Lovett, became general counsel for either the Southern Pacific or the Union Pacific.

Senator BRISTOW. All of them; the whole Harriman system.

The CHAIRMAN. All of them; and for the purpose of this case I think we can safely assume that Mr. Evarts is in the confidence of all those interests and speaks for them.

Senator BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. BOOLE. It is entirely satisfactory to me, Mr. Chairman, if the committee has that belief that there is a relation between the Pacific Mail and the Southern Pacific. They are trying to state that there is no relation, so far as management is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not believe there is a Senator on this committee that has the slightest doubt that the Southern Pacific controls the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. and can dictate its policy at any time it likes.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. You do not want to misquote Mr. Schwerin?

Mr. BOOLE. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. He said that if he did not build these boats he did not know where the capital was coming from to build the others. Now, you may be entirely right that there will be plenty of capital; but he did not say that there would not be.

Mr. BOOLE. The inference is that the four boats would not be placed on the ocean unless it was done by him.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that was his opinion.

Senator TOWNSEND. Do you believe the railroads are going to build a vast number of boats if the law is left as it is?

Mr. BOOLE. I believe they will control the water situation from coast to coast.

Senator TOWNSEND. That is, they will put on a great number of boats?

Mr. BOOLE. They will do whatever is necessary to control that situation; and I base that belief on 25 years' experience in operating steamers, where we had to get the traffic from the railroads. It is not an academic theory with me.

Senator TOWNSEND. This thought comes to me: I am looking at the thing to find the solution of the problem that is best for the people. I do not give a rap for your boats, or for any other boats. I do not think we are here to legislate for your benefit, or for the benefit of the railroads, but we are here to legislate for the benefit of the people, if we can get at it.

Mr. BOOLE. I agree with you as to that.

Senator TOWNSEND. Now, if the railroads should put on a vast number of boats here to control the traffic, are the people going to be injured or benefited by it?

Mr. BOOLE. I do not say they will build more boats than are necessary; but they will take care of the water movement, and the minute there is the slightest indication of opposition to them, if it is necessary to build more boats to force them out, they will do it.

(Page 339.)

The CHAIRMAN. But you want to tie the railroads up by prohibiting them from using the canal?

Mr. BOOLE. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. I say, suppose we should allow the railroad-owned ships to use the canal, but regulate them as to their rates, and leave all their competitors free to cut rates and make what rates they can, what danger of monopoly in the canal would there be under those conditions

Mr. BOOLE. There would be this danger: That the railroads would control the terminals and, I think, would give preferential rights to their own ships, and the independent shipping, which, of course, has got to depend on the railroads for its traffic, would be at a hopeless disadvantage, except on what you call bulk cargoes.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BOOLE. I will read now from the hearings before the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, March 14, 1912. On page 423 Mr. Schwerin testified as follows:

"Mr. SCHWERIN. Take the ships that we propose"—

He is now talking about these four ships—

"We would not build these ships abroad if they were limited exclusively to the foreign trade, because we desire to run them in a combination of local and foreign trade. For instance, the line would be from New York to San Pedro, San Francisco, Honolulu, and oriental ports. The advantage to the American ship in this trade is as follows: Local business from New York to the west coast of the United States, and vice versa on the return voyage; from New York to the Hawaiian Islands and from San Francisco to the Hawaiian Islands, and vice versa. Congress also says that an American ship shall carry Government freights, provided rates are reasonable as compared with those of foreign ships. We could carry Government freight from New York and San Francisco to the Hawaiian Islands and to Manila against the foreign ship; we could carry passengers from New York to the Pacific coast, and vice versa, and from the Pacific coast to the Hawaiian Islands, and vice versa, prohibited on a foreign ship. Therefore, if the foreign-built ship was limited exclusively to the foreign trade, we would not build these ships abroad."

Now, that testimony is a direct admission that this oriental proposition is to embrace very largely domestic business.

Senator THORNTON. I ask you one more question. Assuming that it is practicable for the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate the rates of these railroad-owned or railroad-controlled boats that you object to using the canal, would you then be willing to have these boats use the canal? Do you think the danger you feared would be removed and the monopoly obviated?

Mr BOOLE. I should first want to satisfy myself that the regulation would be feasible and effectual before I, for one, would want to induce capital to indiscriminately invest in shipping for a line of business. The suggestion that I understand the Senator from Washington, Mr. JONES, has made was to regulate these railroad-owned ships, place them, and them alone, because they were part of the railroads, under the Interstate Commerce Commission, leaving the independent shipping to shift for itself. I am firmly convinced that the most effectual way of meeting this situation is going to be to absolutely prohibit the railroads from engaging in competitive business with themselves on the water, because that fact in itself will lessen the importance for them to control the terminals, and with that terminal situation relieved, with the tension removed from that, the independent shipping will come more freely together with the railroad, and with them have an interchange which I am sure is going to be very difficult to work out if the railroads are going to be permitted to control the strategic points, control the terminals, and then be permitted to engage in the water-borne traffic under regulation.

Senator THORNTON. Yes; but the question I asked you you have not quite fully answered. The question was that assuming it to be feasible to have this regulation of these railroads, would you then be willing to see them use the canal?

Mr. BOOLE. If the matter can be regulated, I would be willing to withdraw my objection. But I want to state here that I do not think it can be.

STATEMENT OF MR. JOSEPH N. TEAL, OF PORTLAND, OREG. (LAWYER).

I do not want to misunderstand anyone or to be misunderstood, but if I understood Prof. Johnson yesterday—and that will lead up to what I have to say—he treats the Panama Canal as a commercial proposition pure and simple. Evidently his theory is to make it produce revenue, and revenue sufficient to pay all expenses of operation, maintenance, and interest on the investment in the canal. Hence, if I understand his theory, the collection of tolls, and not the development of commerce of the United States, is the primary and fundamental purpose this canal is to serve. He proposes to secure traffic from all sources by a system of differential tolls. That commerce which is directly tributary to the canal, to wit, American commerce, which can not get away from it, to pay the higher toll, and the more competitive the situation necessarily the lower the toll. Therefore, the tolls of vessels plying between Europe and the southern part of South America and with Australia and New Zealand, which is a highly competitive territory, to be charged the lowest tolls. In other words, as I do not suppose he would want me to say that he proposes to base the tolls upon the theory of charging what the traffic will bear, I will put it in another way, and say he proposes to charge no more than the traffic will bear.

He proposes also to charge tolls on all vessels, coastwise or foreign, to place no restrictions upon the class of vessels or the ownership of them using the canal, except of a regulative character on the ships to which regulation would be applicable, which would be coastwise ships in domestic trade. In other words, to operate the canal purely as a private corporation would operate it to secure a return upon the investment as such, without giving very much consideration to the benefits the country as a whole might secure from its operation in a different way.

If I have not misapprehended his position as he stated it yesterday, then I desire to say that the people of the Pacific coast take exactly and distinctly the opposite view. They believe the purposes in building this canal were two: First, military necessity; second, commercial benefit. And when I speak of commercial benefit I do not speak of it in the sense of simply a matter of collecting tolls from the people of the United States on its commerce. We look upon the Panama Canal—and I will say that I am not expressing personal opinions—speaking from a domestic standpoint and from the standpoint of the United States, as a part of the interrelated waterway system of this country. President Taft has so referred to it two or three times. He has also referred to it "as part of our coast line." I do not think there is a single member of the Cabinet who has any jurisdiction over the canal or the uses it is intended to serve but considers it exactly in the same way.

* * * * * * *

It was suggested by Prof. Johnson yesterday that its cost might justify a departure from this principle. The State of New York, but one State in the Union, is expending about $120,000,000 in improving the Erie Canal and in constructing terminal facilities. I believe the investment of the State of New York in the Erie Canal will be in excess of $200,000,000 when this money has been expended. There is no thought of making a charge upon the traffic of the Erie Canal; indeed, it would defeat the very purpose for which the canal was built if a charge was made for its use. In our own State we are expending—I speak now of Oregon—large sums of money upon our rivers and upon our harbors, which money is raised by direct taxation, and we tax ourselves just as regularly for it as we do for a school tax; but I have yet to hear anyone suggest that after we secure the results we should put a tax upon commerce and prevent or handicap their use.

I will say also, that I can not conceive how it is possible anyone can justify, on this American canal, built by us, owned by us, defended by us, and operated by us, a higher charge on our domestic traffic than on foreign traffic, unless its purpose is to develop foreign traffic, and we simply use it as a revenue producer, when applied to our domestic commerce.

Mr. TEAL. Yes; I understood; but I was simply referring to that.

Whether tolls shall or shall not be charged on domestic commerce is, in my opinion, for Congress to determine, as it may deem best. I wish to insert in the record a letter written by me on this subject to Mr. Bruner, of Philadelphia.

The letter submitted is as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., March 28, 1912.

Mr. OWEN M. BRUNER, Philadelphia, Pa.
(Care of Owen M. Bruner Co.)

DEAR SIR: Your letter of March 16, addressed to the American Lumberman, submitting two questions with respect to the Panama Canal, has been handed me to answer. Your questions are as follows:

"1. Under our agreement with Great Britain, can we allow free tolls, directly or indirectly, to American ships engaged in foreign commerce?

"2. How will free tolls for American ships increase their number?"

In answer to your first question, I would say, in my opinion, the United States has the undoubted right to refund, if it so desires, all or any part of the tolls paid the Panama Canal by American ships engaged in foreign commerce. That tolls should be collected, in the first instance, from American vessels engaged in foreign trade is probably true. That this Nation or any other can refund tolls so paid can not be doubted. It is simply a question of national policy. I am now speaking of ships engaged in foreign commerce. As to ships engaged in domestic commerce, as I shall try to show, a different rule applies; and as to such commerce, in my opinion, we can, if we desire, make the canal, in the first instance, free to American ships without violating any treaty provisions.

TOLLS ON AMERICAN SHIPS ENGAGED IN FOREIGN COMMERCE.

In support of my conclusion as to our right to refund tolls paid by American ships engaged in foreign commerce I submit the following statement and authorities:

The Commissioner of Navigation, in his report to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor dated November 10, 1909, says:

"The refund of Suez Canal tolls as a means of promoting national shipping is a specific part of the policy of Russia, Austria-Hungary, and Sweden, and indirectly through their subsidies to national mail lines using the canal such refund is in effect part of the policy of Germany, France, Holland, Japan, Italy, and Spain."

The Secretary of War, in his annual report for 1911, says:

"Involved in the problem of fixing tolls is the question whether the United States has the right under the treaty to pay the tolls on American vessels using the canal.

"An examination of the treaty and the surrounding circumstances, to my mind, leaves no doubt as to the right of the United States, both legally and morally, to pay the tolls on its own vessels. This is a perfectly recognized practice in respect to the tolls of the Suez Canal, the toll rules of which canal were adopted by the United States in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for the government of the Panama Canal. At least one of our national competitors in the use of the Panama Canal—Spain—has already taken steps to provide for the payment out of her national treasury of the Panama tolls on one of the Spanish lines which will use that canal."

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor, in his annual report of 1911, has this to say, after citing the law providing that no charge shall be exacted for the use of or improvements acquired or constructed for the use of navigation by the United States:

"The policy was adopted and has been pursued without dissent, because the country realized that free navigation promotes commerce and that our commerce is as essential to the country's welfare as the great productive industries of agriculture, manufacturing, and mining * * *."

Referring to the "no discrimination" clause, he says:

"That principle will of course be observed." * * * "This may be accomplished by the enactment of a law which shall provide that all tolls and transit charges which may be imposed on public vessels of the United States and on merchant vessels of the United States for passing through the Panama Canal shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," etc. * * * "About 25 per cent of the Suez Canal tolls on foreign merchant vessels are now paid in some form from the treasuries of the nations whose flags those vessels fly, and we may assume that like provisions in at least some instances will be made for the payment of the tolls that we shall assess on foreign merchant vessels." * * * "When the future of American shipping is at stake and the domestic commerce of both seaboards and the Gulf is involved there is no reason to depart from a principle which has been so constantly invoked * * *."

"Our merchant ships and shipyards are as essential to the Nation as our battleships." * * * "It is feasible to use the canal for the promotion of American navigation in a manner consistent with treaty obligations, with precedent at home and abroad, and with our fixed policy of untaxed navigation on improved waterways."

In his message of December 21, 1911, President Taft says:

"I am very confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same to everyone; but when we are dealing with our own ships the practice of many governments of subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, an equivalent remission of tolls, can not be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal."

From the foregoing it appears that not only the United States, but any nation, has the power under the treaty to refund all or any part of the tolls paid by their vessels using the Panama Canal. It is a question of policy to be decided by each nation, and will be decided by them in their own interests. No one would or could question the right of Great Britain or Germany to pass a law to reimburse their vessels for tolls paid, and in face of the intense commercial rivalry existing between foreign nations, as well as with us, it can not be doubted they will make provision for such reimbursement.

TOLLS OF VESSELS ENGAGED IN DOMESTIC COMMERCE.

In my opinion the question of whether a toll shall be exacted on vessels engaged in this commerce is purely a matter of domestic concern. Foreign nations can not engage in this traffic. It is limited by law to vessels flying the American flag. Hence there can be no discrimination or inequality of treatment, and in the nature of things the treaty could not apply to a subject in which one of the parties had no concern.

So far as respects domestic commerce—that is, coast to coast movement—the Panama Canal is a part of our interrelated waterway system, and we can make it free or not as we will. President Taft, in a recent address before the American Society for Judicial Settlement of International Disputes, said:

"But we built the canal as part of our coast line and to double the efficiency of our Navy," etc.

This being true, on principle and in practice, there is no more reason for charging tolls on domestic commerce at Panama than for charging such commerce for the use of any other waterway improvement of the United States, and as I have heretofore stated, with the exception of the Panama Canal, no charges can be exacted for the use of any improvement for the benefit of navigation constructed by or belonging to the United States.

Panama was excepted from the operation of this law because, and only because, we did not care to bind ourselves to maintain a free waterway for the use of vessels of foreign countries.

The case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332), decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, would seem to be directly in point. In this case the court passed upon the question of the right of a State to discriminate between domestic and foreign commerce in the application of its pilotage laws. A British vessel protested against the payment of certain charges on the ground that they were in violation of treaty rights, inasmuch as the pilotage charges discriminated in favor of American ships engaged in domestic commerce. The treaty provision was as follows:

"That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States."

The court, in discussing this phase of the case, at page 344, says:

"Neither the exemption of coastwise steam vessels from pilotage, resulting from the law of the United States, nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels, created by the State law, concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and, therefore, any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply, without discrimination, to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign."

I have, perhaps, given more time to the discussion of these questions than you desired or is necessary, but I felt I should not only give you my opinion, but my reasons justifying it.

HOW WILL FREE TOLLS INCREASE OUR SHIPS?

Free tolls will tend to increase the merchant marine of this country for the same reason that the removal of any restriction on commerce tends to increase it or the elimination of cost of production tends to increase the use of any product. If all our commerce, foreign as well as domestic, through the canal was toll free, the effect would be the greater, but even if applied to domestic traffic only its effect will be pronounced. This is not to say that free tolls is the only or indeed the best means of increasing our merchant marine, but such as it is, it is one step in the right direction. It will at any rate remove one shackle. It is self-evident a toll is a tax either on the ship or cargo. It is a charge some one must pay, and in the last analysis the consumer will pay it. It is proposed by the bill pending in Congress and introduced by the House committee having the matter in charge that tolls be levied on a basis of $1.25 net registered ton. It is a simple matter to figure what a ship will pay when her tonnage is known.

The effect will ultimately be that the charge will appear in the rate. To say that on silks or articles of light weight and high cost such a charge would not be felt is begging the question. To appreciate the effect the rate must be applied to the commodities that ordinarily move by water. When thus applied its effect is at once apparent. The commodities affected will be those of comparatively low cost, in common use, and in which the freight rate is an important factor. From the Pacific coast the movement will consist largely of agricultural products—fruits, barley, etc.—salmon, wool, certain grades and quality of lumber, asphalts, etc. From the Atlantic and Gulf coasts and interior points of production and manufacture the movement will consist largely of steel products, canned goods, coal, rice, hardwoods, cotton piece goods, etc. Many of these articles are not produced directly on the coast, but at interior points. Therefore any additional charge added to a normal water rate necessarily by just that amount limits the ability of the commodity to reach the coast on the one hand and the distributive area on the other. In other words, limits the tonnage offering, and the more tonnage the more ships and the less tonnage the fewer ships. Indeed, it may be said without question the interior is more directly interested in the toll question than the coast points. If the tolls were so high as to prevent the use of the canal, the coasts could still use Magellan or Tehuantepec, but the interior sections would be handicapped. Without discussing some of our archaic shipping laws, which seem to have been enacted to prevent the development of an American merchant marine, let us note the effect under the toll system.

Substantially everything we produce in this country is in competition with that produced in foreign countries. With cheaper ships, lower operating expense, and not considering the possibility of foreign countries repaying tolls on their own vessels, we will be under a resulting handicap in our own markets; this considered simply as a transportation question. As illustrative, it is known British Columbia produces the same kind of lumber as that produced in Washington and Oregon. A British Columbia manufacturer can use vessels of any nation for carrying his products to any American port. On the other hand, we are limited to vessels flying the American flag. The result is that charters are always from $2.50 to $3 a thousand higher from our ports to ports on the Atlantic coast than from British Columbia to the same ports. Concede for the present there is a protective duty of, say, $1.50 per thousand on lumber. Nevertheless the difference in charter is a sufficient handicap to enable the British Columbian to drive us from our home market if he will, and it will be only a matter of grace on his part if he does not do so. Under such circumstances, is it not apparent the effect will seriously retard the development of our own merchant marine, and that the removal of the toll would tend to overcome the disability we labor under?

It might not be out of place to call your attention to the position taken by Germany on its mail convention with us to give you some idea how foreign nations encourage their own commerce and shipping. On letters from the United States to Germany, if carried on a German ship, the postage is 2 cents; if carried on a ship of any other nation, 5 cents. Surely this policy must carry its own lesson. If Germany finds 3 cents in postage of sufficient consequence to consider, is it not the course of wisdom for us to be on our guard in dealing with such commercial rivals and look out for cents also?

To put it briefly, the removal of tolls will eliminate a tax on our commerce; will lead to freer movement, wider distribution, increased demand for ships, and to that extent aid in establishing an American merchant marine.

I have tried to answer your questions. They lead into fruitful fields of inquiry I have not touched. In closing, may I say that commerce does in a most literal sense follow the flag, and no more effective national salesmen exist than the captains of the merchantmen of the world. The building of the Panama Canal is worth all it cost if it does no more than awaken our latent instinct for trade overseas and inaugurate a movement for the revival of our one-time prestige in the ocean-carrying trade of the world.

Yours, sincerely, JOSEPH N. TEAL.

There is another feature in connection with this question. I wish to bring it to your attention as business men. We have terminals, but if the railroads will not exchange traffic with the boats, it will still be difficult to develop water carriage. This is largely the case at the present time, the railroads selecting the water carriers with whom they will make their through-traffic arrangements and issue joint through bills of lading.

The necessary and inevitable result where this procedure is adopted is to eliminate water competition. A buyer in the South dealing in cotton makes his arrangements to finance his business on drafts drawn against his shipments. He must attach his documents to a through bill of lading. If he can not get a through bill of lading, his drafts can not be cashed. The railroads can say, "You must ship by this line," because he can not use the other line, as he can not secure a through bill of lading. A case involving this question is now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was brought by the Mobile Chamber of Commerce and Horace Turner & Co. against the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Co. and the Southern Railway Co., and like conditions will be found all over the United States. If railroads are allowed the uncontrolled right to say with whom they will exchange traffic or issue bills of lading, they will have the power to divert the movement of traffic to suit themselves, and there can be no real independent lines of steamers.

I have probably talked more now than I should have, and will bring my views down to a final point. From the standpoint of the people that I am speaking for, they are in favor of the following propositions—I will read this:

"First. That no tolls be charged on domestic traffic or on American vessels engaged in that traffic passing through the Panama Canal.

"Second. That no railroad company subject to the act to regulate commerce shall be permitted to own, control, operate, or be interested in any competing water line, whether using the canal or not.

"Third. That adequate provision should be made against combinations between competing boat lines and between such lines and the railroads.

"Fourth. That provision be made requiring the exchange of traffic between water and rail lines."

Senator JONES. Mr. Teal, it has been suggested that if you prohibited railroad-owned vessels from going through the canal, many vessels that would otherwise be built for that trade would not be built. What have you to say to that suggestion?

Mr. TEAL. If we prohibited railroad vessels, then other vessels will not be built to operate through the canal?

Senator JONES. Well, it has been suggested that there are some railroad lines that contemplate building vessels to use the canal; but that if railroad vessels are prohibited, why, then, these vessels will not be built, and therefore we will have none to use the canal.

Mr. TEAL. Oh, I do not think so at all. I do not think that there is any ground for any such statement as that. Economically, it is unsound, to start with, and I do not think it is the fact. I hope that we have not arrived at the point where only railroads or railroad interests can build steamships in this country. Maybe it is true, but I do not think so.

Senator THORNTON. Do you think that under this treaty the United States could prohibit ships that were foreign ships, although owned and controlled by a railroad, from going through the canal? For instance, now, Canada or one of the South American countries might have a railroad company owning a ship; do you think they could be prevented from going through on that account?

Mr. TEAL. Well, I do not know; but I would say that it would not, at any rate, be at all similar to this question; because I do not see how a Canadian or South American railroad-owned ship would make any difference. It would not be competing with us. We do not object to any ships they want to run for traffic from or to South America; it is only among ourselves that we object.

Senator BRISTOW. It has been suggested that if the American railroads—that is, the United States railroads—should not be permitted to operate steamships, the Canadian Pacific might do so.

Mr. TEAL. Where from?

Senator BRISTOW. Between American ports.

STATEMENT OF MR. MAXWELL EVARTS.

Mr. EVARTS. My name is Maxwell Evarts, 165 Broadway, New York City; I am a lawyer and appear here as counsel for the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.

Now, if these gentlemen honestly and sincerely believe that there is danger of the railroads dominating the canal, then we think that the suggestion made by Senator BRISTOW and the suggestion which has been made by Mr. Baker removes all danger whatever in the situation, and that suggestion is that the control of the traffic in the canal should be placed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. I will develop the question of control in a moment, but the great consideration in this case seems to me to be whether the country at large is not interested in having capital, no matter where it comes from, being invested in transportation. The steamship business at the best is an uncertain business. There are no very large rewards in it. If any capital can be attracted by it or to it, is not that the thing to do, and then regulate the business?

STATEMENT OF MR. S. C. MEAD, SECRETARY MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK CITY.

Our association has taken up thus far only one point, and that is the question of tolls on coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal. That received careful study by a special committee, which led to the adoption of the following resolutions and preambles:

"Whereas the United States by act of Congress passed in 1884 made the following declaration of policy regarding tolls or charges relative to waterways acquired or constructed by the Federal Government: 'No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work, for the use of and benefit of navigation, now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed'; and

"Whereas under that policy, which is still in operation, the United States has expended on local waterway developments nearly $700,000,000, at the general expense of the whole country; and

"Whereas the Federal Government, in addition to its vast expenditures of public funds upon internal and seacoast waterways, for the use and benefit of all sections, and of all the people, free from the imposition of tolls or charges for the use thereof, has also made vast grants of public lands, of incalculable present value, to the transcontinental railways to promote their construction and the interests of the whole country, especially of the sections which they directly serve; and

"Whereas the Panama Canal is constructed primarily because of the military and economic necessities of the entire United States, and when completed will be of direct commercial benefit to a larger area of the country than any other waterway ever constructed or improved by the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the extension of the general policy of freedom from tolls to the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal can not create a discrimination against any other nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise, because of the fact that no such nation has been or now is permitted by law to engage in such coastwise commerce, which law was in operation and contemplation at the time of the negotiation and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and

"Whereas the provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty appears to relate to the avoidance of discrimination between the nations, and therefore does not pertain to our domestic coastwise trade, in the treatment of which there can be no such discrimination as prohibited in said treaty: Now therefore be it

"Resolved, That the report of the special committee on tolls on coastwise commerce passing through the Panama Canal, dated February 26, 1912, be, and hereby is, approved; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Merchants' Association of New York opposes the proposition of imposing any tolls whatsoever upon the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal, unless it be determined by competent authority that the imposing of such tolls is required in the fulfillment of our treaty obligations.

STATEMENT OF MR. WILLIAM K. KAVANAUGH, PRESIDENT OF THE LAKES-TO-THE-GULF DEEP WATERWAYS ASSOCIATION.

(Page 127.)

The CHAIRMAN. As I understand, you say that, in your opinion, there should be no tolls on American coastwise shipping through the Panama Canal. Is that true?

Senator O'GORMAN. And that the canal should be kept free from absolute control and domination by the railroads?

Mr. KAVANAUGH. I think so. It would be just as consistent to assess tolls on the Soo Canal as it would be to assess them on the Panama Canal; just as consistent to assess tolls on the Mississippi River as the Panama Canal, in my judgment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other way, in your judgment, to prevent railroad domination through the Panama Canal except to absolutely bar and prohibit any vessel in which a railroad has any interest whatever going through it?

Mr. KAVANAUGH. Senator, I believe I said a little while ago that possibly before the committee got through with it they would find that to be the case.

Senator O'GORMAN. What would be the case?

Mr. KAVANAUGH. To prevent railroad domination it may be found necessary to bar or prohibit railroads from using the Panama Canal.

The CHAIRMAN. It has developed here now that you have either got to let vessels that railroads are interested in go through and take your chances on whether it will drive out competition, or else you have got to prohibit them in the beginning; one way or the other.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. Then I would prohibit them. You gentlemen have the advantage of me. You have been sitting here listening to the testimony on both sides and can get all the angles.

The CHAIRMAN. I would not need to listen to the testimony one minute to understand that.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. If there is no other way to keep the railroads from using the canal for the purpose of destroying water competition, then, in that case, in the interest of the people, I think this committee should take the position that the railroads should not be allowed to send their vessels through the canal.

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM R. WHEELER, MANAGER TRAFFIC BUREAU OF THE SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to say, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that I appear here as the representative of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, which organization is, through its board of directors, unequivocally and unanimously committed to the policy of free tolls on American ships passing through the canal in the coastwise trade and for the prohibition of the operation through the canal, either wholly or partly in the coastwise trade, of vessels owned or controlled or operated by railroads which occupy competing lines with such vessel lines.

RESOLUTIONS INDICATING PUBLIC SENTIMENT THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY IN FAVOR OF FREE TOLLS FOR AMERICAN SHIPS IN THE COASTWISE TRADE THROUGH THE PANAMA CANAL.

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the Lakes-to-the-Gulf Deep Waterways Association at the sixth annual convention, Chicago, Ill., October 12, 13, 14, 1911:

"The policy of free waterways is fundamental with the American people, and hence this association declares that this principle should be extended to our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal."

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, which convened in Washington in December, 1911, consisting of over 1,200 delegates, representing every State in the Union:

"We submit that waterways improved or created by the Federal Government by the use of money contributed by the whole people of the United States should be free for the use of American ships in fair and open competition and on equal terms, without the payment of tolls, but we contend that a water carrier owned, controlled, or operated by a competing land carrier is unfair competition, and in order to preserve to the whole people the benefits of continued fair competition so that the beneficent influence of open waterways shall not be nullified by hostile interests, we recommend the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the commission may more effectually regulate competing land and water carriers and competing water carriers and provide for the interchange of traffic."

It has been stated that free tolls are desired in order that the jobbers on the Pacific coast might benefit thereby. Now, the jobbers, just like the other middlemen, the carrier, or the retailer, have no direct interest in the question of tolls. I want to say this for the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco: They take a more enlightened view of this situation than their immediate self-interest. They believe that with free tolls through the canal our producers will be put more nearly in a position to distribute their products throughout the great Atlantic seaboard and the Middle West at rates which will popularize those products and increase the output. That means wealth for San Francisco. Mr. Lynch has given the membership of our chamber of commerce to the committee, but I will say that the membership comprises jobbers, bankers, insurance men, real estate owners, and manufacturers—all of our business element are members of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, and they feel that what goes to the building up of California goes to the building up of San Francisco, and that is the enlightened view they take upon this question of tolls. On free tolls shipping will move more freely through the canal. There will be a greater volume of business done in competition with the railroads, and the asset of San Francisco, its harbor, will be more freely used and developed.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 11, 1912.

R. P. SCHWERIN,
New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Board of directors San Francisco Chamber of Commerce to-day, after careful consideration, unanimously passed following resolution:

"Resolved, That this chamber is unalterably opposed to the operation through the Panama Canal of any railroad owned or controlled ship engaging wholly or partly in coastwise traffic. We also reiterate our position formely expressed that we favor and strongly urge upon Congress the enactment of laws that will exempt from canal tolls all ships sailing under the American flag engaged in coastwise traffic."

This was done after consideration of your recent letter to me. We regret that you were of the impression that our attitude as expressed by our former resolutions, or as maintained by our representatives in Washington, called for any amendment of the law prohibiting railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in trade through the canal other than coastwise trade. Our objection all along has been and still is only to allowing railroad owned or controlled ships engaged wholly or partly in coastwise trade from passing through the canal. Our position on this subject rests upon a matter of principle and in no way upon any hostility to any particular steamship company.

M. H. ROBBINS, JR.,
President San Francisco Chamber of Commerce.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA IN RE PANAMA CANAL BILL.

MARCH 16, 1912.

After a public hearing and a careful investigation into the law and the facts, the railroad commission of the State of California makes the following recommendations in the matter of the Panama Canal bill now pending before Congress:

"(1) We recommend that vessels owned, operated, or controlled by railroads and engaged in whole or in part in coastwise trade be barred from the Panama Canal, and suggest the advisability of extending this principle so as to make it unlawful for any railroad to own, operate, or control any common carrier by water with which such railroad does or may compete for traffic between points within the United States."

RESOLUTION IN RE PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Resolved by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, That we reaffirm the statement of the principles and policy involved in the resolutions adopted by this chamber as a member of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, October 2, 1911, as follows:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things of providing for the national defense, of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries, to provide through natural methods and to prevent monopoly of transportation and means for transportation between the various sections of the Union at the lowest possible cost, to build up and expand our commerce with foreign nations, and incidentally to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine: Be it

"Resolved, That there should be no tolls charged through the Panama Canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows:

"'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting as a wise amendment to the interstate-commerce law a provision prohibiting interstate-commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefit of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards, which this canal was constructed to secure.'

"Resolved, That the recent action of the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives in relation to Panama Canal tolls is at variance in all essential particulars with the foregoing statement of the principles and policy, which, in our opinion, should govern legislation on this subject, and we desire to emphasize the protest which this chamber has heretofore made to this proposed action of Congress by transmitting a copy of this resolution to every Member of the House of Representatives and to every United States Senator."

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of the resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce at the regular meeting held Wednesday, March 13, 1912.

H. Z. OSBORNE, President.

Attest:

FRANK WIGGINS, Secretary.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., March 12, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce reiterates its earnest and solemn protest to placing a tollgate at entrance to Panama Canal to collect tax in name of toll against American commerce and shipping engaged in coastwise trade, thus discriminating against people of Pacific coast by levying tax that is not exacted against vessels or craft engaged in similar coastwise commerce in Soo Canal, Erie Canal, and various rivers made navigable at Government expense in which Pacific coast bears its proportionate share. This chamber is also absolutely opposed to permitting ships owned or controlled wholly or in part by railway companies to engage in coastwise traffic through Panama Canal.

THE LOS ANGELES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
H. H. OSBORNE, President.

STATEMENT OF MR. BERNARD N. BAKER, OF BALTIMORE.

(Page 579.)

As I see it, the two important questions before the committee are, first, the question of the right of the railroads to own competitive lines through the Panama Canal, and, second, whether American coastwise shipping should be permitted to go through the canal free of tolls. I have made quite a study of this subject, and I want to say now that it has been academic in a way. I have had no direct interest.

* * * * * * *

I certainly feel very safe in stating that if I felt quite sure that there would be no competitive railroad line allowed to operate a line of ships through the Panama Canal, especially in the coastwise trade between the coasts, I would feel certain that it would add very much to the number of ships to be built. I may say now that in an interview which I had in New York yesterday I was assured by some very responsible, reliable people that if such legislation is passed and the railroads prevented from controlling a line of steamers through the canal, which might possibly be used to the injury of their proposed line, that they are prepared immediately, or as soon as it can be possibly done, to build 12 steamships of not less than 10,000 tons each to develop this particular trade. That came from very reliable sources.

They have made—to show you how earnest they are—they have made a contract for 150,000 tons of citrus fruits from Californian points to New York; they have agreed upon a rate; they have made a contract for 10 years to carry that citrus fruit, based upon, in addition to the rate that has been agreed upon, the rate of toll, whatever it may be, to be added to it, so they evidently mean business. It is dependent entirely on what Congress will do with the legislation that is pending here with regard to what they consider will be unreasonable and unjust steamship competition from railroad-owned lines.

STATEMENT OF MR. RICHARD REID ROGERS, GENERAL COUNSEL OF THE PANAMA RAILROAD CO.

The CHAIRMAN. You have no doubt, then, have you, that even if we have no authority under the treaty to directly exempt American shipping, we would have authority to remit tolls after they had been collected?

Mr. ROGERS. I can see no reason why you can not do that; but it would take virtually the form of a subsidy. For instance, it seems to me that Great Britain, in order to meet a situation of that sort, could appropriate annually for her vessels using the Panama Canal the tolls they had to pay.

Senator BRISTOW. That is a mere subterfuge, in order to avoid the letter of the law?

Mr. ROGERS. That is true.

Senator PERKINS. We do not discriminate against any foreign nations when we say that free tolls shall apply only to those vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, because foreign ships can not go into the coastwise trade. Therefore, why would that discriminate against them?

Mr. ROGERS. I think the argument that you bring up, Senator PERKINS, is very apt, and it has occurred to me in that connection that the very point which you have suggested is the correct one. I was merely suggesting the point I mentioned because my experience as a lawyer has suggested the advisability of avoiding doubtful issues, if possible. It may be said that a technical reading of the treaty would require the Government of the United States to treat all ships alike, even though they are in a class where foreign vessels can not compete, as in the case of vessels engaged solely in the coastwise trade.

Senator PERKINS. How would that theory apply to naval or war ships?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not think that it applies to those. It ought not to; but they have even raised the point that naval vessels ought to pay the tolls. If you are going to deal with this question by the remission of tolls, you at least avoid the issue by doing what other nations have been doing.

Senator PERKINS. The provision that it shall be free of tolls to the vessels engaged in the coastwise business—does not that solve the problem?

Mr. ROGERS. It may come to the same thing, as Senator BRISTOW says, because in the one case it seems to be merely an evasion; but in that case we do not run any risk of violating the letter of the treaty, and in the other case the point may be raised that you do.

Senator PERKINS. It is not impossible that the Government may abrogate the provision which applies to American-built vessels in the coastwise trade. But meantime if we provide in this bill that the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade shall pass through the canal free of charge, it seems to me that is not a violation of any treaty.

STATEMENT OF MR. JAMES K. LYNCH, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., AND AT THE PRESENT TIME CHAIRMAN OF THE TRANSPORTATION COMMITTEE OF THE SAN FRANCISCO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I wish to correct any misapprehension that might exist in the minds of the committee, as it apparently exists in the mind of Mr. Schwerin, regarding the situation of that body and regarding its attitude toward his corporation and other transportation corporations.

The chamber of commerce has more than 3,000 members. It embraces the jobbers, as has been said, the manufacturers, the merchants, the bankers of San Francisco almost without exception, and the insurance companies, and also capitalists, real-estate owners, lawyers, and doctors. It is as thoroughly representative a body as could be gathered in the city of San Francisco.

When Mr. Schwerin sent his communication, addressed to a number of members of that body, requesting a change of their expressed opposition to the operation of railroad owned or controlled steamers through the canal, his communication was read at a meeting of the board. It was a very full meeting. According to my recollection there were more than 20 members, or, I should say, about 25, present. At the same time Mr. Frye, who in Mr. Schwerin's absence was the head of the company in San Francisco, was present, and by invitation amplified Mr. Schwerin's letter and expressed very fully, very forcibly, the views of his company upon the matter.

The hearing was postponed from, I think, Friday until the following Tuesday, in order to obtain additional information and have additional members of the committee present. It came up again at the second meeting, and at both those meetings, and all others I have attended or of which I have any knowledge, nothing was said except in full appreciation of the necessity of a body of the character, dignity, and responsibility of that body taking the broadest possible view of the matter. If there were any individual or private views that were conflicting with the position taken they were not expressed. In fact, on a number of occasions when I have presided as chairman of the traffic bureau, now called the transportation committee, I have known members to vote against their own personal interests in minor matters and to take the view that they considered most to the advantage of the city that they were, in a sense, representing. And I wish to assure Mr. Schwerin and also the committee of this honorable body that that was the view and the attitude taken—that they desired to give only the broadest possible interpretation and take the broadest possible stand. Looking at it carefully and from that viewpoint, the committee absolutely reaffirmed the position heretofore taken, and the action of that body was embodied in a resolution of March 11, which, with the permission of the committee, I will read, as follows:

"Resolved, That this chamber is unalterably opposed to the operation through the Panama Canal of any railroad owned or controlled ship engaged wholly or partly in coastwise traffic. We also reiterate our position formerly expressed that we favor and strongly urge upon Congress the enactment of laws that will exempt from canal tolls all ships sailing under the American flag engaged in coastwise traffic."

With that explanation, which I hope will clear up any impression of personal prejudice or hostility to Mr. Schwerin's company or any other corporation engaged in the traffic business, I will close; but before doing so I should like to further state that there is no body of men that would be more thoroughly disposed to forget bygones and begin from to-day, considering only the present and the future, and forgetting all enmities and hostilities that may have existed in the past, than the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce.

STATEMENT OF MR. DAVID O. IVES.

The CHAIRMAN. Your full name, occupation, and residence, Mr. Ives.

Mr. IVES. My name is David O. Ives; I am manager of the transportation department of the Boston Chamber of Commerce; and my residence is Boston. * * * I will first take up the question of free or preferential tolls. In relation to that I will merely touch upon the question of treaty violation, because I assume that you are all thoroughly familiar with that, and state that the lawyers with whom our transportation committee has consulted in Boston are of various opinions as to the technical meaning of the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and they therefore came back to the cardinal principle that no foreign government has any business to interfere with our domestic commerce between ports in the United States; that no Secretary of State would have any right, without direct authority of Congress, to give up the rights of the people of the United States to handle their own internal affairs, and therefore they believe that it would be no violation of the treaty to allow either free or preferential tolls, as might seem wise to those settling the matter of the exaction of tolls.

Mr. WORKS. There is another phase of this question which I desire to touch upon before closing my remarks.

It will be remembered that some time back the President of the United States, in a message sent to Congress, declared emphatically in favor of the exclusion of railroad-owned ships from the canal. Subsequently it was stated, I believe, by the Secretary of War before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals that the President had changed his mind and that he now was in favor of allowing such ships to pass through the canal subject to regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. And the opponents of this bill—the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. and others—have rung the changes upon that statement that it was not necessary to exclude railroad-owned ships, because they could be put under the control and regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that that would satisfy all parties and protect the public interests.

But, Mr. President, it developed, subsequent to that time, that it was regarded as impossible or at least impracticable on the part of the commissioners themselves to regulate sea traffic, and I call attention in the first instance to a letter signed by Judge Prouty, chairman of that commission, to the President, as follows:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Referring to your request made to Commissioner Lane and myself recently, that we confer with our associates and inform you whether in the opinion of the commission transcontinental railroads should be permitted to own steamships navigating the Panama Canal, upon condition that the rates and practices of such carriers were made subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission, permit me to say:

The commission, after consideration, is unanimously of the opinion that if the waterways of this country are to be of any substantial benefit in the way of reducing rates of transportation it is absolutely essential that rail carriers be prohibited from owning or controlling, directly or indirectly, competing water carriers. From our knowledge of what has happened in the past we are of the opinion that this is particularly true of transcontinental railroads and steamshpis plying in competition with them.

While the Interstate Commerce Commission might, if vested with authority, prevent to some extent the injurious effect of allowing a common ownership over these competing carriers, still the limitations under which we act are such that we do not believe we could secure to the public the same favorable rates which would result from unrestrained competition. The conditions of water transportation are such that we do not believe that the port-to-port water traffic ought to be placed under the supervision of this body—certainly not under the same rules which apply in case of rail carriers. The law should, in our opinion, be so amended and strengthened as to give this commission power to compel a physical interchange of business between water carriers and rail carriers and to establish reasonable rates for through carriage.

Respectfully, C. A. PROUTY, Chairman.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

Judge Prouty was also called before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals to give his views upon this subject, and in that connection he testified as follows:

Mr. PROUTY. I do not think that the Interstate Commerce Commission can regulate the port-to-port rates of a water carrier, because there is no basis for regulation. We have just been investigating, in a case of which I had charge, the port-to-port water rates from New York to Galveston. There is a very large volume of traffic annually from Atlantic seaboard territory to New York, from New York to Galveston by water, and by rail from Galveston to interior Texas and southwestern points; and we have been inquiring into the reasonableness of those rates. Now, the evidence convinces me that it is entirely a question of conditions. If the ship runs full in one direction a low rate can be made; if it runs full in both directions, a lower rate can can be made; if it runs light, a higher rate must be made in order to pay the expenses of operation. Our investigation in that case shows that 60 per cent of the expense is at the dock and only 40 per cent of the expense on the water. The expense both at the dock and on the water is substantially the same, whether a full load is obtained or whether only a part load is obtained, except the cost of loading.

Now, when you inquire what is a reasonable rate on a railroad you have something to guide you. You have other railroads; you know about the cost of other railroads; you know about the cost of operation; you know about the density of the traffic; you can institute a comparison between that railroad and similar railroads. But all those distinctions fail when you undertake to inquire what is a reasonable rate on the water.

Commissioner Franklin K. Lane was also called before the committee and testified as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Would you advise us to enact section 11 as it stands in the House bill?

Mr. LANE. I think section 11 is drafted along proper lines, but there is a practical question that Judge Prouty has dealt with as to whether it is wise to cut off these railroad-owned boats from the Lakes and the Sound traffic. Perhaps that can be taken care of by giving further time, but I have no question whatever as to the result of the proposed policy of making the ocean as free as possible and allowing ships upon the ocean without regulation.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose the railroad-owned steamships of all the railroads of all countries were allowed to go through the canal, how would that restrict the freedom of the ocean?

Mr. LANE. If all the boats that were owned by all the railroads of the world were allowed to go through the canal and engage in coastwise business between points in the United States, of course there could not be any freer competition than that. It would make no difference, in my judgment, then, whether an American railroad owned a boat or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose they were not allowed to engage in coastwise trade?

Mr. LANE. I think, then, you have created practically a monopoly for your ships from port to port in the United States, and you want to develop some business for American shipping and keep it for those ships. That would not be free competition.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the Pacific Mail would create a monopoly in the canal if they were allowed to go through there?

Mr. LANE. I think the inevitable tendency of a railroad owning a boat line that competes with it, when it is a great and powerful system, is to keep all other competitors and independent lines off, and I think the history of the Pacific Mail shows that this is so in that case.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought the complaint was that the Pacific Mail did not compete with the Southern Pacific Railroad, but that it was used simply as a blind and pretext of competition to keep the rail rates up.

Mr. LANE. Yes; and there against the independent lines so as to keep them off that route. That was the history presented to us in some of the transcontinental rail cases.

The President having learned that he was mistaken with respect to the efficiency of the Interstate Commerce Commission in dealing with this question again went back to his original conviction with respect to it. His consent to allow railroad-owned ships to pass through the canal was founded entirely upon the supposition that the traffic could be regulated and controlled by the Interstate Commerce Commission. With respect to that phase of the question, I am permitted to present to the Senate a letter from the President to Mr. KNOWLAND, a Representative in Congress from California, and Mr. KNOWLAND's reply:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 16, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR KNOWLAND: Mr. Wheeler is anxious to know my views with reference to the provisions against railroad-owned steamships and their passage through the Panama Canal. My impression is that I had a meeting with you and other members of your committee, and that the matter was referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission; that they answered that they did not think the control of ships could be properly exercised through them, and, therefore, that I stated I had reverted to my original opinion of restricting the use of the canal, or increasing its tolls, whenever it was used by railroad-owned ships.

Will you give me your recollection of this matter? I thought I had written you a letter on the subject.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, July 20, 1912.

To the PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your favor of the 16th instant in regard to the matter of the provisions now pending against railroad-owned steamships through the Panama Canal, will state that my recollection relative to our conversation coincides with yours.

When I called at the White House, together with Representatives ADAMSON and STEVENS, there were present besides yourself Commissioners Prouty and Lane. In reply to your inquiry as to the feasibility of conferring upon the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to regulate railroad-owned ships if allowed to operate through the Panama Canal, both expressed the opinion that they did not believe the control of ships could be properly exercised through them, later sending to you, as I understand it, a letter in which they expressed these views on behalf of the commissioners as a whole.

As I understood it, your position was that in case regulation could not be had by this method you would revert to your original position, as stated in your message of December 6, 1910, in which you recommended a provision "prohibiting interstate commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal."

Sincerely, yours,

J. R. KNOWLAND.

I think, Mr. President, that Members of Congress have been influenced more or less by the position taken by the steamship and railroad companies that it was unnecessary that there should be any such prohibition as this because the whole matter could be taken care of by regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Now, we have from authority which ought to be respected that it is impossible to regulate and control the traffic by sea, and therefore that objection to the provisions which are contained in this bill should have no force.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I make a suggestion to the Senator in that connection?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Prouty and Mr. Lane both, especially Commissioner Lane, insisted that if it were possible that they should attempt to regulate rates it would absolutely destroy competition by so doing, as they would have to fix the maximum and minimum rates, possibly, and the result would be an abolition of competition.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate further with any discussion of these questions. I only desire to say in conclusion that I am in favor of the provision which was originally inserted in the bill by the House. It is the only direct, proper way to deal with this question, and I hope before the consideration of the bill is concluded that I may have an opportunity to vote for that provision as contained in the House bill. I should be glad to go further than the House bill and exclude all railroad-owned ships from the canal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I regret that I feel compelled to trespass upon the time and attention of the Senate in discussing some of the questions that are involved in the measure under consideration. The Senate of the United States and the people of the whole country fully realize the importance of legislation with respect to the government of the Panama Canal Zone and the use of the Panama Canal.

The question of the form of government to be adopted for the Panama Canal Zone has practically been settled by the Senate and the House of Representatives, because the amendments to the section providing for the government of the zone is a reinstatement of the provisions of the bill in that respect as it came to us from the House. So that now there is in issue between the two bodies only three questions, viz: First, the question of the power of Congress under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; second, our right to remit tolls to vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic as well as to American vessels engaged in foreign commerce; and, third, as to the use of the canal by railroad-owned ships.

I propose to discuss, Mr. President, first, the question of the power of Congress under our treaty with Great Britain. The time has arrived when this Government ought to take a positive stand on the subject. It seems to me that wherever there is a question of doubt as to power that doubt ought to be solved in favor of the best interests of our own people. It ought not to be solved to meet the fears of some of our timid statesmen as to what might be the result if this question ever gets to The Hague tribunal for consideration and adjustment.

Whatever is done, whether this Government shall adopt a vacillating policy or whether it shall stand firmly for American rights and American interests, a precedent will have been established, to be followed by generations yet unborn.

For one I believe that Congress should take a positive stand in the assertion of its right to prescribe rules for the use of the canal by American vessels discriminatory, it may be, but in line with the best interests of a people whose money has been expended in the acquirement of the Panama Canal Zone and in the construction of the greatest engineering work of modern times, and upon whose shoulders for all time to come must rest the burden of the maintenance and upkeep of the canal.

I maintain that this can be done without doing violence to any provision of any treaty that has been made or that now exists between Great Britain and the United States.

I will not attempt to tax the patience of the Senate with a lengthy historical review of the steps taken in days gone by leading to the construction of an interoceanic canal between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans. Nearly a hundred years of negotiation looking to the consummation of this great work has been pending, and the energy of our own people is about to give fruition to the hopes and aspirations of the world. Where others have failed the United States has succeeded, but in the negotiations which preceded the work of construction the United States, through its diplomatists and Congress, came near to abandoning the Monroe doctrine, a doctrine proclaimed almost a century ago to protect the American continent from the intrigues and interferences of foreign powers.

While I do not propose to trace the events which preceded the execution of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, I call attention to the fact that all the correspondence and negotiations between the two Governments on the subject lead inevitably to the conclusion that its principal purpose was to bring about the construction of a particular interoceanic canal on foreign soil "between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean."

Mr. President, in proof of this I call the attention of the Senate to the preamble of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It recites in terms that the purpose of the convention was the construction of a canal across Nicaragua along a definite line and through a particular river and lakes. There is not single reference in that convention anywhere, not a line, not a syllable, not a word from which anybody can draw a conclusion that the signatory powers had in mind any place except the construction of that particular canal in that particular place, and in every section of the treaty it refers to that canal only; that is, a canal crossing Nicaragua through specified rivers and lakes.

All who have looked into this subject at all know that the reasons which brought Great Britain into the negotiation for the treaty was the fact that she claimed to have some rights in the San Juan River and that there was a question as to the right of the Nicaragua Government to make a treaty with the United States that should attempt to divest Great Britain of these asserted rights.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMMONS in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. While I know my conclusions are precisely the same as the conclusions of the Senator from Oregon in regard to this treaty, I think it is possible that he has overlooked section 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in which there is a reference to a possible canal without definitely locating it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will call attention to that. I have not overlooked it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. President, I say that the signatory powers had one particular object, and that was to construct the canal in a particular part of a foreign territory. I call the attention of Senators to this statement in article 6 of the treaty:

> And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication.

The words said canal referring to the canal which is mentioned in the preamble of the convention, and that was the one across Nicaragua. Now, up to the eighth section of the treaty to which the Senator from Iowa has just called attention there is no reference to any other canal.

Section 8 provides:

> The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object—

And that is the object stated in section 6—

> but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications.

Now, Mr. President, the particular object which the signatory powers had in view was to build a canal across Nicaragua, with a secondary purpose of maintaining the general principle of neutrality, and that was to be accomplished not by that treaty, not by any arrangement which existed between Great Britain and the United States at that time, but by subsequent treaty stipulations. So the secondary purpose of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was the establishment or the maintaining of the general principle of neutrality as to any canal, and that was left open entirely to subsequent negotiations between the two Governments.

I take the position that there has never been a time, so far as Great Britain was concerned, when the United States could not have proceeded to the construction of a canal across the present route, and that the matter of the adoption of rules and regulations for its use was left, even under the terms of the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the voluntary treaty stipulations of the two powers subsequently to be entered into. I claim further that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was unnecessary in so far as it was intended to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that its only effect has been to make acute the issues involved in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which had practically been terminated by repeated violations of its terms by the British Government, and latterly by a practical abandonment.

I never did know and I have never been able to understand why the United States ever deemed it necessary to enter into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty having been confined to one particular territory, when the plan of construction across that territory was abandoned by the United States and another place selected it was absolutely unnecessary for this Government to have entered into any treaty negotiations with Great Britain as to the construction of a canal at any other point.

It would be interesting but would subserve no useful purpose in this discussion to show the constructions that have been placed upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty both by this country and Great Britain. It is sufficient to say that at no time since its execution has the American construction, nor, I may say, common-sense construction, thereof been observed by the British Government, for although the parties to it jointly agreed not to exercise dominion over or fortify or colonize Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America, Great Britain continued, against our protest, to exercise dominion over Belize, or British Honduras, which exceeds in area the States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut; and in other respects, against the protests of this Government, a construction has been placed upon this treaty totally at variance with its terms and with the American idea. Immediately after its execution disputes arose between the two Governments in reference to the refusal of Great Britain to observe its terms, which led to prolonged diplomatic correspondence.

In this connection I quote from a letter of Gen. Cass, Secretary of State, to Lord Napier, of date May 29, 1857:

> The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, concluded in the hope that it would put an end to the differences which had arisen between the United States and Great Britain concerning Central American affairs, has been rendered inoperative in some of its most essential provisions by the different constructions which had been reciprocally given to it by the parties, and little is hazarded in saying that had the interpretation since put upon the treaty by the British Government, and yet maintained, been anticipated it would not have been negotiated under the instructions of any Executive of the United States nor ratified by the branch of the Government intrusted with the power of ratification.
> A protracted discussion, in which the subject was exhausted, failed to reconcile the conflicting views of the parties; and as a last resort a negotiation was opened for the purpose of forming a supplementary treaty which should remove, if practicable, the difficulties in the way of their mutual good understanding and leave unnecessary any further discussion of the controverted provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It was to effect this object that the Government of the United States agreed to open the negotiations which terminated in the treaty of October 17, 1856, and though the provisions of that instrument, even with the amendments proposed by the Senate, were not wholly unobjectionable either to that body or to the President, still, so important did they consider a satisfactory arrangement of this complicated subject that they yielded their objections and sanctioned by their act of ratification the convention as amended. It was then transmitted to London for the consideration of Her Britannic Majesty's Government and, having failed to meet its approbation, has been returned unratified. The parties are thus thrown back upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, with its disputed phraseology and its conflicting interpretations; and, after the lapse of seven years, not one of the objects connected with the political condition of Central America which the United States had hoped to obtain by the arrangement has been accomplished.

This letter calls attention in express terms to the fact that within seven years after the execution of the treaty Great Britain was doing just exactly what she had agreed, or at least as this Government thought she had agreed, in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that she would not do. I have not a doubt, and I am sure that those who carried on this correspondence with the British authorities had no doubt, that it was the understanding of the United States that Great Britain, under the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, would abandon her claims to every portion of Central America occupied by her at the time of the execution of the treaty.

As late as December 8, 1857, while these controversies were still waging, President Buchanan sent to Congress a message calling attention to the fact, in which he says:

> Since the origin of the Government we have been employed in negotiating treaties with that power and afterwards in discussing their true intent and meaning.

I may say, parenthetically, that we are still engaged in that work.

> In this respect the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton and Bulwer treaty, has been the most unfortunate of all, because the two Governments place directly opposite and contradictory constructions upon its first and most important article. Whilst in the United States we believed that this treaty would place both powers upon an exact equality by the stipulation that neither will ever "occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion" over any part of Central America, it is contended by the British Government that the true construction of this language has left them in the rightful possession of all that portion of Central America which was in their occupancy at the date of the treaty.

In other words, Great Britain had not abandoned a foot of her territory or released a single claim that she had been asserting.

> In fact, that the treaty is a virtual recognition on the part of the United States of the right of Great Britain, either as owner or protector, to the whole extensive coast of Central America, sweeping round from the Rio Hondo to the port and harbor of San Juan de Nicaragua, together with the adjacent Bay Islands, except the comparatively small portion of this between the Sarstoon and Cape Honduras. According to their construction—

That is, the British construction—

> the treaty does no more than simply prohibit them from extending their possessions in Central America beyond the present limits. It is not too much to assert that if in the United States the treaty had been considered susceptible of such a construction it never would have been negotiated under the authority of the President, nor would it have received the approbation of the Senate. The universal conviction in the United States was that when our Government consented to violate its traditional and time-honored policy and to stipulate with a foreign Government never to occupy or acquire territory in the Central American portion of our continent the consideration for this sacrifice was that Great Britain should, in this respect at least, be placed in the same position with ourselves.

Mr. Buchanan calls attention in this message to the fact that attempts upon the part of this Government to bring about an adjustment of differences growing out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had proved abortive, and expressed the hope that a reasonable adjustment of the Central American questions might finally be reached between the two Governments.

On December 3, 1860, President Buchanan again sent a message to Congress, in which he advised Congress that the discordant constructions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which at different periods bore a threatening aspect, had resulted in a final settlement entirely satisfactory to this Government, and this through the execution of treaties between the Republics of Honduras and Nicaragua and the British Government; but this statement was not justified by subsequent proceedings, and negotiations between the two Governments continued, and even after the execution of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty they are continuing, and the time has now arrived when this Government place a construction upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in line with the views that have been expressed by former Presidents and Secretaries of State, not inconsistent with the terms of the treaty but entirely consistent with American interests and with the doctrine as enunciated by President Monroe in 1823.

Coming now to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, I insist that there is nothing in it which would prevent discriminatory tolls or free tolls to vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic.

I am not so sure but that under the terms of that treaty we not only have the power to grant discriminatory or even free tolls to our coastwise traffic, but we have the right to treat American vessels engaged in foreign commerce on a different basis from foreign vessels engaged in foreign commerce, and, although it is probably not the time to do it now, the time will come when this Government will insist on its right to grant discriminatory tolls to American vessels engaged in foreign commerce.

I venture to suggest that although it in terms supersedes the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it by no means settles and adjusts the controversies between Great Britain and the United States which grow out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

I call attention to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for just a moment. The first draft of this treaty that came to the Senate of the United States proposed that both Great Britain and the United States were to formulate the rules that were to govern the use of the canal, practically placing a joint protectorate over the use of any canal that might be completed. I am not admitting here for a moment that we had then in view the construction of a canal over our own territory, but the construction of a canal over some other territory than our own. The purpose at first was to allow both Governments to have jurisdiction over the fixing of rules and regulations for the conduct of the canal. When it was finally agreed upon and after amendments made in the Senate this provision was changed and article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Now, Mr. President, what are the rights incident to construction and what are the rights as to the exclusive authority of providing for the regulation and management of the canal? It has been stated here that article 2 is controlled by article 3. It was stated on the floor of the Senate, in answer to a question put to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], that the United States had absolutely no rights that were not granted under the terms of the treaty to Great Britain or to any other power on the face of the earth. I certainly dissent to that view.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator tell the Senate what he understands by the term "subject to the terms of the present treaty"? What force does the Senator give to that exception?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, you have to construe this exactly as you construe any other paper or writing. You must take it by the four corners and read it in the light of the situation of the parties to it and reconcile conflicting provisions if you can. I maintain that we can reconcile the terms of this treaty to my construction of it, which is conformable to the American idea.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has hardly answered my question. My question was, What construction is placed upon the clause which the Senator read, "subject to the terms of the present treaty"? Does the Senator eliminate that sentence entirely, or does he think it had some meaning, some intendment? If so, what was its purpose?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The particular one which I have just read?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it left in the United States almost absolute power to do with its own shipping as it saw fit.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator read again the clause he first read?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Surely. I suppose the Senator wishes me to read only the last part of it. It is as follows:

subject to the provisions of the present convention, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am still attempting to get the Senator's construction of the words "subject to the provisions of the present treaty"—what they mean, what those words are intended for, and why they are inserted in this treaty, unless they have some meaning or intendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Senator how he construes the words "that the United States shall have the exclusive right to provide for the regulation and management of the canal"?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that, among other things, the phrase "subject to the provisions of this treaty" means that the United States can not charge Great Britain any more than she charges France for the use of the canal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Or any other power. Our Government has the exclusive right under the treaty to do, as to our own commerce, as she pleases, and I assume that the United States is not going to be unfair to foreign powers in regulating our own commerce or that of other nations. I call attention to that provision of the treaty, because it seems to me——

Mr. McCUMBER. If I may interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it will not disturb the Senator, the Senator asked me what construction I placed upon that language, and I will answer very readily that my construction is that it carries into the new treaty those general principles that were established in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which general principles were declared to be reasserted in the first article, that the vessels both of war and commerce of all nations should be treated exactly alike—without discrimination.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; I know that is the Senator's view.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I might say that the only difference between the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and myself upon that question is that the Senator construes the words "all nations" not to include the United States, and I say that they do include the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I say about that, Mr. President, just as President Buchanan said about the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that if the American people had thought for a single moment, or if this Senate had expected that the term "all nations" included the United States, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would have been, like Mohammed's coffin, suspended still between heaven and earth; it never would have been executed. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has stated that he did not understand—and he is a master of the English language—when he reported the treaty from the Committee on Foreign Relations, that the phrase "all nations" included the United States; I do not think so now, and I propose, Mr. President, as long as I can do so, to maintain that it does not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator if the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations did not give it as their construction that the treaty did bind the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am inclined to think that the Davis report did, but I think the subject was not discussed here. I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated it was not discussed, as he remembered.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think, Mr. President, you will find that it was discussed, and discussed at the time the then Senator from California introduced his amendment, which was voted down.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Was it not voted down, I will ask the Senator, because the Senate thought the treaty was broad enough without giving any construction to that language?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; there was no such claim made in the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, at all events, the Senator will probably concede that there is a doubt about it. If he will not so concede, than the Senator is different from most of us who do admit that there is a doubt. I, for one, want to solve that doubt in favor of our own people, while the Senator would solve it in favor of Great Britain. And there we radically disagree.

Mr. President, I insist that section 2 gives to the United States the exclusive right to provide for the regulation and management of the canal. Article 3 of the treaty is not a positive and binding obligation upon this Government; it is a directory provision only that the basis of the neutralization of the ship canal shall be substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople. In other words, the convention of Constantinople was to be a substantial basis for such rules as the United States might adopt for the use of the canal by other powers.

That the United States was not understood to be included within the words "all nations" at the time the treaty was ratified by the Senate, has been affirmed by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and he has expressly stated in this Chamber that if he had known at the time the treaty was reported by him from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate that the words "all nations" embraced the United States, he would not for a moment have assented to such construction.

The position taken by him is not only humiliating, but it at the same time sounds a note of warning to the American people that we have practically surrendered to a foreign tribunal jurisdiction to determine questions involving our internal and local affairs. In an address delivered on this floor on July 17, the Senator said:

When I reported that treaty my own impression was that it left the United States in complete control of the tolls upon its own vessels. I did not suppose then that there was any limitation put upon our right to charge such tolls as we pleased upon our own vessels, or that we were included in the phrase "all nations."

And it must be remembered that the Senator was the acting chairman of the committee that reported the treaty to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I mention merely my own impression, which was that it left the fixing of tolls to us, but it is very clear to anyone on the simple reading of the clause that the interpretation is open to doubt.

He differs from the Senator from North Dakota and admits a doubt, while the Senator from North Dakota does not admit a doubt.

I think on the face of the words either view can fairly be taken. Such being the case, Mr. President, I do not wish anything done by which this Government could ever be exposed to the suggestion even of not acting in good faith under a treaty. I think we should be most punctilious, even if there is nothing more than a doubt about a word, in carrying out the treaty strictly to its letter.

It is, of course, also true, as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] pointed out, that if we should undertake simply to make our ships free, we should raise a question which would then, under our treaties of arbitration, necessarily go to The Hague.

At that point I interrupted the Senator to ask him this question:

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is the Senator addressing himself now to the treatment of our vessels engaged in foreign commerce, or do his remarks apply, and are they intended to apply, to the coastwise trade?

Mr. LODGE. I mean all American vessels. For the purposes of this treaty, it does not make any difference what trade they are engaged in.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Whether in the coastwise or the foreign trade?

Mr. LODGE. Not the slightest, I think.

There was a positive statement by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts that there was a doubt as to the power of Congress, under the treaty, to act in the premises, and that, if that doubt were solved in favor of the United States, this Congress had power to enact legislation affecting not only the coastwise, but the foreign commerce as well. I differ from some of the Senators here to this extent: Even if I were willing to concede that there was some doubt about it I would insist, Mr. President, that that doubt ought to be solved in favor of our own people. There is not any reason why we should not do so. Individuals do this without a charge of dishonesty or unfairness being made against them, and governments, which are the representatives of great peoples, have a right to take advantage of the same doubt.

The Senator from Massachusetts continues:

Mr. LODGE. But, Mr. President, in my opinion, for the purposes of this treaty, there is no distinction to be drawn between American vessels engaged in coastwise traffic and American vessels engaged in foreign trade. There is no such distinction in the treaty. It says "the vessels of all nations."

Of course, the decision in the United States Supreme Court does not bind Great Britain and would not prevent this question from going to The Hague. Under our treaties of arbitration, in my judgment, nothing could prevent this question from going to The Hague, if we live up to the existing treaties of arbitration which we have with 26 other powers. If it goes to The Hague, I think we may take it as decided now. It is not likely that the United States would ever get a favorable decision from that tribunal on a question where the interests of Europe are on one side and those of the United States on the other.

There we find the suggestion that the combined nations of the earth taking advantage of a doubt on a case to be tried before them on appeal where their interests are affected, and yet while the Senator who presented this treaty to the Senate admitted that there was doubt in his mind upon the subject, there are some of us here, Mr. President, ready to solve that doubt in favor of the claims and in favor of the construction which the Government of Great Britain and many of her diplomatists have placed upon this treaty.

I can not but think, in view of the statement of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts which I have quoted, that this Senate was lucky indeed when it refused to ratify and confirm the proposed treaty between Great Britain and the United States and that between France and the United States when it was proposed by those treaties to submit questions affecting large vital interests of this country to The Hague tribunal; and if it be true that questions which go to The Hague tribunal, where the interests of foreign powers are involved, are prejudged against us, Mr. President, we not only did right when we refused to ratify those treaties, but we ought to take steps now to withdraw from The Hague convention if any question is ever to be raised as to its absolute fairness.

I shall attempt to show that in so far as coastwise shipping is concerned its passage through the Panama Canal is just as much interstate commerce as freight transported through the Soo Canal or any of the canals or internal waterways of the country, and that, being such, under the strictest construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty Congress has the right to discriminate in its favor or to grant it free tolls; and yet the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] stated on the floor of this Senate on July 15 that:

I feel very reluctant to make an argument regarding the rights of the United States under the treaty which have already come into diplomatic discussion. I feel the more reluctant because the view I entertain would require me to argue against the position which the Government of the United States may be bound to take if the opinion of the Senate should agree with the opinion of the House and this provision should be enacted into law.

It appears quite certain to me, sir, that if we enact the provision which is now before us, making the discrimination against which Great Britain protests, as the other party to this international agreement, the question raised will be one for arbitration under our existing treaty with Great Britain. It will present the simplest, most unquestionable case for the submission to an impartial tribunal of the contending claims of the two parties to the contract. We could not refuse to arbitrate the question. Great Britain could not refuse to arbitrate it. It is the kind of question which our treaty of arbitration expressly requires to be arbitrated, and it is a question which ought to be arbitrated.

Instead of arguing the question I shall content myself with suggesting to the Senate that any legislation which may be enacted ought to be framed with a view to the fact that this is a matter about which we can not finally decide. If the judgment of the Senate shall be in favor of the policy of discrimination—and mine is not; I think it is wholly unjustifiable and unnecessary—nevertheless we should exercise our power of legislation with a view to the fact that the question of our right to legislate in such a way as to discriminate is one which may be decided against us by the international tribunal to which we are bound to submit it.

Mr. President, I question the proposition stated by the Senator from New York. I do not believe that a question of this kind can ever go to The Hague tribunal any more than a case could go before a court where the court was directly interested in the decision, or any more than the parties would consent to the submission of a case to a jury where one or more of the jurymen were interested in the result. So, in any view of the case, it is not, as was stated by the Senator from New York, a question which can be determined by The Hague tribunal.

It is not inevitable that it go there, and I insist that no fair power or powers on the face of the earth would assume to try or to decide a case where their own interests were involved, as they would necessarily and naturally be in the determination of a question of this kind.

While I realize, Mr. President, that the situation is a delicate one, I can not bring myself to agree with the distinguished Senators from Massachusetts and New York, that because of the informal protest of Great Britain we are to so legislate as practically to adopt Great Britain's construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and not one which is in line with our own views and in line with the best interests of the American people.

Can it be that The Hague tribunal (even if the questions involved can ever reach it), as is suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, is a packed tribunal, where a case is already prejudged against us, because the interests of the continental powers are adverse to the interests of the American people in this controversy? If that be true, Mr. President, then the Senate acted with great wisdom when it declined to give its consent to the British and French arbitration treaties as they came to this body, and the sooner proceedings are initiated under The Hague convention to withdraw from it the better it will be for the American people.

To include the United States in the words "all nations" would practically make us powerless to protect ourselves even against an adversary in time of war, and we would be placed in the anomalous position of putting naval armaments of other nations through the Canal to destroy our coastwise cities and give to them the same facilities that we would be allowed to give to our own vessels being transferred from one coast to the other to protect those same cities against the enemy's vessels. I know that Senators have said that the condition of war is an anomalous condition and that all treaties are suspended during times of war, and yet these gentlemen are sticklers for the strictest construction of the language of that treaty. Their theory ought to go the full length, and it ought to be observed in time of war as well as any other time, because wars can not more seriously affect the interests of the country than would our interests be affected if the construction which some Senators seek to place upon this treaty is placed upon it.

The informal protest of the British Government, communicated to the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate by Mr. Knox, Secretary of State, is addressed to these propositions contained in the bill under consideration:

1. One to exempt all American shipping from tolls;
2. One to refund all American ships tolls which they might pay;
3. One to exempt from the payment of tolls American ships engaged in the coastwise trade; and
4. One to repay to the last-named class of American ships tolls which they might pay.

This analysis of the objections of Great Britain is taken from the letter which was presented to the Senate and printed in the RECORD by the Senator from Connecticut.

There might be some reasonable ground for insistence upon the first proposition, and insistence is made by some Senators, but as to the last three there is absolutely no question, for, as to the second and fourth, the nations which use the Suez Canal and which are governed by its rules do both; and as to the third, as I shall attempt later to show, such ships are engaged in interstate traffic, and the Congress has the power and authority to legislate as it pleases without reference to any treaty provision.

The views embodied in the informal British note of protest are not shared by all the men of influence and learning in Great Britain by any means, and in proof of this I call attention to certain extracts from one of the London newspapers, which were heretofore printed in the RECORD, and which I ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the London Morning Post, Jan. 2–3, 1912.]

The Committee on Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives has been to Panama to inspect the progress made on the canal and to determine the tolls to be paid by ships passing through it. The committee has just returned, and its members are agreed that tolls should range between 2s. and 4s. per ton for vessels flying foreign flags, but that a preference should be accorded to the American mercantile marine. The majority, it is said, go so far as to advocate the free use of the canal to American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade.

This second proposal, of course, does not really concern other countries, since the coasting trade of the United States is already restricted to native shipping. But foreign nations, and especially Great Britain, will be directly affected by any system of tolls so arranged as to give a preference to American vessels engaged in foreign traffic.

EQUAL TREATMENT FOR ALL.

Sir Owen Philipps, whose name is prominently before the public as the head of the largest shipping combination in the world, said: "I hope that the American Nation may see their way to make the passage across the Panama Isthmus as free as the ocean, and so lead to the canal doing the maximum amount of good to the trade of the world. But if they should decide to fix the tolls, as mentioned in your paragraph, at something between 2s. and 4s. a ton it is of the utmost importance to British shipping that the vessels of all nations should be treated exactly alike. As regards American ships trading exclusively between United States ports on the Atlantic and the ports of that country on the Pacific—trade which is exclusively confined to steamers built in the United States—British vessels would not be adversely affected if in this case only United States ships were allowed to pass through the canal free of dues.

"The present cost of running American ships is undoubtedly very considerably more than the cost of running British ships. But I do not think that is any argument to justify exceptional treatment being accorded to United States vessels going through the Panama Canal except those in the coasting trade, as it is quite possible a few years hence the position may be entirely reversed."

NO EFFECT ON BRITISH SHIPPING.

"A proposal of this sort raises the whole question of treaty relationship," remarked another authority on shipping matters. "There are certain people in America who think it is absolutely impossible for such a preference to be given, more particularly because of the pledges which the United States Government gave when she intimated her intention to construct the canal. But after all is said and done, from the point of view of foreign shipping, I think it is a relatively small matter. It sounds, perhaps, as though the preferential treatment would do a great deal for American shipping, but, as a matter of fact, it will do very little. Practically all the United States shipping is nowadays engaged in the coastwise business, and whether under this legal monopoly they are able to carry goods from New York and San Francisco a little cheaper does not matter to us in the least. Any reduction of the canal dues will only enable the shippers to compete with the transcontinental railways of the United States. That, I believe, is the point of the whole thing."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The clipping is from the morning Post, containing a statement by Sir Owen Philipps, which is at total variance with the views of some Senators on the proposition as to the power of the United States to grant discriminatory tolls to our own coastwise shipping.

I ask also to have inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks a short editorial printed in the Washington Post of May 27, 1912. I ask to have it printed because it quotes the resolutions adopted by certain foreign delegates to the International Navigation Congress, held in Philadelphia, with reference to the power of the Congress over the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

HOW FOREIGNERS SEE IT.

If those timorous Americans who feared that we might give offense to other powers by fortifying the Panama Canal, and who argued that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we had no right to take such a precaution, had had their own way, the United States would now find itself the object of much amusement in foreign countries. While many Americans were agitating the question, foreigners apparently were taking it for granted that the United States would show ordinary common sense in protecting its property, not only on its own behalf in case of war, but on behalf of the world for commercial purposes.

In view of the agitation that was waged in this country against fortifying the canal, the view of the matter expressed by delegates from France, Germany, Italy, and Russia to the international navigation congress in Philadelphia seems almost naïve. Apparently without thinking there could be two sides to the question, the delegates voted unanimously in favor of a resolution expressing this sentiment:

"Any government has the inherent right to control its canals as it pleases. It has the right to fix tolls, to allow any ships free passage and charge others, and no treaties entered into before the construction of any canal should be considered as affecting the situation."

Thus have the representatives of the leading nations of the world, all experts on navigation problems, spoken with regard to the Panama Canal. Viewed in the light of the narrow attitude of some persons in our country, the congress's decision in favor of fortification, expressed by implication in the resolution and directly in speeches, is very significant. But even more significant, in view of the present discussion as to whether or not the canal should be made free to American ships, is the straight-out declaration of the international principle governing the whole subject.

Foreign nations, through their representatives, say that the United States has a perfect right to make the canal free to American ships and charge tolls to the ships of other nations. With all nations admitting that fact, can the United States give any excuse for taxing domestic ships?

COASTWISE VESSELS ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE TRAFFIC.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I maintain that the Panama Canal Zone is to all intents and purposes American soil, and the canal itself as much the property of the United States as are the lakes and canals on and along the internal waterways of the country. As proof of this I call attention to, and ask to have inserted as a part of my remarks, articles 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the convention for the construction of a ship canal, concluded between the Republic of Panama and the United States November 18, 1903, and proclaimed February 26, 1904:

I ask to insert those articles here for the reason that they show that the Senator from Connecticut was entirely mistaken when he said in this Chamber that the United States did not have sovereignty and jurisdiction over the Panama Canal Zone under the treaty with the Panama Republic.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to print the articles referred to is granted.

The articles referred to are as follows:

ART. 2. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea, 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the zone above described, shall not be included within this grant. The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal, or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said enterprise.

The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described, and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco.

ART. 3. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said Article II which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

ART. 4. As rights subsidiary to the above grants, the Republic of Panama grants in perpetuity to the United States the right to use the rivers, streams, lakes, and other bodies of water within its limits for navigation, the supply of water or water power or other purposes, so far as the use of said rivers, streams, lakes, and bodies of water and the waters thereof may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal.

ART. 5. The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity a monopoly for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any system of communication by means of canal or railroad across its territory between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean.

ART. 6. The grants herein contained shall in no manner invalidate the titles or rights of private land holders or owners of private property in the said zone or in or to any of the lands or waters granted to the United States by the provisions of any article of this treaty, nor shall they interfere with the rights of way over the public roads passing through the said zone or over any of the said lands or waters unless said rights of way or private rights shall conflict with rights herein granted to the United States, in which case the rights of the United States shall be superior. All damages caused to the owners of private lands or private property of any kind by reason of the grants contained in this treaty or by reason of the operations of the United States, its agents, or employees, or by reason of the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of the works of sanitation and protection herein provided for, shall be appraised and settled by a joint commission, appointed by the Governments of the United States and the Republic of Panama, whose decisions as to such damages shall be final and whose award as to such damages shall be paid solely by the United States. No part of the work on said canal or the Panama railroad or on any auxiliary works relating thereto and authorized by the terms of this treaty shall be prevented, delayed, or impeded by or pending such proceedings to ascertain such damages The appraisal of said private lands and private property and the assessment of damages to them shall be based upon their value before the date of this convention.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In addition to these provisions, which are, notwithstanding the views of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, absolute grants in perpetuity, an examination of article 7 discloses that the Republic of Panama grants the right of eminent domain in the cities of Panama and Colon, and practically puts these municipalities under the sanitary laws and ordinances, whether of a preventive or curative character, prescribed by the United States.

Article 14 fixes the compensation to be paid in gross and the annual sum to be paid during the life of the convention. The Republic of Panama not only made these grants in perpetuity to the United States, but surrendered sovereignty and jurisdiction as well, and any government established there under an act of Congress will be just as effective and as binding upon all persons within the zone as the laws enacted by Congress for the government of the Territories within its boundaries.

If it be once conceded that the Panama Canal Zone belongs to the United States, then so far as vessels engaged in the coastwise trade alone are concerned there is no provision in the treaty affecting the right of Congress to enact laws providing for free tolls or discriminatory tolls any more than there is any limitation in the treaty upon the power of Congress to regulate the tolls upon the internal waterways of the United States. The consensus of opinion, in this country at least and it is shared by many distinguished British subjects, is that in so far as coastwise commerce is concerned the jurisdiction of Congress over the canal is absolute.

Under the navigation laws of this country, American vessels only can engage in this traffic. There is no competition for it by the vessels of any power on earth, and without competition no law on the subject favoring American vessels can be considered as discriminatory.

As tending to show the American view upon this subject, I call attention to the message of President Taft to the Sixty-second Congress, second session, in which he says:

I am confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same to everyone, but when we are dealing with our own ships, the practice of many Governments of subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, as equivalent remission of tolls, can not be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal. The practice in the Suez Canal makes this clear.

Now, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD, Mr. President, a statement from the Secretary of War in his last report, giving his views upon the subject of the power of Congress. I am doing this because some of our friends, both Democratic and Republican, are insisting that we have no power to favor our Government in any way, shape, or form, whether as to coastwise shipping or as to our vessels engaged in the foreign trade. I want to show that distinguished men of both parties, if you please, and gentlemen at the head of the present administration, take an entirely contrary view.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Involved in the problem of fixing tolls is the question whether the United States has the right under the treaty to pay the tolls on American vessels using the canal. An examination of the treaty and the surrounding circumstances, to my mind, leaves no doubt as to the right of the United States, both legally and morally, to pay the tolls on its vessels. This is a perfectly recognized practice in respect to the tolls of the Suez Canal, the toll rules of which canal were adopted by the United States in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for the government of the Panama Canal. At least one of our national competitors in the use of the Panama Canal, Spain, has already taken steps to provide for the payment out of her national treasury of the Panama tolls on one of the Spanish lines which will use that canal. Furthermore, I can see no difference, save in form (provided the tolls for other nations are kept reasonable, as we have also covenanted to do), whether the United States should make this appropriation out of her own Treasury to American vessels, by receiving the toll money from them first and repaying it to them, or by simply relieving them from the payment of tolls in the first place.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In an address delivered by the Secretary of War before the commercial club at Kansas City, November 14, 1911, on "Some problems of the Panama Canal," he committed himself fully to the doctrine which I am now insisting upon. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD what he had to say on the subject, without reading it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Closely involved in this question of fixing the tolls is the question whether the United States has the right to pay the tolls on American vessels using the canal. There has been criticism against even the suggestion of this possibility. There was similar criticism a few years ago against the proposition to fortify the canal, until the publication of Secretary Hay's correspondence with Lord Lansdowne revealed the frankness of our negotiations on that subject with Great Britain and showed how clearly Great Britain had recognized our right to fortify the canal. The United States will deal with its sister nations in perfect frankness and in absolute fulfillment of its treaty pledges. There will be no violation of our treaties; neither will there be any evasion of them. When the facts as to this question are examined, they are, in my opinion, so clear as to leave no doubt or question as to the right of the United States, both legal and moral, in this respect. The clause of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which governs the question is a declaration by the United States which expressly adopts the rules governing the Suez Canal. It provides:

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

Now, in the case of the Suez Canal, it has never been considered a violation of this rule of neutralization for a nation to pay the tolls upon the vessels flying its flag. This is done directly by the Governments of Russia and Austria-Hungary, which have made appropriations for the express purpose of paying the tolls of vessels of their merchant marine. Furthermore, substantially every other European Government appropriates from its treasury and pays to vessels using the Suez Canal, in the form of subsidies, sums of money fully or partly equivalent to the tolls of the canal. In the case of Germany, France, Japan, Italy, and Spain the amount thus appropriated is regularly more than sufficient to pay the tolls. In the case of Great Britain the subsidies paid to the Peninsula & Oriental Co.—the principal line which uses the canal—amount to nearly six-sevenths of the tolls. These subsidies were not all limited to mail steamers; many of them were paid likewise on freight steamers.

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that when the Panama Canal is opened the English vessels which use it, the German vessels which use it, the vessels of practically all of our competitors which use it, will be in receipt from their respective Governments of sums of money, either given them directly for the purpose of paying their tolls or perfectly applicable in their discretion to such use. It will be impossible for the United States to prevent this, for under the Suez rules, which we have thus adopted for Panama, such payment does not amount to a discrimination or a violation of the terms of entire equality, for which those rules provide. Is, then, the United States, which built the canal, to be the one Nation whose vessels can not have such assistance? Will any rule of construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or any rule of honor prevent the United States from adopting a similar course? Will anyone contend that the almost universal system of governmental assistance to a merchant marine has been limited in our case by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—limited not by plain and express covenant, but by indirection and implication? Would Great Britain dream of making such a contention against the United States when she herself is paying annual subsidies to her merchant marine of between six and seven million dollars a year? Has the United States, in her covenant to "insure the neutrality of the canal on terms of entire equality," so shackled her own powers that she can not resort to the universally established methods which her competitors will use in respect to their vessels passing through the canal? Does equality to all other nations mean inequality to the United States? The answer is self-evident.

The clause was never intended to forbid a nation to assist her own marine with her own funds. By it the United States barred herself from using her power over the canal to injure the trade of another. She could not isolate or discriminate in any way against another in that other's use of the canal. But it was never dreamed that she could not use the resources of her own Treasury in favor of her own vessels.

I think, therefore, that the United States has a clear right to appropriate to the vessels, paying the same the sums paid into its Treasury by those vessels in the form of canal tolls. This being so, there is no difference, save in form, whether she makes this appropriation out of her Treasury to such vessels by receiving the money from them first and repaying it to them, or by simply relieving them from the payment of those tolls. In either case the money in question belongs to the United States. In either case it amounts to a gift by the United States of her own funds to the vessels in question.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor, in his last annual report, at page 102, says:

Every State in the Union with navigable waters crossing its boundaries furnishes precedents of congressional appropriations for the establishment and maintenance of improvements at the continuing expense of the Federal Treasury and without a dollar's help from the vessels which enjoy the advantages of such improvements. Where the future of American shipping is at stake, and the domestic commerce of both seaboards and the Gulf is involved, there is no apparent reason to depart from a principle which has been so constantly invoked. * * *

The Panama Canal is being built in the belief that it will benefit all sections of the country and nearly every form of American industry. Our merchant ships and shipyards are as essential to the Nation as our battleships. They have at least a claim to equal consideration in canal legislation and appropriations with other American industries. Every argument to tax the American merchant ship which uses the canal would apply with equal force to a tax directly on American cotton, lumber, fruit, coal, grain, and other cargo carried by the ship through the canal. It is feasible to use the canal for the promotion of American navigation in a manner consistent with treaty obligations, with precedent at home and abroad, and with our fixed policy of untaxed navigation on improved waterways.

In this connection I call the attention of my Democratic friends to the enunciation of the Democratic convention at Baltimore on the subject a short while ago, where this resolution was adopted:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

We also favor legislation forbidding the use of the Panama Canal by ships owned or controlled by railroad carriers engaged in transportation competitive with the canal.

So at least one of the great parties of this country has committed itself to this same doctrine.

As evidence that this opinion is held by representative men and bodies of this country, I call attention to resolutions which have been adopted by various commercial organizations. These organizations are composed of the brightest business and professional men in the country, and the resolutions adopted by them are entitled to the greatest weight in attempting to arrive at a proper conception of the power of Congress in the premises. I will ask, Mr. President, that the resolutions adopted by these commercial bodies be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

RESOLUTIONS INDICATING PUBLIC SENTIMENT THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY IN FAVOR OF FREE TOLLS FOR AMERICAN SHIPS IN THE COASTWISE TRADE THROUGH THE PANAMA CANAL.

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the Lakes-to-the-Gulf Deep Waterways Association at the sixth annual convention, Chicago, Ill., October 12, 13, 14, 1911:

"The policy of free waterways is fundamental with the American people, and hence this association declares that this principle should be extended to our coastwise trade through the Panama Canal."

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress which convened in Washington in December, 1911, consisting of over 1,200 delegates, representing every State in the Union:

"We submit that waterways improved or created by the Federal Government by the use of money contributed by the whole people of the United States should be free for the use of American ships in fair and open competition and on equal terms, without the payment of tolls, but we contend that a water carrier owned, controlled, or operated by a competing land carrier is unfair competition, and in order to preserve to the whole people the benefits of continued fair competition so that the beneficent influence of open waterways shall not be nullified by hostile interests, we recommend the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the end that the commission may more effectually regulate competing land and water carriers and competing water carriers and provide for the interchange of traffic."

Resolutions adopted at a meeting held in Washington December 6, 1911, composed of delegates representing civic and commercial bodies of the Pacific coast, cities on the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic coast, and the cities of Philadelphia, Newark, Trenton, Richmond, Buffalo, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Pittsburgh:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal for the benefit of its own people, as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in time of war, and for the facilitation of its domestic commerce, as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

"Whereas the coastwise commerce between ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations, and particularly with Great Britain;

"Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope on the one hand and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

"Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent never dreamed of before, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity to the consumer;

"Whereas ample precedents exist for exempting the domestic commerce of the United States from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal; and

"Whereas the operation of the canal under this condition will greatly stimulate and increase American shipping:

"Resolved, That the Conference for Panama Canal Free Tolls for American Coastwise Commerce strongly and urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted free passage through the Panama Canal."

The Boston Chamber of Commerce adopted resolutions similar to the above.

Resolutions passed by delegates representing the various chambers of commerce of the Pacific coast held in San Francisco, Cal., October 2, 1911:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things of providing for the national defense, of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries, to provide through natural methods and to prevent monopoly of transportation means for transportation between the various sections of the Union at the lowest possible cost, to build up and expand our commerce with foreign nations, and incidentally to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine: Be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through the canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows: 'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting as a wise amendment to the interstate-commerce law a provision prohibiting interstate-commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefits of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards which this canal was constructed to secure.'"

Resolutions adopted at the forty-second annual meeting of the National Board of Trade, Washington, D. C., January 18, 1912:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal, for the benefit of its own people, as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in time of war, and for facilitating its domestic and foreign commerce, as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

"Whereas the coastwise commerce between ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations;

"Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope on the one hand and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

"Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent heretofore found impossible, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity:

"Resolved, That the National Board of Trade urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted preferential tolls in passing through the Panama Canal: Provided, That when such vessels are owned, controlled, or operated, directly or indirectly, by any land transportation line or lines no preferential tolls shall be granted to the vessels so owned, operated, or controlled."

Resolutions adopted by the Navy League of the United States at convention held in city of Washington, February 23, 1912:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy—amongst other things of providing for the national defense, of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries, and of encouraging the upbuilding of our merchant marine, which has practically disappeared from the foreign trade: Be it

"Resolved, That although it is the sense of this meeting that the question of tolls through the Panama Canal is one beyond the scope of this league's present activities, yet be it further

"Resolved, That as we believe the war-time efficiency of our Navy will depend in part on the existence of a fleet of merchant vessels available as naval auxiliaries, we heartily approve of any legislation directly or indirectly aiding in building up the American merchant marine, and we believe that if Congress in its wisdom deems it advisable to levy tolls that these tolls should be returned to the ships, either in the coastwise or foreign trade, for the purpose of assisting in rehabilitating that merchant marine."

Resolution adopted by Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, December 14, 1911:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing, entirely at its own cost, the Panama Canal for the benefit of its own people as a military measure for the naval protection of either coast in the time of war and for the facilitation of its domestic commerce as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world;

"Whereas the coastwise commerce between the ports of the United States is confined by law to vessels registered under the American flag, so that regulations established by the Government of the United States for the use of the canal by such vessels will not conflict in any way with the treaty obligations of the United States with other nations;

"Whereas there is a great and growing demand for cheaper and freer interchange of commodities between the States of the Pacific slope on the one hand and those bordering on and tributary to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, including all the States along the Mississippi and its navigable branches, on the other;

"Whereas the opening of the canal, through the continuous and direct water transportation it will afford, will give the people of this country opportunities to interchange commodities of the different districts to an extent never contemplated before, and thus will reduce the cost of a large number of articles of daily use and necessity;

"Whereas ample precedents exist for exempting the domestic commerce of the United States from the payment of tolls for passage through the canal; and

"Whereas the operation of the canal under this condition will greatly stimulate and increase American shipping:

"Resolved, That the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce urgently recommends that vessels engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States shall be granted free passage through the Panama Canal."

Resolutions adopted by commercial bodies of the State of Washington, November 3, 1911:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things to provide for the national defense, to open up the shortest possible water route between the ports of the United States and between the United States and foreign countries, to prevent monopoly of means of transportation between the various sections of the Union and to provide such transportation to the people of the United States at the lowest possible cost, to build up and expand commerce with foreign nations, and, incidentally, to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine; and

"Whereas it is of the utmost importance to the State of Washington, and to all the States bordering on the Pacific Ocean, that their products—lumber, shingles, salmon, fruits, hops, wool, and other products—be most widely distributed at the least possible expense throughout the United States: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the following civic bodies of the State of Washington, viz: The New Seattle Chamber of Commerce, the Tacoma Commercial Club and Chamber of Commerce, the Olympia Chamber of Commerce, the Bellingham Chamber of Commerce, the Everett Chamber of Commerce, the Port Townsend Commercial Club, the Aberdeen Chamber of Commerce, the Hoquiam Chamber of Commerce, the Bremerton Commercial Club, the Raymond Commercial Club, through their representatives in conference assembled, That there should be no tolls charged through the Panama Canal to vessels flying the American flag engaged in coastwise traffic of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows: 'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting as a wise amendment to the interstate-commerce laws a provision prohibiting interstate-commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefits of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards which this canal was constructed to secure.' Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each Senator and Representative of the States west of the Rocky Mountains and of the States bordering on the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico and of the States in the Mississippi and Missouri River Valleys, and that these resolutions be accompanied by a request to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Washington to support and vote for such arrangement of tolls."

Resolutions adopted by New Orleans Progressive Union, February 9, 1912:

"(1) The New Orleans Progressive Union indorses the proposition that American vessels engaged in coastwise trade shall pay no tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

"(2) Should it be found necessary that American ships engaged in foreign trade shall pay tollage, the United States Government, by drawback, rebate, or otherwise, shall refund amount to such American vessels.

"(3) In the fixing of tolls for vessels passing through the Panama Canal the President shall have the right to reduce tolls to meet competition or other conditions that may arise, after 90 days' notice.

"(4) If the conditions at any time be found that the canal should be entirely free, that the rebate referred to in section 2 shall nevertheless continue to American vessels."

Resolutions adopted by Central Labor Council of Portland, Oreg., October 10, 1911:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through the canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we approve of amendments to the present interstate-commerce laws provisions prohibiting railroads under their jurisdiction from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal, to the effect that the people of the United States may have the benefits resulting in competition between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, for which purpose his canal was primarily intended."

Resolutions adopted by the Merchants' Association of New York, March 5, 1912:

"Whereas the United States, by act of Congress passed in 1884, made the following declaration of policy regarding tolls or charges relative to waterways acquired or constructed by the Federal Government: 'No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use of and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed'; and

"Whereas under that policy, which is still in operation, the United States has expended on local waterway developments nearly $700,000,000 at the general expense of the whole country; and

"Whereas the Federal Government, in addition to its vast expenditures of public funds upon internal and seacoast waterways, for the use and benefit of all sections and of all the people, free from imposition of tolls or charges for the use thereof, has also made vast grants of public lands of incalculable present value to the transcontinental railways to promote their construction and the interests of the whole country, especially of the sections which they directly serve; and

"Whereas the Panama Canal is constructed primarily because of the military and economic necessities of the entire United States, and when completed will be of direct commercial benefit to a larger area of the country than any other waterway ever constructed or improved by the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the extension of the general policy of freedom from tolls to the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal can not create a discrimination against any other nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise because of the fact that no such nation has been or now is permitted by law to engage in such coastwise commerce, which law was in operation and contemplation at the time of the negotiation and ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and

"Whereas the provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty appears to relate to the avoidance of discriminations between the nations and therefore does not pertain to our domestic coastwise trade, in the treatment of which there can be no such discrimination as prohibited in said treaty: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the report of the special committee on tolls on coastwise commerce passing through the Panama Canal, dated February 26, 1912, be, and hereby is, approved; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Merchants' Association of New York opposes the proposition of imposing any tolls whatsoever upon the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal, unless it be determined, by competent authority, that the imposing of such tolls is required in fulfillment of our treaty obligations."

Resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, March 7, 1912:

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York earnestly urges the President of the United States and the Congress, while honorably carrying out all existing treaties or obligations entered into with foreign countries, to arrange the tolls on the Panama Canal so as to carefully protect American interests and bring about the upbuilding of our merchant marine; and that we advocate, as a measure to this end, that the rates of toll on vessels engaged in the coastal trade shall be not over one-third the rates charged on vessels engaged in deep-sea business, or free if necessary to accomplish purposes desired.

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and to all Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives."

Resolutions adopted by the Maritime Association of the Port of New York, July 12, 1911:

"Whereas, from present indications, the Panama Canal will be ready for use by merchant shipping in about two years' time; and

"Whereas it is necessary that those contemplating the operation of vessels through the canal should be informed at the earliest possible moment regarding the regulations that will govern said operation, so that sufficient time will be given to conform with every requirement: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That Congress be strongly urged to enact at this session such legislation as will enable the President to fix the tolls to be charged for the use of the canal, it being the consensus of opinion of this committee that in the fixing of said tolls American vessels should be exempted from all charges."

Resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, December 13, 1911:

"Whereas the Panama Canal is being constructed by the United States Government, and the people of the United States are paying the whole cost thereof, and will be obliged to pay the cost of maintenance and repairs, whether the revenues are adequate or not; and

"Whereas the people of the United States have entered upon this great work chiefly for the benefit that it will be to our own commerce; and

"Whereas the construction of the Panama Canal by the United States will not give to the American people the full measure of benefits they are entitled to if our commerce is compelled to pay the same tolls that other peoples are required to pay: Therefore,

"Resolved, That Congress be strongly urged to enact at this session Panama Canal, the people of the United States are entitled to receive the fullest possible advantages therefrom; that other nations should be permitted to use the canal upon reasonable terms alike to all; that American vessels in the foreign trade should pay the same tolls as vessels of other nations, unless existing treaties would permit such American vessels to pass free; that the commerce of the United States passing between United States ports should be allowed free passage through the Panama Canal in all ships of American registry and should be regarded and regulated as coastwise commerce of the United States.

"Resolved, That, having expended so large a sum in constructing the United States to give the most serious consideration to the enactment of laws declaring commerce between American ports, passing through the Panama Canal, as coastwise commerce of the United States and free of tolls, and, if treaty provisions or commercial conventions which have provisions for termination by notice from either party, will permit to also consider the making of the Panama Canal free to all vessels of American registry."

Resolutions adopted by the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, December 13, 1911:

"Whereas the Panama Canal is being constructed by the United States Government and the people of the United States are paying the whole cost thereof, and will be obliged to pay the cost of maintenance and repairs, whether the revenues are adequate or not; and

"Whereas the people of the United States have entered upon this great work chiefly for the benefit that it will be to our own commerce; and

"Whereas the construction of the Panama Canal by the United States will not give to the American people the full measure of benefits they are entitled to if our commerce is compelled to pay the same tolls that other peoples are required to pay: Therefore

"Resolved, That, having expended so large a sum in constructing the Panama Canal, the people of the United States are entitled to receive the fullest possible advantages therefrom; that other nations should be permitted to use the canal upon reasonable terms alike to all; that American vessels in the foreign trade should pay the same tolls as vessels of other nations, unless existing treaties would permit such American vessels to pass free; that the commerce of the United States passing between United States ports should be allowed free passage through the Panama Canal in all ships of American registry and should be regarded and regulated as coastwise commerce of the United States.

"Resolved, That we petition the Government and Congress of the United States to give the most serious consideration to the enactment of laws declaring commerce between American ports passing through the Panama Canal as coastwise commerce of the United States and free of tolls, and if treaty provisions or commercial conventions which have provisions for termination by notice from either party will permit, to also consider the making of the Panama Canal free to all vessels of American registry."

Resolutions adopted by the resolutions committee of the Waterway Conference of the Southern Commercial Congress, and unanimously approved and adopted by the Southern Commercial Congress at its convention at Nashville, Tenn., on April 10, 1912:

"We favor the adoption of a law by Congress granting the use of the Panama Canal to American ships engaged in coastwise commerce free of toll and the prevention of the use of the canal by any steamship line owned or controlled by a railway or any monopolistic interest.

"We favor such legislation as is necessary to induce the construction of a merchant marine for the United States and the carrying of American commerce in American ships under the American flag."

Resolutions passed at meeting of the Mobile (Ala.) Chamber of Commerce and Business League, held Monday, March 18, 1912:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of the great national policy, amongst other things, of providing for the national defense; of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries; to provide, through natural methods and to prevent monopoly of transportation, means for transportation between the various sections of the foreign nations and incidentally to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine: Be it

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that there should be no tolls charged through this canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag: And be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows:

"'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting, as a wise amendment to the interstate-commerce law, a provision prohibiting interstate-commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save the people of the United States the benefits of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards which this canal was constructed to secure.'"

Resolution adopted by Board of Trade of Tampa, Fla.:

"Whereas the Governement of the United States has expended nearly $700,000,000 for the improvement of rivers and harbors and the construction of canals, and by act of Congress, passed 1884, declared as follows: 'No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States, or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed'; and

"Whereas the Panama Canal was built by American money, American genius, and American enterprise, and with the understanding by the American people that the canal would be operated for their benefit, primarily because of the military and economic necessities of the entire United States and for commercial benefit of the whole country; and

"Whereas the imposition of tolls or charges for the use thereof of American boats engaged in American commerce would in many instances prohibit the shipping of American products from coast to coast, the interchange of products of the Pacific and the Atlantic and the Gulf, therefore defeating the very ends for which the American people indorsed the tremendous project and the expenditure of nearly a half billion of American dollars in the building of the Panama Canal: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the board of governors of the Board of Trade of Tampa, Fla., in session April 24, 1912, That we object and protest in strongest terms against this language in section 5 of the House bill 21969: 'No preference shall be given nor discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or its subjects, other than to vessels belonging to the Government of the United States.' And be it further

"Resolved, That this section of the bill be so amended that preferential treatment may be accorded American vessels of commerce, or at least those engaged in the coastwise trade; and be it further

"Resolved, That public interest demands the passage of section 11 of said bill, so that the relations between carriers by water and carriers by rail may be established on a proper basis.

MARCH 16, 1912.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA IN RE PANAMA CANAL BILL.

After a public hearing and a careful investigation into the law and the facts, the Railroad Commission of the State of California makes the following recommendations in the matter of the Panama Canal bill now pending before Congress:

"(1) We recommend that vessels owned, operated, or controlled by railroads and engaged in whole or in part in coastwise trade be barred from the Panama Canal, and suggest the advisability of extending this principle so as to make it unlawful for any railroad to own, operate, or control any common carrier by water with which such railroad does or may compete for traffic between points within the United States.

"Under the decision of the United States Supreme Court on the so-called commodities clause in the interstate-commerce act, in the case of United States v. Delaware & Hudson Co. (213 U. S., 366), we believe there can be no doubt as to the legal right of the Government to compel a railroad to sell its holdings in a steamship line. We can find no valid reason in governmental policy against this recommendation. The inevitable result of permitting railroads to own, operate, or control competing steamship lines through the Panama Canal, as shown by the history of the coastwise traffic of this country, will be to crush out every independent line, to give to the railroads the control of the Panama Canal and consequently to keep freight rates higher than they normally would be. We would refer in this connection to the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of Railroad Commission of Nevada v. Southern Pacific Co. (21 I. C. R., 329), decided on June 22, 1911, in which case the history of steamship competition in this country is fully explained.

"(2) We recommend that American shipping engaged in coastwise trade through the canal be exempt from the payment of tolls.

"Under the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) it is clear that the United States may carry out this recommendation. The provision in section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to the effect that 'The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise'—whatever the full effect thereof may be—certainly does not apply to coastwise traffic for the reason that as American vessels may alone engage in such traffic there can be no question of discrimination as against the vessels of other nations. The Olsen case squarely sustains this position.

"The remission of tolls on vessels engaged in the coastwise trade will make it possible for them to lower to that extent the freight rates which they would otherwise have to charge and in this way the American people will secure a reduction in freight rates to which they are clearly entitled as the result of the tremendous sums which they have expended in the construction of the canal.

"We use the words 'American people' advisedly. We do not concede that the lower freight rates between coast points brought about by water competition through the canal can in anywise injure interior localities. On the one hand, the free movement of traffic between coast points not only will operate for the benefit of these localities, but such benefit will be reflected far inland and the general prosperity of the country will necessarily result. On the other hand, lower freight rates to coast points will not operate disadvantageously to the interior by increasing rates to and from interior points. It is well established that railroads may not lower their rates to meet competition to such an extent as to burden other traffic. If rightly regulated the railroads of the United States must give reasonable rates to all points, and reasonable rates are all that they can be forced to give. The fact that a less than reasonable rate is put in by railroad companies voluntarily to meet water competition does not justify such railroad in putting any different rate in effect elsewhere than it could legally put in if it did not meet such competition. The result, then, of free competition through the canal will be a lower rate to coast points than would otherwise prevail, which lower rate to the coast points will have its effect to that point in the interior where the local freight rate from the coast to such points plus the steamship rates equals the transcontinental rate from the opposite coast point. Much of the interior, therefore, will be better off than it now is and none of it can be worse off, because, as we have stated, the railroads must accord the same reasonable rate when they meet competition as they are allowed under the law to give when they do not meet such competition.

"(3) We recommended that American shipping engaged in foreign trade and using the Panama Canal be likewise exempted from the payment of tolls or that subsidies equivalent in amount, at least, to those paid by other Governments to their ships using the canal be provided by the United States.

"Otherwise, the United States, which built the canal at a tremendous outlay, will be the only nation whose vessels are sailing through the canal without Government assistance. We do not believe that there is anything in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to prevent such action on the part of the United States. The treaty provides that the rules of neutralization to govern the canal are to be substantially the same as those which govern the use of the Suez Canal. The vessels of Great Britain and other nations using the Suez Canal receive subsidies from their Governments, and no one has ever contended that the principle of equality in the use of the canal is thereby violated. In the same way the United States can clearly pay subsidies to her vessels using the Panama Canal, and what she can do directly by the payment of subsidies she certainly can do indirectly by the remission of tolls in the same amount.

"We respectfully direct the attention of California's Representative in Congress to these recommendations and urge that they do all in their power to secure their adoption in the Panama Canal bill.

RESOLUTION IN RE PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Resolved by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, That we reaffirm the statement of the principles and policy involved in the resolutions adopted by this chamber as a member of the Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, October 2, 1911, as follows:

"Whereas the building of the Panama Canal was undertaken by the people of the United States in pursuance of a great national policy, amongst other things of providing for the national defense, of opening up the shortest possible water route between the respective coasts of the United States and foreign countries, to provide through natural methods and to prevent monopoly of transportation and means for transportation between the various sections of the Union at the lowest possible cost, to build up and expand our commerce with foreign nations, and incidentally to encourage the upbuilding of a now decadent merchant marine: Be it

"Resolved, That there should be no tolls charged through the Panama Canal to vessels coastwise flying the American flag; and be it further

"Resolved, That we heartily approve of the legislation recommended by President Taft in his message to Congress of December 6, 1910, reading as follows:

"'I can not close this reference to the canal without suggesting as a wise amendment to the interstate-commerce law a provision prohibiting interstate-commerce railroads from owning or controlling ships engaged in the trade through the Panama Canal. I believe such a provision may be needed to save to the people of the United States the benefit of the competition in trade between the eastern and western seaboards which this canal was constructed to secure.'

"Resolved, That the recent action of the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives in relation to Panama Canal tolls is at variance in all essential particulars with the foregoing statement of the principles and policy, which, in our opinion, should govern legislation on this subject, and we desire to emphasize the protest which this chamber has heretofore made to this proposed action of Congress by transmitting a copy of this resolution to every Member of the House of Representatives and to every United States Senator."

I hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of the resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce at the regular meeting held Wednesday, March 13, 1912.

Hon. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce reiterates its earnest and solemn protest to placing a tollgate at entrance to Panama Canal to collect tax in name of toll against American commerce and shipping engaged in coastwise trade, thus discriminating against people of Pacific coast by levying tax that is not exacted against vessels or craft engaged in similar coastwise commerce in Soo Canal, Erie Canal, and various rivers made navigable at Government expense in which Pacific coast bears its proportionate share. This chamber is also absolutely opposed to permitting ships owned or controlled wholly or in part by railway companies to engage in coastwise traffic through Panama Canal.

Oakland Chamber of Commerce to-day adopted the following:

"Resolved, That Oakland Chamber of Commerce is in favor of such legislation as will prevent the operation through canal of ships in coastwise trade owned or operated in combination with railroads which will prevent equalizing effect upon rates of water route.

"Resolved, That Oakland Chamber of Commerce urges upon Congress such laws as will exempt from canal tolls all ships sailing under American flag engaged in coastwise traffic."

Washington, D. C.:

We heartily indorse your efforts for congressional action for the remission of tolls for American ships in the coastwise trade, realizing that the benefits to be derived for this coast will otherwise be nullified. We are all proud of you, with the position you have taken in this vital matter.

Hon. JOSEPH R. KNOWLAND, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the board of directors of the San Jose (Cal.) Chamber of Commerce we unanimously passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this chamber of commerce is opposed to the operation through the Panama Canal of any railroad owned or controlled ship engaged wholly or partly in coastwise traffic; also that we strongly urge upon the Senate and House of Representatives the enactment of laws that will exempt from canal tolls all ships sailing under the American flag engaged in coastwise traffic."

Yours, very respectfully,

JOS. T. BROOKS, Secretary-Manager.

SEATTLE, WASH., March 13, 1912.

This bureau is unalterably opposed to the operation through the Panama Canal of any steamship line owned, operated, or controlled directly or indirectly, by a railroad engaged in interstate commerce. We trust every effort will be used to prevent it. If not prevented, canal will be useless in controlling transcontinental rates, and will in nowise benefit interstate commerce between States bordering on United States littoral.

TRANSPORTATION BUREAU OF THE NEW SEATTLE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Northwestern Association of Box Manufacturers by a regular vote of the members at Portland, Oreg., on the 22d of March, 1912:

"Whereas the Government of the United States is constructing the Panama Canal, entirely at its own cost, for the benefit of its own people, as a military measure and for the facilitation of its domestic commerce, as well as for the furtherance of the commerce of the world; and

"Whereas in so far as respects domestic commerce in the United States the Panama Canal is a part of the interrelated waterway system of the United States; and

"Whereas the United States, by act of Congress passed in 1884, made the following declaration of policy regarding tolls or charges relative to waterways acquired or constructed by the Federal Government: 'No tolls or operating charges shall be levied upon or collected from any vessel, dredge, or other water craft for passing through any lock, canal, canalized river, or other work for the use of and benefit of navigation now belonging to the United States or that may be hereafter acquired or constructed'; and

"Whereas the extension of the general policy of freedom from tolls to the domestic coastwise commerce of the United States passing through the Panama Canal can not create a discrimination against any other nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges or traffic, or otherwise, because of the fact that no such nation has been or now is permitted by law to engage in such coastwise commerce; and

"Whereas it is necessary in order to secure to the people of the United States the benefits of the competition between the eastern and western seaboards of the United States, through said canal, and on other waterways of the United States, that railroad owned or controlled steamship companies should not be permitted to use said canal, and that railroads should not be permitted to own, control, or operate competing lines of water carriers on the waters of the United States—

"Resolved, First. That there should be no tolls charged to vessels or on their cargoes engaged in domestic commerce between ports of the United States passing through the Panama Canal.

"Second. That a law be enacted making it unlawful for railroads to own, lease, operate, or control any competing steamship or other water lines on or through the Panama Canal or other waterways of the United States or between the ports thereof."

Resolutions of the Merchants' Association of New York, adopted May 7, 1912:

"Whereas the waterways of the country, including the Panama Canal when completed, are largely the creation of national expenditure, and are valuable in proportion as they are utilized for transportation; and

"Whereas the extent of their utilization is largely influenced by the charges imposed upon the traffic which avails of them, which charges should be regulated by the competitive conditions which should normally and fairly exist; and

"Whereas it is the declared policy and the duty of the Government to safeguard the independence of such competition, and laws enacted for that purpose have been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States to prohibit a consolidation under one control of different railroad lines competing for the same traffic; and

"Whereas it is evident that a consolidation of control of transportation over a water route and a land route which are parallel and competitive would imply an advantage which would not inhere in the control of either route independently, and that independent transportation by water would thus be placed at a disadvantage by such joint control, which would tend to destroy the benefit to the public which free competition would afford; and

"Whereas it has transpired in proceedings before the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Spokane and other rate cases that efforts are being made to minimize the natural advantages arising from location on the seaboard and from less expensive transportation by water, which efforts, if successful, would tend arbitrarily to divert both the distributive and manufacturing business from the seaboard; and

"Whereas the history of control by railroads of water lines competitive with such roads discloses a general tendency to eliminate independent competition by water resulting in a subsequent increase in the rates charged for water transportation: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Merchants' Association of New York approves the principle embodied in section 11 of the proposed act of Congress known as H. R. 21969, which prohibits the ownership or control by a railroad line of facilities for transportation by a water route competing for the same traffic, and urges that it be enacted into law."

AMERICANS LIVING IN ENGLAND.

At a meeting of the London (England) Section of the Navy League of the United States, on Friday, March 29, 1912:

Moved by F. C. Van Duzer:

"Whereas the opening of the Panama Canal will unquestionably effect great changes in our coastwise trade, leading to an increasing demand for an efficient merchant marine;

"Whereas the new canal route will be open to ships of all nations, involving increased protective measures for the proper safeguarding of American interests, which must comprise a strong merchant marine as a necessary auxiliary to an efficient navy;

"Whereas the American merchant marine is at the present time decadent and the Navy League has repeatedly passed resolutions in favor of general measures having for their object the restoration of the American merchant marine: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That this meeting of members of the Navy League of the United States in London views with concern the present inefficiency of the American merchant marine to cope with the trade of its own country; that, with special regard to developments likely to occur in connection with the opening of the Panama Canal, it urges upon the Navy League at home to continue to use every effort within its power for the promotion of legislative measures calculated to raise the American merchant marine to a footing commensurate with the needs, present as well as future, of our coastwise trade (but, above all, to endure a naval auxiliary fleet), and by subsidies, remission of canal dues, or otherwise, as the high discretion of Congress may determine, to so encourage private enterprise in the shipping industry at home as to insure the service becoming a powerful auxiliary to our naval arm."

Seconded by Arthur G. Glasgow.

Carried unanimously.

Signed on behalf of the governing committee.

THOMAS L. FIELD, Chairman.
FRED M. FISK,
Honorable Secretary.

SALEM, OREG., March 13, 1912.

The effect of the ownership or control of competing water lines by rail lines in this country is too well known to require any extended explanation. This control and ownership has practically eliminated water competition and largely minimized water transportation. There are bills now pending in Congress containing provisions which forbid the ownership or control, directly or indirectly, of competing steamer or boat lines by rail lines. Some bills limit it only to use of steamers using the Panama Canal. We believe the law should be general in its scope. We respectfully solicit your support of the bills now pending advocating laws forbidding such ownership or control. We know of nothing that is more detrimental to the development of water transportation than is the ownership or control of competing water lines by rail lines.

RAILROAD COMMISSION OF OREGON.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have requested that these resolutions be inserted in the RECORD so as to show that this is not a local question; that it is not a question that had its birth at San Francisco or at New York or at New Orleans or at any other one place in this country. It is a demand that comes up from the commercial life of the whole Nation—the North and the South, the East and the West, and the Middle West—all making a united appeal.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. What do I understand those resolutions are? Do I understand they are resolutions condemning the railroad ownership of steamships?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Possibly some of them do that. Most of them, however, I will say, are in favor of the remission of tolls on coastwise shipping.

Mr. LIPPITT. I did not understand exactly what the Senator was discussing. I was only going to say that if the purpose of introducing those resolutions is to show what the Senator said, that all sections of this country are opposed to the railroads owning steamships, I want to register my utter disagreement with that statement and the disagreement of the section which I in part represent. On the contrary, that section is very strongly in favor of having railroad-owned steamships. Resolutions to that effect have been passed by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, by the board of trade of the city of Providence, and by other organizations.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I know that there is a difference of opinion on that subject in some sections of the country. The distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has to-day shown how some of the differences on this subject have originated in California. I do not mean to suggest that that is the origin of the protest in Rhode Island, because I do not know the conditions there; but I do know that the Senator from California stated the fact when he informed the Senate that the objections and protests which came from California originated with the very interests we are trying to regulate and control, namely, the railroad transportation companies which are interested in throttling coastwise shipping. But the Senator's [Mr. LIPPITT's] whole section is not in line with his views. If I am not mistaken—I have not looked into the matter for some days—the Boston Chamber of Commerce, or one of the commercial bodies of that city, adopted resolutions favoring the passage of coastwise shipping through the canal without tolls.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think, Mr. President, if I may be allowed to interrupt the Senator again, that the Boston Harbor commission—I do not recall at the minute just the name of it, but it is a commission which has charge of the harbor of Boston and other shipping interests that are controlled by the State—is very strongly in favor of having the New England railroad-owned steamships admitted to the canal. I should like to say to the Senator, inasmuch as that particular branch of the subject is under consideration, that we feel that the greatest possible competition can be obtained by permitting the steamships owned by the Atlantic coast-line railroads to go through the canal. New England has built up a great transportation system by the combined use of steamships and railroads on what is perhaps the greatest inland waterway in the world, at least the greatest inland waterway that has ocean connections. It has been built up after experiments with many different systems of transportation. The result of it has been an organization that gives, perhaps, the most efficient transportation that I know of in the world. I know of no other place where freight can be delivered from a factory at noon of one day and put upon the counters of merchants 200 miles distant by 10 o'clock the next morning.

That system of transportation has been built up with the entire approval of the people whom it serves; it has been the subject of constant debate among the people it serves; it was, as I have said, approved by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, by the Board of Trade of the city of Providence, by large numbers of petitions sent by the principal shippers; and we believe that through the Atlantic coast railroads, which have no possible interest in transcontinental shipments, the strongest possible financial backing can be given to steamship lines through the canal.

I do not want to discuss this matter at length in the Senator's time, but as I listened to him I thought I caught the statement that all sections of the country were opposed to such a proceeding; and I simply wanted to register my protest against that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. How many different railroad companies are there in New England?

Mr. LIPPITT. So long as that matter has been brought up, I should like to correct a statement that has been made here on that subject. The statement was made by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], in a speech on this subject delivered 10 days or so ago, that every mile of railroad line in New England or every mile of railroad east of New York was in the hands of one railroad company. Those are not the facts, as I understand them. There are several railroad companies in New England. I believe, as a matter of fact, that out of some 7,000 miles of railroad, some 1,700 miles are owned by railroads other than the New Haven.

In Rhode Island——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is it not a fact that ownership, or control, rather, is in one company?

Mr. LIPPITT. It is absolutely not so, as I understand the situation. I am speaking about 1,700 miles of road in which the New Haven has no possible interest.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is it not true that one road owns or controls all of the coastwise ships?

Mr. LIPPITT. No, sir.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That it owns all of the coastwise ships that operate between Boston and New York?

Mr. LIPPITT. No, sir. The contrary is true. There is no monopoly of water transportation on the New England coast in the hands of anybody.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What independent line have you between Boston and New York?

Mr. LIPPITT. Between Boston and New York?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes. Lines that are not controlled by the New York, New Haven & Hartford?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not think there are any ships out of Boston to New York controlled by the New Haven. I am not sure about that, but I think it is so. But I will say that I do not believe there is one single point of any importance upon the Atlantic coast where there is not competition in water transportation.

I want to say to the Senator that the most important transportation on the Atlantic coast is the transportation of coal. Coal comes into Providence Harbor in enormous quantities. I myself have seen within a few days more than 20 vessels in Providence Harbor, from the five-masted schooner, carrying four or five thousand tons, to a moderate-sized vessel, of perhaps a thousand tons, and the transportation of not one ton of that coal, so far as I know, is owned or influenced or controlled by any New England railroad.

I will say, further than that, that the transportation of oil is not in the hands of any railroad; that the transportation of brick and tile and articles of that sort is not in the hands of the railroad company.

I will say, further, that, so far as I know, there is not any kind of water transportation out of the harbor of Providence in which there is not competition.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator is totally at variance with the evidence taken before the Senate committee.

Mr. LIPPITT. If I am at variance with some of the testimony that has been presented, I am talking about something with which I am entirely familiar. I am talking about something which has come under my personal observation over and over again for 30 years. I have sailed up and down the coast line between New York and Providence and Boston and Bar Harbor for a number of years. I myself obtained a license, having passed the examination, as a licensed pilot for the waters from Buzzards Bay to New York. I held a pilot's license for some little time. So I can say I am thoroughly familiar with the subject I am discussing.

Only last night, as I sailed from Narragansett Bay into Providence Harbor, I saw a steamer, owned by the New Haven road, leaving that harbor on its way to New York, and it was followed within a few hundred feet by a steamer of practically the same size, leaving the same port, carrying the same class of freight, destined for the same port, in which steamer, I understand, the New York & New Haven did not own a single dollar of stock and had no interest of any kind. If that is not competition, I do not know what competition is.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope it is.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. I suppose the Senator wants facts, and I am not taking any part in the discussion which has been going on.

The Senator himself probably understands that the Grand Trunk system of Canada controls the Central Vermont road It controls what is called the New London & Northern road, which really connects from St. Johns to Long Island Sound. The competition between the Grand Trunk and the New Haven is very severe, and the fight in my own State, along legislative lines, is about as bitter as could be between two parties. There is real competition between the Grand Trunk system, which is a very great system, as you know, and the New Haven & Hartford.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to know that New England is waking up to the situation there, because the evidence I have leads me to the contrary opinion.

I want to say in this connection that in an address delivered on this floor by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], on the 12th day of April, 1910, he showed that the New Haven Railroad, to which I have called attention, had not only monopolized the water transportation of New England and all of the shipping between Boston and New York, but had monopolized the interurban electric systems as well. Of course I am not going to take issue with the Senator from Vermont, because I have no personal knowledge on the subject, but in this connection I call attention to what the Senator from Wisconsin said in the speech to which I have referred, and I have never heard it denied upon this floor. He said:

To-day the New Haven controls directly or through subsidiary companies:

Fall River Lines: Fall River, Mass., to New York City.
Providence Line: Providence, R. I., to New York City.
New Bedford Line: New Bedford, Mass., to New York City.
Norwich Line: Norwich, Conn., to New York City.
New Haven Lines: New Haven, Conn., to New York City.
Bridgeport Line: Bridgeport, Conn., to New York City.
Block Island Line: Connecting with Norwich, New London, Conn.; Watch Hill, Providence, Block Island, R. I.; New York.
Hartford Line: Hartford, Conn., to New York City.
Joy Line: Providence, R. I., to New York City.
Merchants' Line: Boston to New York.
The Merchants' and Miners' Transportation Co. Line: Boston and Providence to Philadelphia, Newport News, Baltimore, and Norfolk. (In this the New Haven owns a one-half interest.)
Maine Steamship Co. Line: Maine to New York City.
Neptune Line: This line was originally started to kill the Enterprise Transportation Co., and now has been permanently abandoned.

Mr. PAGE. Does the Senator find anything there that contradicts the statement I have made in regard to the Grand Trunk line controlling a system in New England?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not see that line mentioned.

Mr. PAGE. I want to say to the Senator that it is notorious in New England that these two lines have been having a bitter fight not only in Vermont but in regard to getting in line from the New London & Northern road into Providence, and then, I think, into Boston. The fight is so bitter that it is notorious in New England that there are two great lines fighting for their lives almost in regard to certain lines of transportation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. I will not interrupt the Senator again——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to go on, Mr. President, or else I shall be blamed for taking up more time than I ought in the closing days of the Congress.

Mr. LIPPITT. Well, I am taking up the time, but I had to do so some time or other because of these statements and some others that I desire to make to the Senate. I do not want the Senator to go away with the wrong impression he evidently has of the conditions under which our water transportation is carried on.

As I carried those lines in my mind, the names of which the Senator from Oregon read from the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin, I think nearly every one is owned by the New Haven road, or the New Haven road has an interest in them, but I should like to say that those are but a very small part of the number of steamships that run over Long Island Sound. Long Island Sound is one of the greatest waterways in the world. You can not go from one end of it to the other without passing a large number of ships.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Are they coastwise vessels?

Mr. LIPPITT. What is that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Are the vessels you speak of coastwise vessels?

Mr. LIPPITT. They do coastwise business of various kinds. I think I am not overstating the facts when I say that there are more steamers running out of the city of Providence that are not owned by the New Haven than those that it owns.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island if the great majority of these steamers are not what are known as tramp steamers? They are not regular liners.

Mr. LIPPITT. My impression is that of the passenger-carrying steamers that go into the port of Providence there are not two a month which are what you would call tramp steamers. I except, of course, the coal trade and the oil trade, wherein there are more or less tramp steamers. The others belong to regular lines. There is a line from Providence to Block Island. Block Island is an island about 15 miles off the coast of Rhode Island. There is a line that runs to Sakonnet and stops at Bristol and at one or two points on the way. They transport passengers and freight, although they are not very large vessels. A number of steamers run up and down the bay, stopping at various points. The terminal at one end is Newport and the other Providence. I just think of those at the minute.

Mr. BRISTOW. Can the Senator submit—if he can not do it at this moment—a list of the steamship lines that maintain regular sailings between New York and Providence that are not controlled by the New Haven Road?

Mr. LIPPITT. The only one I know is the Colonial Line. But I want to say further to the Senator that the system of transportation that is going on goes on with the approval of the citizens whom it serves, and I think that their desires in that matter are of some importance. It does seem to me, with all due respect to other sections of the country, particularly inland States, if I may so term them, which are not in quite as close touch with the needs and the methods that have developed out of a long experience with this matter—it seems to me that the views and experience, if I may put it in that way, of the people who are served should have some considerable weight.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to a statement made by Mr. David O. Ives, manager of the transportation department of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, who lives in Boston. Referring to the question of railroad-owned ships, he said in his testimony——

> Now as to the question of railroad-owned ships. It is repugnant to me to suggest any discrimination against any person or corporation, but our experience—my own personal experience and that of the merchants of New England—has been such that we feel a very great fear of the stifling of water competition by the railroad lines if they own the competitive water lines.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not know exactly what was the great fear in the mind of the gentleman who gave that testimony. So far as the merchants of New England go, I know that a very large number of the most important ones signed a petition which was presented to this body in favor of the present connections between the railroads and the steamships being continued. There may be some people of timid heart in New England, as I suppose there are elsewhere, but the great bulk of the shippers and of the people generally, so far as I know, are entirely satisfied with the existing conditions and they do not want them changed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Rhode Island. Do I understand the Senator to say that there is no complaint through New England against the tendency to monopolize all transportation under the control of the New York & New Haven Railroad?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not think I made that statement. New England is a place that was settled by men of great individuality, and I never have known all New England to agree upon any proposition. So I have no doubt there are people in New England who perhaps are not entirely favorable to the present railroad and steamship ownership, but I do say that as far as I know the great majority of the people are strongly in favor of it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Of what?

Mr. LIPPITT. Are strongly in favor of the railroads of New England owning steamships and using them in connection with their transportation facilities——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Through the canal?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it not a fact——

Mr. LIPPITT. In their own local transportation principally from the New England ports to New York and ports farther down the coast.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it not a fact——

Mr. LIPPITT. May I answer the whole question?

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I put a question to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Is there not a general grievance throughout New England that the New York & New Haven Railroad has not only monopolized all railroad transportation through those States, but has secured a monopoly of water transportation, and is now endeavoring to secure the last method of transportation in competition with the other two, and that is, trolley transportation throughout the New England States?

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from New York, unfortunately, was not here a few minutes ago when I discussed somewhat fully the two points which he makes.

Briefly, I stated that no railroad had monopolized water transportation in New England, and in connection with that—I am glad the Senator from New York has come back—I took occasion to say that in some remarks which he made here a few days ago he made the statement, as I remember it, that there was not a mile of railroad east of New York that was not owned by the New Haven Railroad or by one railroad. I had occasion to say that out of some 7,000 miles of railroad in that section, there was something like 1,700 miles not owned by the New Haven road.

Mr. O'GORMAN. What road do you refer to as being independent?

Mr. LIPPITT. I refer to the Grand Trunk road for one. The Grand Trunk has a line of railroad running from the port of New London north, giving connection with Canada. It is now building a line of road to Providence. It is preparing to build a line of road to Boston. It is entering into the strongest kind of competition with the New Haven road. I have not a list of the roads just at hand at the moment——

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is competition between roads that are running north from Providence or New London. Is there any competition with the New York & New Haven running west or east?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no other road.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was merely answering the statement of the Senator from New York that there was not a mile of road east of New York that was owned by another road, and I have pointed out very conclusively that that statement can not be correct.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will ask the Senator whether there is any working combination between the Grand Trunk and the New Haven?

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes; a very strong working combination. They are doing everything they can to oppose each other in every point they touch.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That must be a very hopeful sign for New England. Can the Senator state——

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not know what the Senator means by being a hopeful sign, but I want to say to the Senator from New York that New England has had many causes to be hopeful, and still has them, and so it would not need any change in her transportation system to inspire her with hope.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. This is very interesting, but——

Mr. LIPPITT. Excuse me. If the Senator from Oregon will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. LIPPITT. I want to say to the Senator from New York, in respect to the statement made by him, to which I referred, in regard to the monopoly of railroad lines, and also the statement he made in regard to the monopoly of steamships, that I think if he will investigate them a little more carefully he will find they are incorrect.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I want to say, in answer to the last suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the statement I made with respect to the control of water transportation by the New York & New Haven Railroad was testified to by one of the vice presidents of that corporation before our committee.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will try to take it up in my own time later.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was just going to remark that in reading the testimony before the Interoceanic Canals Committee one can not but conclude—and if he were a juryman he would have to reach the verdict—that the transportation from Boston to New York and from New York to New Orleans and to Galveston was absolutely controlled, operated, and owned by the railroad companies. I do not pretend to have any personal knowledge on this subject. I have formed my opinion from reading the testimony as it was adduced before the committee, and I think that testimony would not bear out the statements of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island.

It is a little bit out of the line of the discussion here—what has just been said with reference to railroad-owned lines in New England—but if anyone is interested in and desirous of learning the exact condition in New England, both as to the steam and the electric railway situation and as to water transportation there, and the efforts of the New York & New Haven Railroad in connection with it, I call attention to the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], to which I have referred, delivered in this body on the 12th day of April, 1910. It goes into the subject fully and in detail and, I think, fairly sustains the proposition from every standpoint that New England is practically bottled up by land and water by one large railroad corporation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have noticed from time to time this intense anxiety on the part of Senators living hundreds and thousands of miles away from New England as to our situation with regard to transportation facilities. I have lived in New Hampshire a half century or thereabouts, and I have not found our people losing any sleep or disturbed in the daytime as regards the situation.

We have no special competition because we have one line of railroad running north and south. If any Senator knows anyone who will put up money to build another line, I apprehend he could have an opportunity.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to say to my friend, the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, that I have no disposition to criticize New England for this situation. I rather sympathize with New England, because we of the Northwest for a great many years have been in exactly the same situation.

Mr. GALLINGER. As to the acquisition of trolley lines, I think the New Haven does control some lines, but they are carrying the passengers at the same rate that passengers are being carried by other lines owned by other corporations. So we are not suffering very much from that. If it is illegal, that is another proposition, and I think that question has been raised, and I should want to have it determined upon legal grounds. But I do not think our people are suffering or complaining. It seems to be the people who live hundreds or thousands of miles away from New England who are troubled about our situation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to say to the Senator that I did not precipitate this discussion by any means. It was done by a New England Senator. I was talking about the Panama Canal, and Senators transferred me in a moment to the New England coast without any desire on my part to discuss the situation there. I am not criticizing New England or her people, but I am criticizing a situation which exists, not only in New England, but in the West and Northwest, and which exists in every port in the East or the West, where the evidence will absolutely show any disintertested person that the coastwise trade is monopolized by great railroad corporations for the purpose of controlling the rail rates.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do.

Mr. REED. I want to say, by way of apology for any man who lives in the West or Central West taking any interest in the condition of the people in New England, that we have felt justified in taking that interest, because we have been taught for about 50 years that the interests of the West and the Central West were so wrapped up in the prosperity of New England that we ought, without complaint, to submit to a tax for the benefit of the New England manufacturers, on the theory that the benefits would all flow back to us.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not going to join with my friend in that digression, however interesting it might be, because I never would get through with the subject now under discussion.

Now, we were discussing, Mr. President, the question of the power of Congress under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to grant discriminatory or free tolls to coastwise shipping.

The Supreme Court of the United States has practically said that even under a treaty stipulation substantially like the one under consideration, we could discriminate against foreign and in favor of American vessels with reference to pilotage charges in local rivers and harbors; and I am going to call attention to that case. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Olsen against Smith, in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States, page 332, was called upon to pass upon the following treaty provision:

> That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

There is no stronger provision than that in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The State of Texas passed a law providing lower pilotage charges on domestic vessels engaged in domestic commerce than on vessels engaged in foreign commerce. A British vessel protested on the ground that this discrimination was in violation of the treaty rights, and particularly in violation of this provision of the treaty which I have just cited. The Supreme Court, in passing upon this, said:

> Neither the exemption of coastwise vessels from pilotage resulting from any law of the United States nor any lawful exemption of coastwise vessels created by the State law concerns vessels in the foreign trade, and therefore any such exemptions do not operate to produce a discrimination against British vessels engaged in foreign trade and in favor of vessels of the United States in such trade. In substance the proposition but asserts that, because by the law of the United States steam vessels in the coastwise trade have been exempt from pilotage regulations, therefore there is no power to subject vessels in foreign trade to pilotage regulations, even although such regulations apply without discrimination to all vessels engaged in such foreign trade, whether domestic or foreign.

It is true that a distinguished Senator said, in debate a few days ago, that the decision of the Supreme Court will not be determinative in these international matters, which may in the end have to go before The Hague tribunal, but there is no question about it that a decision of our highest court ought to have very great weight in determining the position which this Congress should take upon a question admittedly involved in doubt.

There is no question about the views of the American people on this particular subject, and there is no question but that they will expect Congress to take a positive position in asserting the American view without regard to any protest that Great Britain has or may interpose. We can feel pretty well assured that Great Britain will interpose a formal protest here, but because she protests is no reason why we should absolutely yield our judgment to any protest she may make, when it does not conform to the American construction of the treaty stipulations which govern.

Even if there was a doubt about our power in the premises under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the question should be solved in favor of the American idea and not to accommodate the views of Great Britain or to conform to the supposed views of a tribunal that is likely to be against us on any appeal. I am not a believer in the doctrine of peace at any price, and I believe that the American people would insist upon the revocation of a treaty which prevented Congress from regulating what they conceive to be their internal affairs, as well as any treaty creating a tribunal which some Senators admit will decide against us if this question now under discussion ever gets before it.

So I conclude from the best and most attentive examination I have been able to give this subject, that there is no question about the right of Congress under the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or under the provisions of any treaty, to discriminate in favor of American vessels engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal, and I take the same view without any fear as to results that the Senator from Massachusetts takes with much hesitation—that we have a right not only to grant discriminatory tolls to American vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, but we have a right under that treaty to grant discriminatory tolls in favor of American registered vessels engaged in foreign commerce as well.

Now, with reference to the effect of free tolls on coastwise ships.

It has been insisted in some quarters that the construction of the Panama Canal was brought about by military necessity and for commercial benefit, but a higher motive than either of these propositions inspired it. It was designed from the standpoint of a great many patriotic citizens to be and become a part of the interrelated internal waterways of this country, bringing the East and the West, as well as the interior sections of the country penetrated by the great waterways and the Great Lakes, into closer touch and rendering them less dependent upon the railway systems of the country.

The acquisition of California, and the discovery of gold there in 1849 had much to do with the action of this country in hastening the construction of a canal at the Isthmus, and then the possessions of Great Britain in the Northwest doubtless induced her to enter into negotiations with the United States for connecting these two great oceans. It was not a question of military necessity at all; it was the determination of two great peoples to do something that would benefit the commerce of the world.

One of the first effects of free tolls for vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic will be the reduction of transcontinental and interior rates, and the second will be the regulatory effect that these ships will have upon the transcontinental railways. Assuming that a rate of $1 per ton was charged upon coastwise vessels passing through the canal, that charge would be added to the transcontinental rate. The remission of that charge would compel the railways to make a corresponding reduction in the rail rate.

This has been the history of water competition wherever it has been in effect. But it is maintained by some that the reduction in freight rates by rail would only be effective as between competitive points—as an illustration, that while a vessel plying between Portland, Oreg., and New York free of tolls would reduce the rate between Portland and New York by rail, it would not in any way affect the rate charged by rail between coast and interior points. This has not been the history of rate reduction by rail between coast points. The views of the minority of the House committee so clearly express the commonly accepted view on this subject that I ask permission to insert them as a part of my address:

In a comparatively few instances opposition to free tolls has developed in certain localities in the Middle West, based upon the erroneous assumption that any reductions in freight rates between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards will give the Pacific, Gulf, and Atlantic coast cities an advantage over the Middle West cities in competing for the trade of the intermountain section of the West. There might be some ground for this assumption were it not for the fact that rail freight rates between the Middle West and the Pacific coast never exceed those between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, and are frequently lower. Any reduction in rail freight rates forced by sea competition between, say, New York and San Francisco is contemporaneously applied between Chicago, St. Paul, St. Louis, Kansas City, and, in fact, every city of the Middle West on the one hand and every Pacific coast city or town on the other. This always has been so—it always will be so. The selfish interests of the railroads serving the Middle West is the strongest possible guaranty of the perpetuity of this already well-established rate-making system. No road operating between St. Paul and Seattle will permit a lower rail rate to exist between New York and Seattle than exists between St. Paul and Seattle; otherwise St. Paul's trade would be captured by New York.

Therefore, if by reason of free tolls to vessels in the coastwise trade freight rates between New York and Seattle are $1 per ton less than they would be if tolls were charged, they will by the same measure be less between St. Paul and Chicago and Omaha and St. Louis and Kansas City on the one hand and Seattle and Portland and San Francisco and Los Angeles and San Diego on the other. It is not for the merchants, manufacturers, producers, and consumers of the Middle West to do other than to heartily favor free tolls. It is to be expected, however, that the railroads serving the Middle West, and, for that matter, the entire country, will strenuously oppose free tolls and with equal strenuosity advocate the highest tolls possible, the only limit being those charged contemporaneously through Suez. Inasmuch as rates between the entire country east of the Missouri River on the one hand and the intermountain section on the other are based upon the coast-to-coast rates, it is obvious that free tolls would be equally advantageous to this section as to all other sections of the country. Free tolls can but minimize rail freight rates on all the manufactures of the Atlantic seaboard and the Middle West, the products of the great Mississippi Valley, and those of the Pacific coast, to the ultimate advantage of the producers and consumers throughout the entire country. Nor are reductions in rail rates the only advantages which the people of the great interior of our country are to reap from free tolls. They have even a more direct interest.

Much of the commerce of the great Mississippi Valley will flow down the rivers which drain it to the Gulf and thence through the canal to the Pacific coast. Likewise Pacific coast products will, under free tolls, to a large extent eventually be distributed throughout the Middle West via her waterways. The completion of the Lakes-to-Gulf waterway project will make it not alone possible but practicable to exchange Pacific coast lumber for Lake Superior ore without either commodity touching the floor of a freight car. Every burden placed upon traffic through the canal impairs its usefulness as a competitive route and decreases its benefits to the American people.

These views of the minority of the House committee are the views of distinguished experts in this country. In what is known as the Spokane rate case, Twenty-first Interstate Commerce Reports, at page 422, Mr. Prouty, one of the most distinguished members of that commission, rendered an opinion upon this same subject, and there are numerous other decisions by the same distinguished body where the same doctrine has been laid down as to the effect of river competition upon rail rates. I call attention to what Mr. Prouty had to say:

Carriers maintain the same transcontinental rate from Chicago as from New York, not by reason of the direct effect but rather as an indirect result of water competition. The reason for this will be best understood by an actual illustration. Assume that a building requiring the use of a large amount of structural steel is to be erected in San Francisco. That steel is manufactured both at the seaboard and in Chicago. That which is made at the seaboard can be taken by water from the point of origin to the point of destination, and the rate at which it can move is therefore determined by water competition.

That would bring New York directly in competition with Chicago.

The cost of producing steel is the same at both points. In order, therefore, that the producers may stand an equal chance in competing for this business it is necessary that the rate from both points should be the same, and the business can not move from Chicago unless the rate from that point is as low as from the seaboard.

The Atchisen, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway begins at Chicago. If this steel is bought at Chicago and moves by that line, the entire freight money is retained by it. If, upon the other hand, the steel is bought at New York, moved by some line to Chicago, and there delivered to the Santa Fe, that line receives only a part of the through charge. The service performed by it is the same in either case, but the amount of its compensation is larger when the freight originates at Chicago. It is therefore for the interest of that line to name a rate from Chicago which will originate the business at that point instead of allowing it to originate upon the seaboard. The interest of the line from New York to Chicago is that the business should be taken up at New York, and as a compromise it is finally agreed to apply the same rate from both these points. This clearly shows how water competition, if it does not actually extend to the interior point, may and does dictate the rate from that point.

Mr. President, that is the universal rule. That is the universal way in which rates are effected by the railroad companies all over the country.

What would be true of the steel entering into the construction of this building is true also of almost every article of commerce which moves between the East and the West. The Middle West to-day manufactures nearly everything which is produced upon the Atlantic seaboard, and the effect of this policy of the railroads has been to make the Middle West the almost exclusive market of origin for the intermountain country and largely for the Pacific coast itself. (21 I. C. C. Reps., 422.)

An examination of the schedule of rates in any railroad company's office will disclose that the rates from intermediate points from Chicago to the Pacific coast are practically the same as they are from Boston and New York to the same coast. That is all brought about by water competition or the possibility of water competition. Wherever you reduce the rate by water the railroad company must of necessity, if the competition is an honest competition, reduce its rates to conform or else lose the traffic. Therefore, for every dollar remitted to American shipping passing through the canal and doing a coastwise business you compel a corresponding reduction upon the rates charged by the railroad companies engaged in transcontinental business.

Now, Mr. President, Dr. Emory R. Johnson and Col. Goethals would place the Panama Canal on a commercial basis and make of it a revenue-producing enterprise, and they differ from my views with reference to the remission of tolls. They insist that the Panama Canal ought to be used so as to yield a large revenue; that is, so as to make it pay not only a fair rate of interest on the money invested, but to create a sinking fund out of which eventually could be paid the immense amount of the cost of construction, something like $400,000,000. The American people do not share in this view. They believe that that canal was built with their money; that it was not an expenditure as such, but an investment for their benefit, and that the amount of the revenue to be received from that investment should not be a tax upon them any more than is absolutely necessary to conform to the regulations of the treaty. The foreigner ought to pay the tax, and that he will pay it in time there is no room for doubt.

But Dr. Johnson does agree with the proposition that water competition will reduce or regulate rail rates. In discussing this subject in Senate Document No. 875, in summing up, for instance, he says:

The general effect of the canal will be to lower transcontinental railroad rates.

I might say, incidentally, for the people of the West that we have been, as I have suggested possibly New England has been, in the grasp of corporations that absolutely controlled the destinies of our people, and we ought to insist that these transcontinental rates shall be regulated by the construction and proper use of the canal. If we had not believed on the Pacific coast that such would be the case we would never have lent our assistance to the construction of the canal. Dr. Johnson continues:

If the foregoing analysis proves to be sound, it will be the policy of the railroads to allow a portion of the traffic that might be held to the rails to be shipped coastwise through the canal and to maintain rates upon the traffic which can readily be prevented from taking the canal route. It is probable that the railroads will adopt the general policy of surrendering without serious struggle the minor portion of their traffic in order to maintain profitable charges upon the major share of their tonnage. The immediate effect of the canal will be to lessen railroad profits; the ultimate effect may be the enhancement of the prosperity of the railroads.

The railroads have not adopted that policy which is so mildly suggested by Dr. Johnson "to enhance their prosperity." On the contrary, they are endeavoring to secure at the hands of Congress legislation which will enable them to operate their own ships through the canal and thus in future as in the past to be placed in position to put out of business independent shipping companies that might undertake to compete upon fair and honest terms.

The canal will aid the industries and trade of the United States. Like other transportation facilities, it will create the need of other means of transportation; and, should the transcontinental railroads be obliged to face reduced profits for a period of years, they need have no serious apprehension as to their future prosperity. The railroads connecting the Mississippi Valley and the Pacific coast are among the most profitable lines in the United States. The country they serve is certain to have a large development during the next quarter century, a development that will unquestionably be appreciably aided by the Panama Canal.

So we see Dr. Johnson admits that the immediate effect of the construction of the Panama Canal will be to reduce freight rates.

But it looks like a work of supererogation to discuss the effect of water upon rail transportation. The mere statement of the proposition suggests the universal knowledge that untrammeled water competition reduces and tends to regulate rates by rail everywhere and under all circumstances.

Of course, we are all more familiar with our local affairs than with other sections of the country, and I want to call attention now to a condition in my own State and bordering between my State and the State of Washington. The old Oregon Railway & Navigation Co. going west first touched the Columbia River at a point called Umatilla, and it paralleled the Columbia River from that point for 150 miles down to Portland, Oreg. A short distance below Umatilla on the Columbia River there was an obstruction. The Government is removing it now and constructing an immense canal. The river was navigable up to this obstruction, and up to that point the rates by rail were practically the same as the rates by the river, and were reasonably low because the boats which the citizens of Oregon kept on that route at their own expense kept the rate down. But above that obstruction where the river was not navigable because boats could not get above the obstruction the railroad rates were exorbitant, and the immense wealth of that inland empire, covering an area of 250,000 square miles, was at the mercy of a great railroad company.

The State of Oregon to meet that condition appropriated three or four hundred thousand dollars itself and built a little portage railroad around that obstruction in the Columbia River, and the people of Portland put on boats above the obstruction. Just as soon as the portage railroad was built there, a portage road owned and operated by the State, and these boats were put on by the people, the railroad company immediately reduced their rates to all competitive points.

So this expenditure on the part of the State and the people reduced the rates by rail so that men in that inland empire could get their products to market at reasonable rates. The construction of the Panama Canal will have exactly the same effect as the construction of that little portage railway by the State had on the transportation of Washington, Oregon, and Idaho, and which enabled them to regulate the rates of the railways without appealing to them for relief, provided, always, we do not surrender to the demands of the railroad interests in reference to railroad-owned ships.

In this connection as showing the local situation to some extent I am going to ask leave to insert in the RECORD as a part of my address the rates on certain commodities between Portland, Oreg., and New York, and from New York to interior points by all rail, by ocean and rail, and by ocean, lake, and rail, showing the conditions as they have existed there and conditions which we hope the Panama Canal will correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RAILROAD-OWNED SHIPS AND THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is one other subject, Mr. President, I am going to touch on briefly. I realize that I have taken more time than I ought to have done, but this is due to the interruptions of my colleagues. It is the question as to whether railroad-owned ships should be permitted to use the Panama Canal. The people of my section of the country are almost a unit against the use of the canal by railroad-owned ships or by ships in which the railroad companies have an interest. That is without any feeling of hostility to the railroad companies. We realize that our country has been developed by the construction of railroads and their extension into the unsettled portions of the West. We feel indebted to them, although their work has not been entirely philanthropic. The Government has given to them empires in the way of land grants so as to assist them in the work of construction, and I am not making any objection to that. What I have to say is not so much in criticism of the railroads as suggesting how those who are interested in the further development of the West may find a way of relieving it from a situation that has confronted it ever since the advent of railroads and their acquisition of all transportation facilities.

There are those who insist that this bill should not contain any provision having reference to ships owned or controlled by railroad companies or in which railroad companies have an interest. These persons insist that this bill at this session of Congress should be confined in the main to providing for a civil government for the Canal Zone and the fixing of tolls, leaving to some subsequent Congress the regulations as to the character of the vessels which should be entitled to the use of the Panama Canal. Dr. Johnson in his statement expresses the opinion that this bill should be limited to three subjects, viz, authorizing the President to govern the Canal Zone, to operate the canal, and to fix tolls, and believes that legislation amending the interstate-commerce act for the purpose of regulating the relation of ocean carriers to each other and to railroads may be best kept separate from the canal bill. I am totally at variance with him and with those who express this view. Legislation ought to be had now for the purpose of prohibiting the use of the canal by railroad-owned ships and ships in which railroad companies have an interest, and in the same legislation provision should be made for the remission of tolls to vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic. If these two very important subjects are left over for the action of some future Congress it will result in the claim being made by those who are opposed to this view that by its action Congress has practically conceded that it had no power either to legislate upon the subject of railroad-owned ships or to remit the tolls to vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic. Neither of these positions would be tenable, but they would be urged with great insistence.

I think the insistence would be very largely made, too, by the railroad interests, which are now promising that if railroad-owned ships are given access to the canal these interests are determined to build four immense steamers at an expense of twelve or fifteen million dollars to operate through the canal from New York to the Pacific coast and to oriental points. These very men would be the first to come here and insist that they had the recognized right to use the canal, and that they had been induced by the action of Congress to expend large sums of money in ship construction, and their rights ought not to be interfered with.

Further than that, the failure to enact legislation at this time with reference to the remission of tolls to vessels engaged in the coastwise traffic would be looked upon by Great Britain and the other powers as a practical admission that this Government had no power under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to discriminate in favor of vessels engaged in what is conceded in some British quarters, and is maintained by nearly all American authorities, as being simply a part of our internal commerce.

But, aside from an academic discussion of the subject, let us examine this question of the use of the Panama Canal by railroad-owned ships.

It has been stated upon the floor in this Chamber that practically all of the shipping between points along the New England coast and New York is owned and controlled by one great railroad interest, which dominates the commercial life of the whole of New England. It has further been stated that practically all of the coastwise shipping between New York and Panama is controlled by the railway companies of the United States, and the evidence, too, bears out that statement, Mr. President. I know it is insisted in some quarters that these steamers are owned and controlled by the railway companies not for the purpose of preventing competition but for the purpose of developing the shipping interests and thereby enlarging the business which these railroad companies do between interior and coast points. This seems plausible, and is accepted without question by the uninitiated, but the business men who are compelled to patronize the transportation companies by water and by rail know that the railroad companies own and control these steamers along the coast line not for the purpose of developing their internal traffic but for the purpose of driving out competitive water carriers and maintaining the exorbitant rates which they are thus enabled to charge by their railway lines.

Mr. President, this is not a new question nor are the methods of these companies new. The Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has just described to the Senate the methods that are being adopted by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., which is really the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., of inducing men to appeal to Congress to do things which are against their best interests. That same company for 50 years or more has been engaged in the same questionable business, as has been developed on the floor of the Senate to-day by the Senator from California; and I call the attention of the Senate to the report made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] on the Panama Canal in 1904, where is to be found a history of the methods of the Pacific Mail.

Mr. BRISTOW. In 1905.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That report gives the history of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. from the date of its birth. Its trail might be followed from the last word that the Senator from Kansas had to say upon the subject to this time. It has not varied. It has never from the time the Southern Pacific or transcontinental interests got control of it been operated in the interests of the people, either of the East or of the West. It has been operated always in the interest of the railroads. There was an investigation of this same company in 1893 with reference to its dealings with the Panama Railroad and the transcontinental railroad pool, and, incidentally, the resolution for the appointment of the subcommittee by the House of Representatives recited the following as part of the duties devolving upon that committee to inquire:

> As to the contracts and relations between the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. and the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., the Transcontinental Railroad Association, and other railroads; and as to what contracts or other collusive arrangements have been made by said companies whereby the traffic by way of the Isthmus of Panama has been suppressed or diminished; and as to whether said steamship company, by virtue of said contracts or otherwise, has been practically absorbed by or subjected to the control of said railroad companies; and as to whether the business which it was the design of this Government to foster by the sums granted to said steamship company, through mail contracts or otherwise, has been thereby diverted from the Isthmus of Panama and the Panama Railroad Co. to such transcontinental companies; and as to whether such acts are detrimental to the interests of American maritime commerce and the producers, manufacturers, and merchants of the United States; and if such abuses are found to exist, by what means the same can or should be suppressed, and as to whether the further grant of said sums to said steamship company should be withdrawn. Said committee shall have the power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, and the expenses incurred in said investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and said committee shall have leave to sit during the sessions of the House in Washington or elsewhere.

So we see that in 1893 this same burning question was up before Congress, and the same efforts were then, as now, being put forth to prevent certain legislation which would relieve the people against the burdens which were imposed upon them by these companies, acting in conjunction with each other.

The report made by the subcommittee pursuant to said resolution was made on the heels of the adjournment of Congress, just as this discussion upon a most important piece of legislation is taking place near the end of this session. I merely want to call attention to this report to show you the methods of this company and its allies. They were not only methods in vogue on the west coast, but, Mr. President, they are the methods pursued on the east coast, because the testimony before the Committee of the Senate on Interoceanic Canals tends to show that the Southern Pacific Co. now owns about 40 vessels that are doing business now on the Atlantic coast, which, if free tolls are granted to railroad-owned ships, can be transferred to coastwise traffic through the canal and be in position to destroy all honest competition. Not only that, but the same railroad company controls in New York, as the evidence tends to show, some of the most important docks of the city, upon which it pays a rental of four or five hundred thousand dollars a year for the purpose of retaining them from the use of other shipping interests that might engage in independent shipping and practically without being put to their fullest and best use by the railway company itself. The same conditions exist in the West where these same companies control and monopolize the shipping by water as well as the terminal facilities, so that no vessel can come in competition with them.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Oregon to say that the evidence before the committee proved that there were 41 ships that were available.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Practically; yes, sir.

Mr. THORNTON. To go through the Panama Canal?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To go where they want to go. What is to keep them from going through that canal?

Mr. THORNTON. I have a very distinct recollection that it was testified that out of those 41 ships there were very few indeed, practically, to go through that canal, the ships that were used to go down to New Orleans and Galveston to connect with the Southern Pacific road not being available for the canal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course they are possibly not available at this time, but it does not take them very long to become available whenever the railroad companies want to put anybody else out of business.

Mr. THORNTON. By building new ships, but not by using those that are there now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. By utilizing anything, Mr. President. A company that can pay $400,000 or $500,000 a year to hold docks from the use of the public can utilize its ships in any way it pleases to put other people out of business. They have done it; they have done it in the West and in the East. They operate and control lines between New York and New Orleans and Galveston now, and there is no independent shipping line that can go in there if the railroad company wants to keep them out. Anybody who says that independent shipping is possible under these conditions talks like the uninitiated, because there are no companies in the world that can put up the money that a railroad company can to operate ships at will and change them when and where they will.

Look at this House report made in 1893, to which I have referred, as to the methods adopted by the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. It says:

> As to the second part of the resolution referred to your committee, relating to the situation in the past few years and at present of American commerce upon the Isthmus, your committee feels that it has obtained all the evidence needed to establish certain facts beyond controversy. On the 1st of February, 1878, the Pacific Mail Co., a corporation organized under the laws of New York, owning and running steamers between New York and Aspinwall on the Atlantic, and between Panama and San Francisco on the Pacific, together with certain intermediate Central American and Mexican ports, made a contract for 15 years with the Panama Railroad Co., also a corporation under the laws of New York. At that time there was no showing that there were any foreign stockholders in either of these two corporations.
> This contract provided that the Pacific Mail should have the exclusive right "to bill freight through" from New York to San Francisco and vice versa over the Panama Railroad, and all freight offered by others between these points could not be "billed through," but would have to pay local rates on the Isthmus railway.

What effect did that have? It absolutely put every independent ship company out of commission. They could not compete with a company that had its freight billed through from San Francisco to New York over the Panama Railroad at through rates and pay the local rates on freight. Now, listen to this:

> The sum paid for this was to be a lump sum of $75,000 a month to the railroad company, which, by modification, was afterwards lowered to $55,000 a month.

That is, $75,000 per month was paid by the Transcontinental Railway Pool to the Panama Railroad Co.; $75,000 a month was paid at first, and $55,000 a month afterwards. The Panama Railroad did not have to do any business to live. It did not have to carry any freight, because the immense amount paid by the Transcontinental Railway Pool to it did away with the necessity practically of their seeking any business at all. The report of the committee continues:

> A remarkable fact about this contract is that it was the result of a contract made before that time between the Pacific Mail Co. and the Transcontinental Railway Pool, as at that date the Association of Transcontinental Railways was called.
> That was a contract whereby the Transcontinental Railway Pool, embracing all of the roads between the Missouri River and the Pacific seaports, and covering entirely all railway traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, several of which had received large donations of public lands and the bonds of which the United States Government was guaranteeing, paid the Pacific Mail the sum of $90,000 a month, which was afterwards reduced to $75,000 a month, for the consideration that the Pacific Mail would carry only 1,200 tons a month of freight each way between New York and San Francisco, and on that freight would allow the transcontinental pool to fix the price and rate to be paid. That was the upshot of the contract, although the form was a reservation of space for 1,200 tons a month for the exclusive benefit of the Transcontinental Railway roads—whether the steamers sailed full or half empty.
> After the passage of the interstate-commerce law had compelled the dissolution of the so-called "pool," a transcontinental railway association was formed, which, under some name or other, is still in existence; and down to the present time the Pacific Mail, subsidized by the Government in a large amount each year, has been allowing the transcontinental railways to fix the rates and limit the traffic over its line. These two contracts were so far practically parts of one and the same that the amount paid the Panama Railroad monthly was fixed with regard to that paid to the Pacific Mail by the transcontinental roads, and when the latter was lowered from $90,000 a month to $75,000 the former was lowered from $75,000 to $55,000. The object of this is frankly stated by the officers of both the transcontinental roads and the Pacific Mail; it was to maintain rates above the level to which they would fall if free competition between these several routes had continued.

It seems to be certain that a very large, if not an absolutely controlling, interest in the stock and directory of the Pacific Mail Co. is owned by individuals and estates very largely interested in the stock and directory of the transcontinental roads; and it is proven that the same individuals composing a majority of the directory of the Pacific Mail composed a majority of the directors present at the meeting of the Panama Railroad Co.'s directory at which the contract between the Pacific Mail and the railroad company of February 1, 1878, was ratified and executed. That this system has for 15 years been diminishing commerce between New York and San Francisco across the Isthmus is not denied. It is stated, as a justification, that the Transcontinental Railway Association, controlling, as it did, under these contracts, the prices and traffic of the Pacific Mail, used the latter as an active factor to defeat the competition of sailing-vessel traffic around Cape Horn, and thus were able to maintain the rates of the railroad companies as against that of sailing-vessel competition. It is obvious that this did not tend to increase American shipping or tend to the encouragement of the merchant marine of the commerce of the United States.

It seems to your committee that this state of things can not be beneficial to the general interstate trade or commerce of the United States, nor can it see that it is of any particular benefit to our trade with foreign countries. It is stated that this arrangement between the Pacific Mail and the Transcontinental Railway Association came to an end in December last, which is just about the time that negotiations between the Panama Railroad Co. and the Pacific Mail as to a renewal of the former contract seems to have fallen through. And it is likewise in evidence that the final check to the attempts at making a new contract between the Panama Railroad Co. and the Pacific Mail was given by the following letter to the vice president of the railroad company from the controlling member of the executive committee of the Pacific Mail, who is also universally recognized as one of the controlling influences of the transcontinental railways:

C. P. HUNTINGTON, 23 BROAD STREET,
New York, December 28, 1892.

CHARLES COUDERT, Esq.,
68–70 William Street, New York City.

MY DEAR SIR: Herewith I return memorandum that you gave me on Monday. Of course this would not do, but it does seem to me as though there could be such a contract made as would be largely beneficial to both interests.

Yours, truly, C. P. HUNTINGTON.

Whatever be the case in the last 60 days, it is perfectly clear to your committee that the Panama Railroad Co. has for 15 years been prevented by these arrangements from being a competitor with the transcontinental railway lines.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from Oregon closes, I should like to ask him this question: Is it not the general policy of the United States to forbid the common ownership, control, or consolidation of competing railway lines?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not any question about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the laws of the Senator's own State forbid such consolidation; at least the laws of many States do, and I think the laws of the United States do. Is there any difference between that policy as applied to land lines and as applied to land lines in their relation to water lines? If we insist upon competitive conditions among our railways, why should we not insist upon competitive conditions between our railways and our waterways?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is not any question about what answer should be made to the Senator's suggestion. That has been the policy of this Government. The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. has practically been compelled to dissolve its contract with the railroad companies because of the policy that has been adopted by Congress; yet, Mr. President, what it is proposed to do now, leaving the canal open to railroad-owned ships, is practically nullifying the interstate-commerce act in the respect to which the Senator calls attention.

Are the people of this country ready to do that? I do not think they are. I do not believe there is anybody in the Senate or in the other House innocent enough to believe all the promises that Mr. Schwerin and the representatives of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. and the Southern Pacific Co. made before the committee in reference to this subject and the building of new ships. It is absolute nonsense to talk about the Southern Pacific Co. putting on four immense steamships to operate between New York, through the Panama Canal, and the Orient, when the route between New York and the Orient through the Suez Canal is twelve or fifteen hundred miles shorter. The fact is that it is a subterfuge. The purpose of it is to hoodwink this Congress if any of its Members are innocent enough to believe the statement, made on the patriotic plea of flying the American flag over these great phantom American ships to let them have access for their railroad-owned ships through the Panama Canal.

Mr. President, the condition with reference to the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. is absolutely understood in the western part of the country. The people of San Francisco, Los Angeles, and other California ports have been at their mercy for a great many years. The people of Portland, Oreg., are practically at the mercy of the same Southern Pacific Co. That company operates a line of railroad from Portland, Oreg., to San Francisco, and at the same time they operate the only line of steamships between Portland and San Francisco. What is the effect? If they charge a rate which is unfair or too high, an independent line of steamers is put on the river and ocean route. Immediately the railroad-controlled steamers and the railroad itself reduce the rate to a figure which will not afford a reasonable or any compensation to the independent line of steamers. These must then operate at a loss. Then what happens? The independent line of necessity withdraws from competition to avoid bankruptcy, and immediately the railroad company and the railroad-controlled line of steamships raise the rate to more than a remunerative basis. Experience has proven that railroad-controlled steamers can afford to create large deficiencies, which are paid by the railroad company in order to enable the latter to maintain a higher level of rates.

The railroad company does not mind a deficit for a month; it does not mind it for six months; it does not mind it for six years. It will stay until it drives off independent competition, and then, just as soon as independent competition goes out of business, the railroad company reinstates its old rate.

The history of this matter as affecting Portland and San Francisco is the same as that applying to Seattle and Portland or Seattle and San Francisco or San Francisco and Panama, if you please, because the line of steamships between the northern ports is under the same ownership as exists with reference to the line from San Francisco south, although under a different name. Once permit the railroad-owned ships to go through the Panama Canal in competition with independent ships and there is not any question about what will happen. The rates will be reduced if necessary by the railroad-owned ships to a point where the independent steamers can not afford to go, because there is usually an end to their resources. They will have to go out of business, and then the railroad companies will reinstate the rates that they had before. That has been the history in the past; it will be the history of the future.

Shortly prior to March 12, 1912, the President of the United States called upon Mr. C. A. Prouty, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for his opinion as to the use of the canal by railroad owned or controlled ships. I believe that all will concede Mr. Prouty to be an authority on all subjects affecting transportation and rates, whether by rail or water, and his opinion is entitled to the greatest weight. On the 12th of March last he addressed a letter to the President as follows:

MARCH, 12, 1912.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Referring to your request made to Commissioner Lane and myself recently, that we confer with our associates and inform you whether in the opinion of the commission transcontinental railroads should be permitted to own steamships navigating the Panama Canal, upon condition that the rates and practices of such carriers were made subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission, permit me to say:

The commission, after consideration, is unanimously of the opinion that if the waterways of this country are to be of any substantial benefit in the way of reducing rates of transportation it is absolutely essential that rail carriers be prohibited from owning or controlling, directly or indirectly, competing water carriers. From our knowledge of what has happened in the past we are of the opinion that this is particularly true of transcontinental railroads and steamships plying in competition with them.

While the Interstate Commerce Commission might, if vested with authority, prevent to some extent the injurious effect of allowing a common ownership over these competing carriers, still the limitations under which we act are such that we do not believe we could secure to the public the same favorable rates which would result from unrestrained competition. The conditions of water transportation are such that we do not believe that the port-to-port water traffic ought to be placed under the supervision of this body—certainly not under the same rules which apply in case of rail carriers. The law should, in our opinion, be so amended and strengthened as to give this commission power to compel a physical interchange of business between water carriers and rail carriers and to establish reasonable rates for through carriage.

Respectfully, C. A. PROUTY, Chairman.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

This letter contains not only the opinion of Mr. Prouty, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but was the unanimous opinion of that distinguished body. That this is the fact is evidenced by the testimony of Mr. Prouty before the Senate committee which considered the bill now under consideration. At page 865 of the hearings he says:

The CHAIRMAN. And was that the unanimous opinion of the commission, or just the opinion of some members of it?

Mr. PROUTY. As I understand it, it was the unanimous opinion of the commission. We have considered that subject this afternoon and, as I now understand it, it is the opinion of the commission, with the exception of a single commissioner, possibly, who thinks that if the Interstate Commerce Commission has the power to regulate rates it might be well enough to allow transcontinental lines to own those steamships.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, what do you say about that proposition yourself?

Mr. PROUTY. I do not think that the Interstate Commerce Commission can regulate the port-to-port rates of a water carrier, because there is no basis for regulation. We have just been investigating, in a case of which I had charge, the port-to-port water rates from New York to Galveston. There is a very large volume of traffic annually from Atlantic seaboard territory to New York, from New York to Galveston by water, and by rail from Galveston to interior Texas and southwestern points; and we have been inquiring into the reasonableness of those rates. Now, the evidence convinces me that it is entirely a question of conditions. If the ship runs full in one direction a low rate can be made; if it runs full in both directions a lower rate can be made; if it runs light a higher rate must be made in order to pay the expenses of operation. Our investigation in that case shows that 60 per cent of the expense is at the dock and only 40 per cent of the expense on the water. The expense both at the dock and on the water is substantially the same, whether a full load is obtained or whether only a part load is obtained, except the cost of loading.

Now, when you inquire what is a reasonable rate on a railroad you have something to guide you. You have other railroads; you know about the cost of other railroads; you know about the cost of operation; you know about the density of the traffic; you can institute a comparison between that railroad and similar railroads. But all those distinctions fail when you undertake to inquire what is a reasonable rate on the water.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, assuming that there is a regular liner running back and forth between New York and San Francisco via the canal; why is it that the facts that you mention as the bases for determining the reasonableness of the rate can not be ascertained, such as the cost and the expense of operation, etc.?

Mr. PROUTY. You can ascertain the cost of operating the boat. That, of course, is a very easy thing to ascertain. You can ascertain the cost of the boat itself; you can ascertain the cost of marine insurance. The thing you do not know is the amount of traffic you are going to carry.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, do you always know the amount of traffic you are going to carry on a railroad train?

Mr. PROUTY. Pretty accurately, Senator. You know the amount of traffic that moves over a railroad from year to year, during certain seasons of the year; you know about all the conditions under which it moves; you know the average trainload; you know the average length of haul of the traffic; you know the cost of moving a ton; and you know a great many things approximately, though not accurately, about a rail carrier that you could not possibly know about a water carrier.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose, to take a specific instance, that all the railroads in the country were allowed to own steamships, and be interested in them, and to operate them through the Panama Canal between coastwise ports, between the Atlantic and Pacific; take the Pacific Mail, for instance, owned and controlled by the Southern Pacific; if the Interstate Commerce Commission was given authority to regulate the rates from New York via the canal to San Francisco on package goods—anything that they carry; is there anything inherently impossible, after a certain time has elapsed, during which the commission could make observations and determine what you allude to as the average annual shipments on the line; knowing how much the vessels cost and how much the expense of operation was—is there anything inherently impossible in determining what is a fair and reasonable rate between New York and San Francisco?

Mr. PROUTY. The usual first-class rate from New York to Galveston has been, as I remember it, about 85 cents. Two years ago the Texas City Line broke in there; there was a rate war; the Texas City Line has since been bought up by the Mallory Line, or by the owners of the Mallory Line; but when I took the testimony in the case in New York those rates had settled down to a sort of fixed basis, and the first-class rates, as I remember it, had come down to 55 cents. Now, I think that, under some conditions, 55 cents would not be any too much—would be enough; under other conditions, I do not think that 85 cents would be any too much; it would depend, I believe, entirely upon how much traffic those boats could get, and freight rates do, in point of fact, vary by water in exactly that way.

Now, I feel that there has been sufficient competition on the Great Lakes, so that the competition itself has determined approximately what is a reasonable rate. If we were asked to fix a reasonable rate for the transportation of grain I think we could do it within certain limits, because during a long period of years there has been competition in the transportation of grain, and that rate has settled down to a certain point, and so it is with the carriage of coal and ore and certain grades of lumber.

But you take package freight, which is entirely carried by the railroad steamers. Now, that rate has advanced in the last five or six years, while the grain rate, which is a competitive rate, has declined in that time; still in a case attacking the last advance of rail and water rates to Chicago which I happened to hear I found that those steamships were not making too much money, and they are not.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I appeal to the Senate to reject the amendments to the bill which were proposed by the Senate committee and to enact it substantially as it came from the House of Representatives. It embodies the American idea; it grants free tolls to ships engaged in coastwise traffic; it forbids the use of the canal by railroad owned or controlled ships or ships in which railroads have an interest. If any complaint is to be made against the House bill it is that it ought to go further and exempt or at least discriminate in favor of American ships engaged in foreign commerce; but that may safely be left to future legislation. The bill as it came to the Senate from the House had been carefully considered from every viewpoint, extensive hearings had been held, and the report of the committee, with the views of the minority as expressed in a separate report, both testified to the care and attention which was given to the measure while it was before the House committee. The people of this country will be satisfied with nothing less than a bill substantially along the lines of the bill which passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a short time. I merely desire to give expression to a few thoughts. I am not a lawyer, so I can not approach this subject through legal paths or view it through legal lenses. I am not versed in international law, and I confess to knowing but little of diplomatic policy, whether it be foreign or domestic; but I am thoroughly convinced that our Government was completely outplayed in diplomacy when in 1901, at a time when the air was rife with projects of the building of a Nicaragua or a Panama Canal, we entered into and obligated this Nation to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I feel that it is safe to state that had Congress and the people been generally aware of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty there would not have been any canal to-day; there would not have been any bond issue of $400,000,000 to construct a canal which, after being finished, we have no more right to use than a foreign nation which has not expended a penny upon it.

Senators tell us that this treaty binds us to make no discriminations in favor of American craft; but I hold that an obligation higher than that binds me, and that is the self-preservation of our Nation. No discrimination in favor of American craft! The Holy Bible commands, "Love thy neighbor as thyself," but I think no Senator will claim that even this holy injunction could be construed into meaning that we should starve ourselves in order that our neighbor might live.

Mr. President, I at first thought that this important feature in the treaty was an inadvertence, an oversight; but I read from Document 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, page 16, that this question was deliberated upon and absolutely voted down. Knowing this fact, I think less of the diplomacy of our Nation than I did before; but, be it said to their eternal credit, six Spartans who to-day honor this Chamber by their presence, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], voted against denying the United States the legal right to use the canal for its own purposes. I think it should likewise be recorded to their glory and credit that six Senators voted against the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and of that number the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] still honor the Senate by their presence.

In view of the fact that this very question of tolls was discussed before the treaty was entered into, it seems to me that it was little short of imbecility on the part of our Government that we should so have obligated ourselves.

That I may convey to the Senate the great interest the people of Great Britain have in this subject, I read this excerpt, which I clip from the London Times of July 11, 1912:

Advices received through the Canadian Government emigration office state that the Vancouver Board of Trade has been securing information for the minister of trade and commerce, as to the prospects and possibilities for exports of Canadian grain and other products to the European markets from that port via the Panama Canal when completed.

The board reports that in the matter of grain, future rates from points in Saskatchewan and Alberta west of Moose Jaw to Vancouver should approximate to 9 cents per bushel as compared with 14 cents a bushel now in force, and that ocean rates from Vancouver to Liverpool via the Panama Canal should, in their opinion, not exceed 20s. per long ton, or 13 cents (6d.) a bushel, or a total charge of 22 cents (11d.) a bushel. This compares with 25 to 26 cents (1s.) per bushel, the present rate of grain from the prairie Provinces to this country during the season of open navigation, and with a rate of 36 and 37 cents during the winter. Storage charges during winter on wheat amount to 5 cents (2½d.) per bushel, or more when kept waiting for shipment. If shipped through the port of Vancouver these charges would disappear as the port is open the year round.

Ocean charges from Vancouver to Liverpool via the Suez Canal or around Cape Horn, a distance of 15,000 miles, for the last three years have been from 25s. to 30s. per long ton. By the shorter route via Panama the distance would be brought down to less than 9,000 miles, and the added tonnage regularly making Vancouver a port of call, in addition to the tramp tonnage available, should bring down the water rates to the figure already mentioned.

Let Senators not deceive themselves that the matter of tolls on the Panama Canal is not a most serious question to Great Britain. Already the anticipation of the completion of the canal is being used on the English Stock Exchange to boom the value of the shares of the British Maritime Trust (Ltd.). I hold in my hand a part of the London Times of July 8, wherein the fact appears in an advertisement.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in his address yesterday suggested the thought of carrying out the French policy of the repayment to the ships of the tolls charged. That this would excite the ire of Great Britain is apparent from the following resolution, passed unanimously by the senate of the Commonwealth of Melbourne July 25 last, which had already been adopted by the house of representatives:

That in the opinion of this house any system of bonus or rebate of the canal dues to American shipping using the Panama Canal would be detrimental to the interests of Australia.

Oh, the Panama Canal means much to Great Britain.

Disraeli—Lord Beaconsfield—I recall once said in a speech he delivered, "Now we control and have one foot on the pedestal—Suez—we must control the other pedestal, a canal across the American Isthmus; then England will be the great commercial colossus, controlling the commerce of the world." Mr. President, I submit that recent declarations and acts of his legatees design to carry out this thought.

Mr. President, never, with my vote, shall this result come about. I am not a lawyer, but as a layman I am impressed with the arguments of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], and of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY]. Without the least of prejudice I shall vote against any proposition that shall place other nations on the same footing with the United States in using this great waterway.

Mr. President, this superb enterprise is about completed. It is a monument to American genius and labor. But lo! After the expenditure of millions of money and the sacrifice of hundreds of lives, we awake to find that we do not own it at all; we may police it, but more we can not do, and yet we are asked to expend more millions of money to fortify that which we do not own. Oh, that the people of this country might have known all this before the first spade of earth was lifted, thereby saving the great metropolis of the world—New York City—and our eastern coast another menace, in the way of a free and easy passage of a hostile fleet from the Orient. Mr. President, a chain is only as strong as its weakest link. America, superb in genius, splendid in mechanical invention, undaunted in overcoming nature's obstacles, holding in check the mighty Chagres River; we were strong, but we were weak—oh, how weak—in diplomacy when we entered into this treaty.

Mr. President, America is big enough to be brave, strong, and just, and we will be. I urge such a policy for the use of this great maritime highway as will meet this thought, viz, American ships—both coastwise and ocean—free, and to other craft of the world only such tolls as shall maintain the physical condition of the canal, letting the cost of construction of the same be America's gift to civilization and the world.

Mr. President, what nation in the world would dare go to The Hague, or any other tribunal, in opposition to a policy so fair, so liberal, and so just?

Mr. President, in the light of the ratification of this treaty, I ask, What could have become of the superb diplomacy and splendid spirit of Americanism of which we were wont to hear and read about when this "Hay-Pauncefote" treaty was negotiated? It could not have been dead. Oh, no; it only slumbered. I believe it is to-day awake, and justice and America will triumph.

I desire now to read the following from the Philadelphia Inquirer:

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Wednesday, July 15, 1912.]

PANAMA CANAL AND THE HAGUE.

We take direct issue with those Senators who hold that the question of a free passage for American ships through the Panama Canal is a matter that must be sent to The Hague.

Shall we farm out to arbitration our authority over our own $400,000,000 enterprise? Can we not sail a ship through the canal free of tolls from Philadelphia to San Francisco without asking permission from the powers or from a board of arbitration?

What is there to arbitrate?

We have built a canal primarily for our own use. We have entered into an agreement with England that all nations shall be treated alike. We shall treat them alike. But in what manner have we bound ourselves to put American shipping on the same basis that we put foreign bottoms? Of course English and German and foreign ships of all kinds will be given precisely the same treatment, but have we declared our intention to force an American ship to pay the same tolls that are exacted from our rivals in commerce?

Most assuredly we have done no such thing, and the Senator who argues that we have no right to discriminate in favor of our own is simply straining at gnats and swallowing camels.

The one way we have of opening up fresh avenues of trade in American vessels is to stimulate the building of American ships by offering them free passage through the canal. And we should do it. Send the question of our right to do so to arbitration? Nonsense! There is not a maritime power that would not pack that arbitration commission in its own selfish interests. Of course England and Germany and the others would stand a unit against us. In that direction lies their ability to control the commerce of the United States.

It will be quite impossible for any American Senator to induce the American people to believe that we are spending something like $400,000,000 just for the purpose of handing trade and commerce over to foreigners.

What is ours is ours. The Panma Canal is our canal. So long as we put all foreign ships on the same basis as regards tolls we have done all that can possibly be required of us. We can send ships from Philadelphia to San Francisco through the canal free of tolls. We can send an American ship from Philadelphia to the west coast of South America or to Australia or to Japan through the canal free of tolls.

Arguments to the contrary are simply preposterous and un-American.

The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], a few days ago, asserted that in his judgment it was not the Government of Great Britain so much as it was the railroads which were interested. I am willing to confess that they are interested, too, but at the same time I realize that Great Britain is interested in it because of other matters besides the railroads. It is a matter of vital interest to it.

I hold in my hand a copy of the London Times of July 16. In the article, which is nearly a column and a half in length, they argue for themselves and insist that this must ultimately go to The Hague or some other international tribunal.

I read from another column:

The Panama question. Debate in the Senate.

It goes on to say among other things that they have friends on their side in the United States. Then that Mr. ROOT started with a most impressive and profound warning. He is always impressive and always profound.

It is but natural that the London Times should sympathize with him, for he was standing on their side and advocating their cause.

I trust in all reason and fairness that the sacrifices made by this Nation in a physical way and the tremendous expenditure in a financial way, that this canal may be open and free to American vessels, as free as God's air, and a better time, a happier prosperity will then come to this Nation. The seas will be rehabilitated with our craft floating our flag, and peace, plenty, happiness, and commerce will be the portion of the American Republic.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that when the hour of 6 o'clock arrives this evening the Senate stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I should very much like for the Senate to be able to get through without holding night sessions.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. THORNTON. I have been regular in my attendance on the sessions of the Senate, and I feel that when I have sat here from 10 o'clock in the morning until 6 in the evening—eight hours—I have done my duty. I, for one, do not feel justified in coming back again and remaining from 8 to 11 or 12, especially when I know that there is no necessity for it.

If we were within the closing hours of a Congress, and it looked necessary to finish up certain bills—appropriation bills and other highly necessary matters—it would be another thing. But this Congress will not end until next March. The only reason we can now possibly give for having night sessions is simply to suit the convenience of Senators who wish to get through two or three days sooner than they otherwise would. If they will only sit two or three days longer, we can get along without night sessions at all. I do not intend to neglect my public duties in any way, but I do want to give notice that I can not be relied upon to be on hand at night sessions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not suppose the motion was debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. By unanimous consent I will say to the Senator——

Mr. THORNTON. I am not going to object, but merely made the statement I did so that the Senate might understand my situation and the reasons why I shall not be here, if I am not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, we have been trying, by keeping this the unfinished business and devoting the time from 12 to 6 to it, to make some progress on this bill. The time is mostly consumed by remarks of Senators, and we have not been able to get a vote on anything to-day. I did not know but that if we sat all day and had the remarks, possibly this evening we could vote on something. This bill is standing in the way of other important bills. Of course, if the Senate would agree for a time to vote on the bill and pending amendments, perhaps we could accomplish more. I did not feel like making that suggestion now. This is the only evening session I shall ask for. I hope to get a vote on at least the pending amendment this evening. I hope that the motion I have made will prevail.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, that the Senate stand in recess this evening from 6 o'clock until 8 o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I imagine the god of candor must smile very audibly when he listens to the diverse arguments in the Senate in an attempt to overthrow the solemn obligation entered into between this country and another great power only a decade ago. Ordinarily, when two persons disagree about what a mutual contract means, they go to the instrument itself for the information to guide them in its construction, and they weigh the words used in that instrument. It is only when one desires to avoid his obligations that he interjects into it extraneous matters upon which he can hang an excuse.

I can not imagine anything more inconsistent than the several reasons that I have heard to-day in these arguments as to why we should avoid the plain terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is urged by some Senators—and the last one who spoke upon the subject—that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had not been considered as a binding obligation by this Government, and that is used as a reason why the subsequent treaty, which acknowledged that it was a binding obligation, was without consideration; and that statement is made in the very face of the fact that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty acknowledged and reasserted the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The next excuse is that it is without any consideration. This proposition is made by still another Senator, who can not find within the limits of the terms any means of escape, and so he asserts that there was no binding obligation, because the other party to this contract had no interest whatever to surrender; and still a fourth makes the claim that, while the other party to the treaty had an interest to surrender, as a matter of fact that party has never surrendered anything, and hence the new treaty is without any obligatory force.

The next excuse, that made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], is that it will be impossible to convince the American people that a canal built with our own money, over a strip of land in which we have almost a complete sovereignty, is not ours to do with as we see fit. Hence, he draws the conclusion that as we can not convince the public, most of whom have never read a line of either treaty, that we have not complete authority, we should therefore avoid the terms of the treaty.

Another Senator, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], while he admits that the contract is rather binding, and while he also admits that when we had an opportunity to say whether or not we should reserve the right to relieve our coastwise trade from tolls, we were then in honor bound to say that we intended to do so. His position, if I understand him correctly, is that when it becomes a question of national safety his patriotic duty requires him to construe the instrument in favor of his own country.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I think the treaty——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The treaty, to my layman's mind, is evasive. It is not positive, at least. That it is very widely left open to debate, and some of the most distinguished Senators in this Chamber have so declared. I feel myself, after I have read it, and as I have heard the discussion, that it is clearly and sheerly a domestic question, over which England has no rights.

I will say further that this means so much to the American Nation, not only in matters of business, but in matters of real safety when our life, so to speak, is at stake, that when there is a question of doubt the Senator may rely upon it every time that he will find the Senator from New Jersey solving that doubt on the side of his country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think I fairly stated the position of the Senator as he has again restated it. Of course, I do not agree with the Senator that our interests are at all injured by our fulfilling our treaty obligations. In fact, I think it is the moral duty which we owe to all citizens who are called upon to pay the interest on the investment and the expenses of the operation of that canal to see that all are treated fairly and equitably. I contend that it is against the interest of a vast number of the American people who are called upon to pay this expense to relieve any shipping interest of a fair charge for passing through the canal. I admit that that is purely a domestic question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota further yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. On a question of burdening our people I am quite as mindful as the Senator can be of the burdens which to-day press upon them. But the canal will amount to nothing unless it shall be used, and the more liberally it is used the better for this country in every possible way.

I insist that whether the tolls are absolutely paid the results in remuneration will come back to us in another way. A man opens a highway, splendid and broad, and improves it with all the methods that we know. He does not think of charging tolls from passers-by, whether he may hope ultimately to get a return or not. We believe it is a benefit to us if it will enhance the general property and indirectly we will come out of it whole. Take the magnificent Pennsylvania Avenue here, 200 feet wide. There is no thought of charging toll. I say the toll idea is a relic of barbarism. I will ask, as I said in my little talk, only so much toll from foreign ships as would maintain the physical condition of the canal and let the cost of the canal be America's great gift to the civilization of the world. I believe it would do more for us in a million ways than any other step which we could take of advancement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I gathered the Senator's belief from his first address. I, of course, agree that it conforms entirely to what he has now said.

I have lived too long in the world, Mr. President, not to have long since learned that when the interest or the advantage of a people comes in direct conflict with any prior obligation entered into by that people they will seek every possible method of reasoning to avoid the contract or to make it conform to their interest or advantage. As I look over this map of the United States and number the coast States and compare those with the number of States, I can naturally see why so many of our friends, Members of the Senate who represent coast States and in each of whose States there are one or more important cities, who hope to gain great advantages through the use of the canal, should have their views colored by the wishes of their own constituents. I note here that following around the coast we have Washington, Oregon, California, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and Maine, all of them bordering upon salt water and all of them expecting to reap an advantage from the cheaper rates of transportation to be secured when this canal is opened.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator permit me just a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I feel that my personal identity with the Senator has been in vain. You have measured me too illy and too narrowly. Heaven knows that there is no selfish hair in my head. I have not a selfish thought in any proposition I have proposed as to the effect directly on the little Commonwealth in which I live or the State of New York or the great port and city of New York. I am not controverting a moment on any such ground, but I do so upon the broadest general principle overlying the Senator's State or any State, and taking us all in as one great combination of Commonwealths I say better results can come to all our people through the system I suggest. I do not dream or intimate any local pride which influences me in selfishness to vote here either for or against the measure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there has never been a day in the Senate since I have been here and since I have been acquainted with our genial friend from New Jersey that I have not found him literally full of eloquence for the State of New Jersey and for his fellow beings in general. I will always credit him with a deep sympathy for all mankind. We often, through him, hear of the wonderful little State of New Jersey. I agree with him as to all its wonders, and I can sympathize with him in his strong desire that it may be brought in closer communication with California and Oregon at the expense of North Dakota and South Dakota.

But, Mr. President, I hardly expect that the view I have upon this subject will be maintained in the Senate. When I take all those States and multiply them by two, the number of Senators from each State, and when I add to those the few scattering ones in the center of the United States who will take the view of my friend from New Jersey, that they will somehow, somewhere, and sometime in the great future receive some benefit from this canal, I see how hopeless is my endeavor to demand the rights of the people of all the interior to be considered in this great question.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated that this case should never go to The Hague, that it would be prejudged if it ever would go there. The Senator, I believe, is correct upon the first proposition, and that is that it should never go to The Hague, because, if the Senator's contention is correct, that under this treaty the phrase "the vessels of all nations" does not include the United States, then certainly it is such a domestic question that it ought not to go to The Hague. Consequently, those who vote for it on that view will necessarily carry the same view whenever the question should arise as to whether it should go to any other tribunal.

But, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Massachusetts does a great injustice to that great international tribunal when he states that it would at any time prejudge a case, and that that case would be decided upon the interest of the people representing any other country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. In just a moment, Mr. President, I will yield.

I think the Senator from Massachusetts himself has had some experience in adjudications of this character before an international tribunal. I only have to carry my memory back to a few years ago, when there was a dispute between the United States and Canada as to an international boundary, and the lord chief justice of a great nation decided every question in conformity with the American view as against the view of his own country. I stand here to assert to-day that the intelligence of the world, the natural sentiment of honor of the great countries of the world, has advanced sufficiently far so that I believe a question of law, and purely one of law, will be determined according to legal principles and not according to the interest of the country whose representative is called upon to decide that question.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator, then, thinks that the representatives of these foreign governments in their decision occupy a higher plane than he is willing to accord to the American people or to the Senators of this body, whom he has just charged with being controlled by their local interests.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the matter will not be prejudged, because the matter will never go to The Hague tribunal. The only question at stake, so far as I see, is a question of national integrity. I am not fearful that if the question would go to The Hague tribunal it would not be decided upon its merits. I have no fear whatever, Mr. President, in that respect. I have a fear, however, that it would be decided against the view of the majority of the Senate, because I believe that the history of the whole transaction pertaining to the canal—the diplomatic correspondence, the three treaties that were signed in connection with it, all taken together—establishes so clearly and so definitely that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty means just what it says, that no people in the world would ever gainsay it, and would hold that we are bound to treat all nations exactly alike, and the word "all" as used in that treaty did include the United States.

Mr. President, when the question was before us on the former occasion I voted for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I voted for the law under which the canal was constructed. I voted for the other treaty with Panama which bound us to certain obligations, and those obligations were to conform not only to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, not only to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, not only to concessions that were made to citizens of France, but also by a specific provision within that treaty which was read the other day by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], that we should conform to the conditions of those previous treaties, all of which bound us to extend equality of treatment to the vessels of all nations.

Mr. President, that is the condition in which this matter comes before the Senate at the present time, and I say candidly that I would not have voted for these treaty provisions nor would I have voted for the law which authorized the President to construct that canal if it had not been understood at that time that every vessel going through that canal should pay the same tolls, whether they were our coastwise vessels or whether they were our vessels engaged in foreign trade, or the vessels of any other country; and I dare say, considering the sentiment of the Senate at that time and the vote that they had given at other times upon the question of a ship subsidy, there would have been many added to the negative vote upon that law if they had considered that we were in fact making a present to the ship owners in the United States or out of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I want to get directly down to the one proposition, and that is whether or not the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did bind this country in honor to treat all the vessels of all the world, including those of the United States, exactly the same. I insist that it was the intention of both parties to the agreement that the United States should acquire no special privilege in the canal which might inure to our benefit or to the detriment of any other power.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask the Senator from North Dakota, if it should be perfectly manifest before the canal is opened or after it is opened that other nations using the canal were paying the tolls of their vessels going through it, how would the Senator meet that suggestion so as to put our shipping through our own canal upon a parity with that of other nations?

Mr. McCUMBER. I intended to deal with that question, but I might as well deal with it now since the Senator has asked it.

I have never contended that the United States had not a perfect right at any time the Government saw fit to grant a ship subsidy to any ship, and I have never denied our right to measure that subsidy by any standard we saw fit. If that standard should approximate the tolls paid in passing through the canal, I would not doubt at all the right of the United States to grant a subsidy to that extent; but I do say, Mr. President, that a mere refund of tolls based upon no other consideration whatever is against the spirit if not against the letter of the agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The statement has been authoritatively made, as I understood—at least it has been made as a statement of fact about which there was no controversy—that other nations, in addition to the subventions or subsidies that they are in the habit of paying, would pay the tolls levied by the United States Government for passage of vessels through the canal, so that the matter of subsidy does not seem to affect that question. This is in addition to the subsidy. It is perfectly apparent.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can answer that, Mr. President, if the Senator will give me the opportunity.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. All agreements, Mr. President, are reciprocal. If any country whose vessels we are under obligation to treat the same as those of the United States should vote to pay the tolls of their own vessels passing through the canal, then they would be forfeiting the rights they had obtained under the obligation which has been entered into and which was understood to be a mutual obligation, and we could deal with that subject when we were compelled to meet it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Anticipating that condition, would the Senator deal with that question by allowing our ships to go through free, or would he deal with it by the Government refunding to our ships the tolls actually paid by them into the Treasury?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would cross that bridge when I came to it. It would depend on so very many conditions, surroundings, and purposes that I could not at this time foretell what might be the best method of meeting the situation; but I say that I would meet it; and when I say that the other party to the contract could then make no complaint against our doing likewise, I think I have sufficiently answered the question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to trespass on the Senator's time too far——

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not object at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. But I should like to say to the Senator that it seems to me we have practically reached that bridge now. In the matter of the Suez Canal foreign governments are to-day paying the tolls of their ships. Spain has already——

Mr. McCUMBER. All right; but we are not dealing with the Suez Canal; we are dealing with a canal that is not yet opened, and we are attempting to determine what we will do in reference to the tolls in that canal in conformity with the obligations that are still existing, and which obligations so far have not been violated in spirit or letter by any other country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator think that when we know with reasonable certainty that that condition will arise we ought to deal with it now in the present legislation with reference to tolls?

Mr. McCUMBER. I not only have no real certainty that it will arise, but I am quite sure that it never will arise, because the moment it should arise by reason of the act of any foreign nation that moment our obligation would certainly cease as to that nation. They are more interested in maintaining the obligation on the part of our ships to pay toll than they are in paying tolls for their own ships.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator—of course I can not vouch for it—but it is stated that the Government of Spain has already passed a law providing for the payment of the tolls of their ships passing through the canal.

Mr. McCUMBER. Passing through the Panama Canal?

Mr. SIMMONS. For passing through the Panama Canal. That has been stated. I do not know whether it is true or not, but I do not think there can be any reasonable doubt that that course will be pursued by the Governments of the world. That being true, it seems to me that we ought to legislate with reference to that situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just the minute that Spain does that Spain as a nation has taken herself without the protection of this treaty, and the moment that she has taken herself without it we could treat her ships in passing through the canal on a different footing from the ships of other nations.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator is not——

Mr. McCUMBER. In other words, she can not take a position inconsistent with the treaty and at the same time insist that we shall be bound by the terms of an agreement with reference to her ships.

Mr. SIMMONS. In that statement I entirely agree with the Senator. What I desired to know of him was, whether, if that condition arises or if we have a right to assume that condition as a basis of action, he would meet it by remitting tolls to American vessels or would he meet it by refunding them?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would meet it as the exigencies of the case then demanded. I would not at this time say how it would be done.

I said a moment ago, Mr. President, that I wanted to get down to the meat of the proposition and to determine from the instruments themselves the fair construction. I said it was the intention of both parties to the agreement that the United States should acquire no special privilege in the canal which might not inure to the benefit of all other countries.

We have had two treaties upon this subject, and I want to quote the crucial provisions of each one of those treaties and to show that the portion of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty bearing on this matter was practically reinstated as an obligation in the new treaty. I go back, then, to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which reads—and I call especial attention to it:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle—

Now, let us keep that in mind—

in granting, however, their joint protection to such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it was also understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same—

That is, the canal—

shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon—

The parties owning and operating the same, whether they be the United States or any other power—than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms—

That is, equal terms—

to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

Certainly no one will now say, Mr. President, that under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that whoever should construct this canal should not be bound by that instrument to treat the vessels of all nations exactly the same; that neither the vessels of Great Britain nor the vessels of the United States should enjoy any special privilege or any other privilege than that which was granted to the vessels of the world. This was the general principle, let us remember, that was established by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—the principle of equality of treatment in respect not only to the commerce of Great Britain and the United States, but in respect also to the commerce of the entire world. Was this general principle retained in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? Let us read article 2 of that treaty to see whether it was. It reads as follows:

The high contracting parties desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle"—

The words "general principle" are in quotation marks and relate to the same "general principle" that is referred to in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—

the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention adopted as the basis of such neutralization the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal; that is to say—

To make it doubly specific we all understand what the provision referred to of the general convention at Constantinople was—that the vessels of all nations and of the world should be placed on a parity.

That is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

Remember, now, that we restate article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and make it by express words an obligation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. We should also remember here that the neutralization embodied in the Constantinople agreement of October 29, 1888, which is referred to as the "general principle" of neutralization to be established in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, bound Great Britain, an important stockholder in the canal, as well as other nations, to observe the demand for equality of treatment.

In the face of this, how can we contend, Mr. President, that because we are the owner of the canal none of these rules shall be applied to us—rules which we declared should be applied to us in adopting the "general principle" of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and which did apply to us in specific terms in the last-mentioned treaty.

Mr. President, I want now to consider one other feature, and that is the question of consideration for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] the other day asked me to call his attention to any section, either in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty or in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which still enjoined Great Britain from constructing a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. I stated at that time, while I did not have the two treaties before me, that the answer would be forthcoming. So I want to answer that question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from North Dakota is mistaken in regard to my question. It is not before me, but, as I recollect it——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator can restate it.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I recollect the question, it was this: "Will the Senator from North Dakota point out any provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that forbids Great Britain from the construction of a canal across Nicaragua or any other point?"

Mr. McCUMBER. That is substantially what I said. Of course I had to consider both of the treaties in order to answer the Senator's question as to whether the Hay-Pauncefote treaty covered that subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. At the same time I remarked that very probably the construction of such a canal by Great Britain across the Isthmus might be regarded as in contravention of the Monroe doctrine; but there is nothing in any treaty we now have with Great Britain that would prevent her from entering upon such a work.

Mr. McCUMBER. Did we forget about the Monroe doctrine when citizens of France were constructing a canal across the Isthmus of Panama? It never occurred to us then that there was any breach to the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true; and I do not assert that it would be a breach of the Monroe doctrine. I say that it is the only national principle, however, that could be invoked against Great Britain if she were to enter upon the construction of a canal either across South America or North America or Asia or Africa.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think it would be considered as a violation of the Monroe doctrine.

Now, I want to see whether or not Great Britain really surrendered any right, because it may be important in the future, if we so conduct ourselves toward this canal as to avoid our own obligations, to consider whether other countries might claim the right to construct a canal across the Isthmus or at some other point. They might take the Nicaragua route. I claim, Mr. President, that Great Britain, at least, under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty can not to-day construct or own or operate or control such a canal, and if we maintain the integrity of this treaty she never will have that right. Let us see. Article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty reads:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal.

There is a clear obligation on the part both of the United States and of Great Britain that neither one nor the other would ever maintain ownership or control over a canal. It was to get rid of that prohibition, or that portion of it which relates to the United States, that we sought the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in getting rid of that prohibition so far as it related to the United States we did not relieve Great Britain from her obligation; and that is what I expect to show now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend when I come to discuss the matter to be overtechnical, but I want to point out now that the language which has just been read by the Senator from North Dakota relates specifically to a canal across Nicaragua.

Mr. McCUMBER. It relates to a canal connecting the oceans.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it relates specifically to a canal across Nicaragua. There is nothing in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty except as found in article 8, which carries the agreement of either party beyond the route at Nicaragua. But I freely grant that under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it would have at least violated its spirit if the United States or Great Britain had attemped to build a canal across the Isthmus and to have assumed exclusive management and control over it. I freely grant that in 1901 the United States was released from that obligation. The thing I do not grant is that in 1901 Great Britain agreed with the United States that it would never attempt a canal in that region of the world.

Mr. McCUMBER. In other words, Mr. President, the contention of the Senator from Iowa is that Great Britain was therefore relieved from the obligation contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that she should not own or control the canal.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course that would be the natural conclusion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Every obligation contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was abrogated.

Mr. McCUMBER. And superseded.

Mr. CUMMINS. New obligations were created in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and it is to that treaty, and that alone, that we must look to discover the obligation which now rests upon the United States, and the obligation, if any, respecting a canal which rests upon Great Britain.

Mr. McCUMBER. But we can scarcely avoid the consideration of one contract when we begin to construe the other contract which is intended to modify it. Now, the Senator agrees with me so far, that under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty neither the United States nor Great Britain could control or own or operate exclusively a canal connecting the two oceans.

Now, Mr. President, let us take the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, adopted in 1901. It sets forth its purposes, and those purposes become as important a factor and even a more important factor than anything else in determining the proper construction. And what were those purposes?

> The United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to that end—

Now, follow closely—> and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—> to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States.

To what end?

To that extent and no further. The agreement says its purposes are not to relieve the parties to the contract, but to relieve one of the parties only and to change the obligation to the extent only that the United States may be relieved from its agreement not to own or operate such a canal. And it then proceeds:

> Without impairing the general principle of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed, etc.

The object of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to facilitate the construction of a canal, and as a means so to do "to remove any objections which may arise" out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty "to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States." The purposes as set forth in the treaty are a part of it and must be considered in construing any of its terms. The purpose, as indicated, was to facilitate the construction of the canal by removing the prohibition contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the construction of the canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States. It was not to facilitate it by removing the prohibition against such construction under the auspices of the Government of Great Britain. If such had been the intention or purpose, it would have been a very simple matter to have written therein "under the auspices of either party or government" or "under the auspices of any party or government."

The purposes of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, set forth in its introductory paragraph, declare that the United States should be freed from her promise made in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty not to own or exclusively control such canal. The first article of the agreement authorizes the United States to construct such canal, but nowhere, either in the introductory clause or anywhere else in the body of the instrument, can be found a word to relieve Great Britain from her obligation entered into under the same treaty.

Taking the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as a whole, and so construing it that each paragraph may have accorded to it an intendment in harmony with its words, Great Britain is not now relieved from her obligation to refrain from controlling any canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

This was the understanding of the Senate and of both parties to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty when it was adopted. This was the construction presented to the Senate in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations when it adopted this treaty.

Now, Mr. President, I want the Senator from Iowa to give his attention to the report, of certainly a great attorney and a great international lawyer, Senator C. K. Davis, of Minnesota, who wrote the report, and who, after reciting all the previous treaties bearing upon the subject, stated as follows:

> In the convention of February 5, 1900, Great Britain agrees that the restriction as to the exclusive control of the canal imposed by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty shall continue to bind her, while the United States is relieved from it.

That was the declaration made in the Senate of the United States in the opening of the discussion upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that construction was never denied or questioned by any Senator upon the floor in all that long discussion.

Again the report reads:

> This sweeping modification of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as to all its restrictions upon the right of the United States under its auspices to construct the canal and to have and enjoy all the rights—such as ownership—incident to its construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for its management and regulation, leaves no ground, substantial or conjectural, on which Great Britain could hereafter contend for any of the restrictions contained in that article (not expressly excepted) as remaining in force against the United States.

Then follows:

> She consents to remain under the prohibitions of that article and consents that the United States shall be relieved from them in her negotiations with Costa Rica or Nicaragua for such exclusive rights in or relating to the canal as they may concede to the United States.

Again, he says:

> If this convention is ratified, Great Britain could not negotiate with Costa Rica or Nicaragua or any other American State for any right to build, own, control, manage, regulate, or protect a canal to connect the oceans, while the United States is left free to enter upon and conclude such negotiations.

It was with that argument before us, with the concessions claimed in that article and for the consideration that Great Britain would relieve the United States while still binding herself, that we recognized to a great extent the binding force of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and sought its amendment by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

That is what the Committee on Foreign Relations stated as to the rights of Great Britain after the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That view, the view that Great Britain was precluded by the new arrangement, was the view of the Senate.

Not only that; the report gave reasons why Great Britain should not be relieved of that part of her obligation contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Now, what were those reasons as given to the Senate of the United States by Senator Davis, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations? The report further says:

> If we should abrogate the parts of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which forbid the exclusive control of the canal by either Government, thereby removing that restriction from Great Britain, we would deliberately open the door to her natural desire to obtain the right of the exclusive control of the canal under the treaty with Nicaragua concluded in 1860. Great Britain has a claim to the exclusive control of the canal that is very important to her in that the British possessions and the Dominion of Canada have coast and great seaports on both oceans.

Again, he says:

> No other nation except the United States could have so great an interest in the exclusive right to own and control an isthmian canal; but in this matter, come what may, we are compelled to assert the superiority of our right, now for the first time conceded by Great Britain. It is wise and just, therefore, that the value of this concession to us should be estimated as a great consideration for anything we may yield, if we, indeed, yield anything in acquiring the exclusive right to control the canal by a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Now, Mr. President, this is my construction: That Great Britain was not relieved from the prohibition of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; that she should never own or exclusively control any canal across the Isthmus. It is my construction that that is a binding obligation upon her to-day, and it is a binding obligation just so long as we hold as a binding obligation on us, the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Whenever we say that it is not binding on us according to its clear terms, of course we, by that very statement, say to the world that it is not a binding obligation upon the other party to the contract.

And yet in the face of this I hear Senators making an argument here that there was no consideration for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that therefore, because it is advantageous to us to abrogate our treaty, we ought to be at liberty to do so. Mr. President, I am one of those who hold that the same moral obligation that governs the individual in his transactions with another should govern 100,000,000 individuals constituting a nation in its obligations to the millions and millions with which it has made that obligation. I can not consent to the theory that if I enter into an obligation with a brother Senator whenever I find that obligation is against my interest the duty of self-preservation demands of me that I should break my word with him and dishonor my contract. Nor do I concede that when we have made a solemn obligation with another country, which obligation necessarily restricts us to some extent, and may therefore be somewhat detrimental to us, that we, because of the slight detriment, are in a position to assert, "this is a national question, and our national safety demands of us that we repudiate any obligation whenever the terms of that obligation do not conduce to the best interest of this country."

There is a way of getting rid of a bad contract between individuals, and that is making a new contract for a new consideration. There is a method of ridding ourselves from a poor contract made by another nation, and that is by entering into negotiations and securing a new treaty that will change the obligation, just exactly as we did in modifying the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

After all, Mr. President, it seems to me to be merely a question of national honor. I desire to see this country stand before all nations with its integrity and its honor unassailed and unassailable by any other nation in the world. The moment that we discard this treaty, the moment that we forget every historical utterance made on it, the moment we forget the admissions that were made in the report which presented it to the Senate, the moment we forget that we at one time by a vote of 43 to 27 refused an amendment that would give a preference to our coastwise vessels—the moment that we forget those things we subject ourselves to the self-earned criticism of the nations of the world who believe in national integrity.

Mr. President, I have but one word to say upon the merits. Here is all the interior section of the United States. Their Senators voted for the treaty. Their Senators and Representatives voted for the law which authorized us to build the canal. They voted for it with a clear understanding at that time that the $400,000,000, or whatever sum was necessary to construct that canal, should be an obligation against the Government, and the interest which would accrue on that obligation would be met by the tolls of the ships of the whole world. What benefit are we to derive out of a remission of the tolls? Certainly we pay our proportion, if not more than our proportion, for the expenses of the ship canal. What benefit are we to get in all the interior country for the remission of the tolls to the shipowners? Mr. President, as I stated the other day, I can not see any benefit, directly, indirectly, or remotely to the furthest degree.

We talk about its beneficial effect in lowering freight rates by rail. Can there be such a thing as competition between a transcontinental railway from New York to San Francisco and water transportation from New York to San Francisco through this canal, even though a dollar and a quarter a ton may be charged? We all know that that is an impossibility. We could not possibly carry freight by rail in competition with the canal. The only competition that we could possibly have would be in those few cases which would be almost infinitesimal, where it was necessary to rush some important articles immediately from New York to San Francisco or from one coast to the other.

Now, what will be the effect of the canal upon the transcontinental railways? They can not possibly compete with water transportation and they will not attempt to do so. The Interstate Commerce Commission has already fixed the rates and charges from one section to another. The railways can not modify those charges from one point to the other without upsetting the whole system of charges. That alone might prohibit them from entering into the contest. The interstate Commerce Commission would be an obstacle in addition to the physical obstacle against their entering into competition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is not the Senator from North Dakota mistaken when he says that the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed the rates from New York to San Francisco by rail.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has fixed rates all along the line and it has complete control over those rates. It allows some differentials between coast rates and interior rates in some instances. It has the control over them and indirectly, of course, it fixes them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I watch those things pretty carefully and I never have heard that the rates from San Francisco to New York or from New York to San Francisco have been under consideration by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McCUMBER. The rates from Chicago to San Francisco directly have been under consideration, have they not?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think they have.

Mr. CUMMINS. The rates from Chicago to interior points have been under consideration calling into interpretation the long-and-short-haul clause of the law, but so far as I know—I may be mistaken—the Interstate Commerce Commission has never been called upon to determine whether the rate from New York to San Francisco or any other coast point was a reasonable or an unreasonable rate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Interstate Commerce Commission has exercised its jurisdiction over all the rates that have been made between the one coast and the other. I do not mean that they have had before them directly a rate from New York to San Francisco, but by controlling all of the intermediate rates and the intermediate points they necessarily control the rates between the coast terminals.

Now, Mr. President, there is another proposition which bears upon this question of competition. I presume that the old rule governing rates either by water or by rail still holds. I presume that still the volume of business affects the rate charge, and hence if the volume of business is decreased to a material extent between any two points a raise of rates on what remains for transportation would naturally follow. Accordingly just to the extent that the volume of trade is taken from the transcontinental railways, and the trade which otherwise would have gone to those railways will go by way of the Panama Canal, unless there is other trade and other freight that will take its place, the necessary result will be that it will affect, and will affect in an upward tendency, the railroad rates across the continent.

Mr. President, I am not looking for any reduction whatever in transcontinental rates either by giving free tolls or by the completion of the Panama Canal. Yet all the interior of the country that will get no direct benefit from it must pay its proportionate share of the interest upon the $400,000,000 of bonds, if such should be issued, to cover the expense of construction under the law which we have already enacted, and also the operating expenses.

I submit, Mr. President, it is not fair treatment to the interior of this great country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from North Dakota concludes, I want to be sure that I understand one proposition that he announced. Is it contended by the Senator from North Dakota that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is still in force, except that Great Britain has released the United States from its agreement not to acquire exclusive control of a canal across the Isthmus?

Mr. McCUMBER. Two things, Mr. President, contained in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty are still in existence and are carried from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The first is that the United States alone is relieved from the prohibition against the construction and ownership or control of the canal, while Great Britain is still prohibited from either owning or controlling it. The next is that the general principle of equal treatment of the vessels of all the world is carried almost bodily into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. In other respects the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is superceded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. CUMMINS. The answer is not clear. In the last statement the Senator from North Dakota says that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is superseded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. A moment before he said that the obligation on the part of Great Britain in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty not to build a canal or acquire control of a canal across the Isthmus of Nicaragua remained in effect.

Now, I want him to tell me before I begin my argument whether in his judgment all the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty remain in effect except the release to the United States respecting the construction of a canal upon its part.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not see, Mr. President, how it is possible for the Senator to misunderstand me. I do not know any words I can use that will be more clear than those which I used when I declared that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was superseded with the exception of those provisions in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which are declared, either in the purpose or in the body of the instrument known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to be still binding obligations upon the two Governments. The one is, as I have stated, that the United States alone is released from the obligation against ownership and control, and the other is that the general principle in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which declares that all vessels of every nation should be treated the same without any discrimination, is carried forward as a principle into the new treaty or the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Although I am not so positive there was not anything else, I recall nothing else in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that could be said to be still in existence.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, strictly considered, the pending amendment does not involve the question that has just been debated. As I understand it, the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is to strike out the following words from the bill:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

It might very well be that the motion could be adopted and still the right of the United States to discriminate between American and foreign ships be asserted. Personally I have not been strongly disposed toward free coastwise ships through the canal, although I have had no doubt whatsoever of the right of the United States to pass these ships through the canal without charge if it desired to do so.

My idea of the adjustment that would be best for the people of this country is that our coastwise ships as well as our ships engaged in the foreign trade should be required to pay the proportionate cost of the maintenance and the operation of the canal; that it should be considered that the moneys paid out for the construction of the canal are moneys expended for the general benefit of the country, and for which we ought to demand no return from our own citizens or our domestic shipping, but that the annual outlay of operating the locks, of providing tenders and power, or furnishing pilots to guide these ships through the canal ought to be borne by the ship which is being passed in that way through the canal.

I think the rule ought to apply equally to ships engaged in coastwise business and to ships engaged in foreign trade. We ought if possible to lay a duty or a tax or a toll upon foreign ships, not only for the cost of maintenance and operation but that would also enable the United States to recover from year to year some return upon the moneys actually expended in the enterprise. This is the system which, if I alone were consulted in determining it, I would adopt.

If, however, I am called upon to vote as between free ships for America and our right to discriminate between American ships and foreign ships, then I shall vote for free ships, because I believe it to be vastly more injurious to the American people to deny our right to discriminate in favor of our own ships and to use this canal as we please in this respect than it will be to give our coastwise business the benefit of free passage. Premising therefore that I am not as an original proposition in favor of free coastwise shipping——

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me? The proposition which he mentions is an interesting one. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he would consider it a desirable feature of such a plan were tolls all graded according to the length of the voyages traversed—first, whether that is desirable, and, next, whether he would regard that as practicable?

Mr. CUMMINS. If it were practicable I should regard it as very desirable. I think there ought to be the same classification in freight passing through the canal that we find upon our railways. If it be practicable—and I have no opinion upon that; I do not presume to express an opinion upon it—I would charge a fair part of the actual earnings of the ship, according to her classified freight; but I am told that such a system would involve so much complication and such an accounting and auditing that, at the present time at least, it would not be practicable, and that we must therefore charge a certain sum per ton for the privileges of the canal.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. As an original question, the Senator from Iowa intimates that he would prefer a bill under which coastwise vessels would be charged at least what it would cost for the operation of the canal or the boats going through the canal. Does it not occur to the Senator, if such a modified toll were imposed upon ships engaged in the American coastwise trade, that to that extent it would operate as a discrimination against the American coastwise shipping, if it be assumed, as we are to assume, that with respect to all foreign ships their home governments will subsidize and reimburse their whole and entire expense for going through the canal?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will come to that, Mr. President, after a while in my discussion of the matter. I am not at all prepared to say that if I found in the passage of ships through the canal foreign governments had so subsidized their commerce that ours—engaged in coastwise business, at any rate—were put to disadvantage, I would be not only willing, but anxious, to so subsidize our coastwise trade that it could fairly compete with its foreign rivals, for I have no prejudice against bestowing a bounty on the part of the Government upon business. I am a protectionist, in the first place, and I understand perfectly that that means a bounty to American business and American labor, and I have no constitutional or political prejudice against doing likewise for any other American enterprise, if to do so will serve the public welfare.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the fact that, notwithstanding the treaty of Constantinople, which is in precisely the same terms as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, other governments are to-day giving bounties to their ships, Russia and Sweden in express terms granting money for the purpose, as it is expressed, of paying the tolls through the Suez Canal, does it not go without saying that they are going to do the same thing in so far as the Panama Canal is concerned?

Mr. CUMMINS. Everything, Mr. President, points in that direction. We can not now determine, however, what will be done by foreign nations in this respect, nor can we determine what effect largess or bounty given by foreign nations to their commerce will have upon our domestic or coastwise trade. When we discover the effect, then I will regard it as the highest duty of the Nation to see to it that our people are not put to a disadvantage, if, by relieving them from the burden, we can at the same time serve the public good.

I am stating my position unencumbered by the proposed or anticipated action of other nations in granting subsidies to ships which may pass through the canal. I say, as an original proposition as between our own people, if they alone were concerned, I believe it would be fairer to make the ships pay at least the cost of maintenance and operation; but, I repeat, if I come to a choice between giving other nations the same right that we propose to give to our own, and free ships for our coastwise trade, then I am heartily in favor of free ships in that trade.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SANDERS. I simply wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if the interest on the cost of the canal should not be charged as one of the costs of operation? He seems to make a difference, proposing to charge the coastwise trade the cost of operation and the other trade the cost of operation and something additional, to pay the interest on the original investment. It seems to me that those two things ought to be considered alike.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee is quite right in stating a logical conclusion. There is no imperative reason why we should allow ships to pass through the canal locks at Sault Ste. Marie without charge; there is no more reason for allowing them to do so than there is for allowing the coastwise ships to pass through the Panama Canal, except that the latter has involved a larger expenditure of money. I am not attempting to reconcile this view of mine with other things that we have done or other things that we have refused to do for our people. I only say that that is the way it seems to me. We have linked these two oceans, and we devote, so far as our own people are concerned, the expenditure for that vast work to them and to their general welfare; but it is not enough to have united those two oceans; that expenditure would be valueless if we were not to maintain there year after year a large force of men and a great accumulation of machinery to pass, from day to day, the ships from one ocean to the other; and without being able to found it upon any principle that would not also embrace the interest upon the original cost of construction, I yet think that equitably there is a difference, and that we can give that advantage to our domestic shipping and refuse to give it to the other nations of the world. I am not, however, so deeply interested in the adjustment of the tolls upon our coastwise shipping or upon our foreign shipping, important as the adjustment is, as I am in the determination of our power to charge our own people whatsoever we will, and charge the other peoples of the earth whatsoever we will, provided the charge to the world is just and equitable for the service performed.

It is very unfortunate that there are such differences of opinion upon the question of our right to care for our own people under this treaty to a greater extent than we are called upon to care for the other peoples of the world. I have not known any disagreement here in my short experience so fraught with injurious consequences as the disagreement respecting the interpretation of this contract between the United States and Great Britain. It is of vast import. We must decide it, and we must decide it now. There is no possibility under the circumstances which surround us of evading the duty and the responsibility which have come to us, not by our own act, but through the act of Great Britain.

I do not know just what I can say with propriety in debating a question of this character in open session, and I want to debate it in open session. I premise all that I have to say by the assertion that I want to stay within the boundaries of propriety; I want to say nothing that will disturb the peace we have so long enjoyed, but Great Britain has put the Congress of the United States in a position that makes it absolutely necessary that we shall now construe this treaty; that we shall put whatever interpretation is to be put upon it by the United States. We may defer the exercise of the right, if we like, by attaching the same charges to all ships that pass through the canal, but we can not defer the assertion of the right if we ever intend to exercise it.

Let us see. The House of Representatives passed a bill which in its terms proposed to give to the shipping of the United States a lower toll, or some greater advantage, than it proposed to give to the shipping of the world. Thereupon, Great Britain formally presented a protest to the United States, through the Secretary of State, who esteems it to be his duty—as I have no doubt it was—to lay the protest before the Congress of the country. It has been said that Great Britain promised to follow this protest, which simply stated her objections to the measure, or to the interpretation proposed by the House of Representatives, by a full argument setting forth the reasons for the position she had taken. For some cause, entirely unknown to me, the further communication has not yet made its appearance, but we may assume that in due time it will make its appearance. Her protest here stands as a notice to the Congress of the United States that, if we pass the law which attempts to discriminate between our shipping and the shipping of the rest of the world, she would regard it as a violation of the treaty of 1901.

Tell me, if you can, how we are to escape, if we wanted to escape, the duty of answering that protest. If we do not now assert whatever right we have under this treaty, we will surrender it forever, and in my opinion the Congress that does surrender it will be universally condemned, and the administration that participates in the surrender will be remembered only to be condemned so long as free institutions exist in the United States and so long as the spirit of independence prevails in the hearts of Americans. All that, however, is upon the assumption that the interpretation which I believe this treaty bears and which has been asserted by the House of Representatives is true and just, and it is to that question I intend to devote my time.

I do not agree with a great deal which has been said by those who reach the same conclusion to which I have arrived. It has been claimed, with great earnestness and with great force of argument indeed, that the treaty of 1901 does not apply at all to the Panama Canal; that it does not apply to a canal built by the Government of the United States and built upon territory so acquired as to extend our sovereign power within its limits. There was great force in the argument of the Senator from Nevada upon that point, but I do not find it necessary to divorce the United States from this treaty in that way. It has been said that we can not regard the terms of this treaty because through it we abandon or surrender a part of the sovereignty of the United States. I do not so interpret the treaty. I join issue directly with the Senator from New York and the Senator from North Dakota with respect to what the treaty says and what it means. No Senator can excel me in the desire to perform sacredly our obligations with Great Britain. Whatever we have promised to do in the treaty with Great Britain, that we ought to do until we give her such notice of our intention to abrogate the treaty or recede from its terms as will become an honorable nation.

I am sorry that so many of the Senators who insist that we have the right to discriminate as to our own shipping have apparently admitted that in order to do it we must disregard the terms of the treaty. I hope they will reflect upon their conclusions in that respect, for I believe, and it can be conclusively shown, that the treaty contains no promise on the part of the United States that it will extend to the other nations of the world the same tolls and the same conditions that we give to our own shipping. There is no such promise in the treaty. It was never intended that there should be any such promise in the treaty.

I do not claim that it is expressed as happily and fortunately as it could have been expressed, but I am here to rescue our diplomatists from some of the criticism, some of the censure that have fallen upon them in this debate. I do not believe that John Hay has justly incurred the censure which impliedly has grown out of this discussion. I think that with reasonable plainness he has set down the obligation of the United States, and if we are not searching for an opportunity to favor other nations at our own expense, we will have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion which I believe he intended to express.

I take the treaty just as it is. I eliminate no word from it. I incorporate no word into it. I take it with all its history, with all the circumstances which surrounded it when made, and I believe that I can prove to any impartial mind that there is here no promise whatsoever that the ships of Great Britain shall pass through this canal upon the same terms as to charges and the same conditions as to passage which our own ships may enjoy.

I do not concur, either, with many who have criticized the treaty of 1850, commonly known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I do not believe that those who have analyzed it have given it its true significance. There are probably some things in it which we ought not to have agreed to, I admit, but I have yet to hear stated upon the floor what I believe to have been its chief purpose. Let us see.

Some passage between the two oceans had been discussed for 150 years before this treaty was made. I have no doubt that the possibility of this enterprise was present in the vast and comprehensive mind of Balboa himself when first his eye fell upon the Pacific Ocean. For a long, long time the subject has been a favorite one for adventurers, writers, and statesmen; and all who have had occasion to inquire into and discuss the relations between the various parts of the world have carefully considered the project of uniting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

In 1850 and before, everybody knows there was an enterprise on foot—one organized by private persons, and it was to be carried on by private capital—to build a canal across Nicaragua. You will all remember that not very long before that we had acquired California, and that just a year or two before gold had been discovered in California, and in 1849 and 1850 there were thousands of Americans struggling across the Isthmus of Panama, dying every mile of the way. There is no route known to civilized man which has witnessed more hardship and struggle than the route between the Atlantic and the Pacific at Panama.

There was a great desire for some better means of communication, and a company of Americans had proposed to build a railway across the Isthmus of Panama. It was already fairly well organized, but then, as now, conditions in the Central American States were not favorable. Revolutions were common; governments were not strong; and the men who it was thought might invest their money in the proposed canal at Nicaragua and the men who had proposed to invest their money in the railway at Panama were not willing to do it unless the safety of the physical property which they created could be assured and unless responsible nations guaranteed that justice would be done to them.

It was to give that assurance and secure that construction that the treaty of 1850 was made, and while, as I said a moment ago, there are some things in it which in the light of this day we would not have inserted, upon the whole it is not to be criticized. On the other hand, I think it is to be praised as an evidence of the forward spirit of a Republic then weaker and less able to accomplish things than now. The treaty was made, the railway at Panama was immediately built, and ever since that time, or at least until the railway at Tehauntepec was constructed, it afforded the readiest means of passage from one coast of this country to the other, as well as the readiest means of passage from the west coast of South America to Europe. That was the real reason for the treaty of 1850, and it accomplished its purpose. I pass along.

I have no doubt that both nations practically regarded the treaty as functus officio. I have no doubt that both of them for years and years did not look upon it as containing any obligation that was material to the present time. However that may be, when we came, in 1901, to make this treaty, there it was. It had never been abrogated, although it may have been violated by both parties. But I do not know as to that. It is asserted that it was often violated by Great Britain, but I have not thought it material to inquire as to that charge. But at any rate when we came to 1901 there were obligations in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that it was necessary to abrogate in order to maintain friendly and peaceful relations with Great Britain if we intended to go forward with the project.

And here I disagree with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] wholly, and I put it squarely now. I am sorry he is not here. I am sorry he is not here, because if I misrepresent him he is the best person in the world to put me right. He says, or it is his view, that a part of the treaty of 1850 remains in force without having been incorporated into the treaty of 1901. He finds in the treaty of 1850 an agreement on the part of the United States that this canal shall be used by all the nations of the world, including the United States, upon equal terms.

I do not dispute that construction of the treaty of 1850, and if that part of the treaty of 1850 is still in force or if any part of it is in force upon that subject, then there is much reason for accepting the conclusion of the Senator from North Dakota. But I maintain that there is no part of the treaty of 1850 in force; that it has been superseded and abrogated by the treaty of 1901, and that neither Great Britain is responsible to us for anything contained in the treaty of 1850 nor are we responsible to Great Britain for anything found there unless the obligation has been reproduced and reenacted in the treaty of 1901.

I look only to the treaty of 1901. I am quite willing to examine into the history of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty for the purpose of understanding the exact situation of our State Department and of Great Britain at that time. I am quite willing to look into the history of our country for the purpose of trying to understand better the spirit that then prevailed and what the two nations really desired to accomplish; but after all, when we have examined the history, when we have become thoroughly familiar with the spirit of 1850, it is yet true that unless we can find in the treaty of 1901 some promise that we will treat all the ships of the world, including our own, upon terms of equality, then the argument falls to the ground.

I ask the attention of the Senate for an examination of this treaty and to my reasons for believing that it does not embrace any such promise.

My proposition is that the Government of the United States undertook the enterprise, and the rules that would have been applicable to it if it had been carried forward by private enterprise are not applicable or appropriate now, because there are certain qualities in sovereignty that ought not to be surrendered, and only the clearest terms will warrant the construction that surrenders them.

I understand, Mr. President, that an order has been made with regard to a recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will kindly suspend. In accordance with previous action, the hour of 6 o'clock having arrived, the Senate stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., on the expiration of the recess.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Clark, Wyo.	Lippitt	Pomerene
Bacon	Crane	Lodge	Reed
Bailey	Crawford	McCumber	Root
Borah	Cullom	Martin, Va.	Sanders
Bourne	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	Dillingham	Massey	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Fall	Nelson	Smoot
Bristow	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Stone
Burnham	Gallinger	Oliver	Thornton
Burton	Gronna	Overman	Townsend
Catron	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Jones	Penrose	Williams
Clapp	Kenyon	Perkins	Works

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 52 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the recess I had called attention to the chief purpose of the treaty of 1850. Around that purpose all the obligations of that agreement are found. I do not want to be understood as saying—although it may be that in the effort to be brief I did say—that the protection to the enterprises about to be carried forward or that were believed to be imminent was the sole purpose of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The protection that was given by the two Governments was accompanied, of course, with agreements respecting the use of the proposed canal and the use of the proposed railway.

When we came, in 1901, to consider the subject again the whole situation had changed. The enterprise that was in view in 1850 had never been carried forward, so far as the canal was concerned. It was discovered that in all probability there never would be a canal unless undertaken by some governmental power. The French company had intervened at Panama and had gone into miserable failure and bankruptcy. When therefore the respective departments of the two Governments took up the subject again it was konwn that unless the Government of the United States undertook to build a canal across the Isthmus it would in all probability never be built, and the whole negotiation had that in view.

I agree that it was supposed that the canal would be built upon the Nicaragua route, but I deny that the possibility of building the canal upon the Panama route was not present in the minds of a great many people, and it is perfectly manifest from the treaty itself that it was not absent from the minds of the men who composed the agreement now under consideration. The possibility that the United States might acquire the French company and become the possessor of all the work that it had done, all the machinery that it had accumulated, and all the concessions that had been granted to it, was perfectly well understood by those who at that time were interested in the project.

But the chief thing that I want the Senate to bear in mind is that it was then known that whether the canal was built over the Nicaragua route or over the Panama route it was the Government of the United States that would build it, either directly or indirectly. It was, I think, the uppermost thought in the minds of the men who represented the United States that the Government would build this canal as a sovereign, and not merely furnish the aid to some private enterprise that might build it. It was known that if the United States undertook the task there would be certain attributes of sovereignty connected with it from which it was utterly impossible for this country to divest itself.

Now, all these things were present in the minds of the negotiators of this treaty. Bearing these things in memory, I want to call the attention of the Senate to certain phases of the agreement then made. First, remember that the word "Nicaragua" is not in the treaty. The word "Panama" is not in the treaty. After referring to the convention of 1850, commonly called the great Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it says:

> And to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal—

Now, the canal is a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, without any definition or restriction as to place—

> To the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing "the general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

It is of interest, then, to inquire what was the general principle of neutrality recognized and established in the convention of 1850, because I agree that it was in the minds of the representatives of both Governments to preserve the general principle of neutralization.

I affirm that the matter of tolls and charges has nothing whatsoever to do with the general principle of neutralization. The principle of neutralization here referred to was that the canal, which was about to be built by the Government of the United States, should be free and open to the commerce of the world, both in peace and in war. There is no other principle of neutralization that can possibly be applied to a subject of this sort; and we undertook when we affirmed that principle that both in peace and in war this canal should be open to the commerce of the whole world, and we agreed to nothing more. That is the sum and substance of the agreement which we made with Great Britain when we revoked by express terms the treaty of 1850.

I have great respect for the opinion of that distinguished statesman whose report was read by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] this afternoon, but if it is to be inferred from that report that any obligation contained in the old treaty continued after the new treaty was made, and which was not renewed in the treaty of 1901, then I must dissent from his construction of the transaction. The treaty which now binds the United States expressly says:

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th of April, 1850.

If this convention superseded the old one it is impossible to conceive how any part of the old one remains in force unless it is repeated in the new one. It is a contradiction in terms, and without a close examination of the report to which the Senator from North Dakota referred I am bound to conclude that it does not bear the interpretation which that distinguished Senator put upon it.

Now, let us see what we agreed to do. First, we agreed to set aside or supersede the old treaty with this one. Second—

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] asked this afternoon what interpretation or effect should be given to the phrase "subject to the provisions of the present treaty." It is not difficult to answer that question. There are agreements on the part of the United States in this treaty, and the absolute sovereignty and control and management of the canal are subject to the limitations of these agreements.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say—

Remember that we are dealing with a work undertaken by the Government of the United States. It can not be true that there was absent from the minds of the men who made this the possibility that the United States would not only construct the canal, but would become the owner of the territory through which it was constructed. That was one of the things that the United States might do when it undertook the construction of the canal. I do not know how clearly that was recognized, but I do know that the makers of this agreement must have anticipated that it was within the bounds of possibility or probability that before the United States entered upon this work it would acquire the sovereignty of the territory through which the canal was to be constructed.

It declares that—

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

I venture to say that this agreement may be stated in this way: That the canal shall be open to commerce in both peace and war, and that the charges which we place upon commerce for the use of the canal shall be just and equitable. That is the agreement of the United States; it is the only agreement that has been made by the United States; and so long as we keep the canal open for the use of the world and so long as we charge the world no more than fair and just and equitable tolls, so long we shall have complied to the uttermost with our obligations.

I pause to say here that I am not one of those who believe that if we were to disagree with other nations of the world as to whether the tolls were equitable or fair, it would present a controversy that would be settled by arbitration. I deny the whole scheme of arbitration so far as this subject is concerned.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa this question: Does he not think that the fairness, justness, or equitableness of a charge depends very largely upon whether or not we have granted to ourselves a lesser charge?

Mr. CUMMINS. It may, but of that the United States is the sole judge. It is utterly impossible——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Iowa to say a moment ago that he confessed that if a question arose as to whether a charge was just, fair, or equitable that would become a question to be considered by and to be referred to arbitration.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, I said——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that be true, why is not the justice, the fairness, or the equitableness of a charge arising out of a discrimination in favor, I said a moment ago, of ourselves, but I meant to say in favor of our own citizens, a question of which we are not the sole judge. The Senator from Iowa has just admitted that this treaty binds us to make fair, just, and equitable charges, and he must admit that if it does bind us to do that, we can not be the sole judges as to whether or not we have kept our contract.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If we can not be the sole judges of whether we have kept our contract or not with regard to whether the charges are just and fair and equitable for other reasons, then how can we be the sole judges when the question is as to whether the charge is unjust, unfair, or unreasonable grows out of a discrimination made in favor of our own shipping?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I said that our agreement with the world was that we would make fair and equitable charges for the use of the canal, and that if a controversy arose with respect to that question it ought not to be referred to arbitration; and I was about to say why. At the bottom of all judicial procedure, as the underlying principle of all judicial procedure, we insist upon an impartial tribunal, a tribunal that is not interested in the outcome of the controversy. If we call a jury and we find that any member of the jury is interested in the result of the trial, he is at once challenged; if a case comes before a judge who is found to be interested in the suit, he is at once disqualified from performing his function. Therefore any international controversy in which necessarily the representative of every nation on the face of the earth is interested against one of the parties to the controversy can not be submitted to arbitration. I do not say that there could not be men gathered together from the nations of the world who could so far divest themselves of their national interest and their national prejudice as to do justice; I do not say that a judge who would be pecuniarily benefited by a certain result in a lawsuit might not so rid himself of that interest as to be an impartial judge; but I do say that according to the civilization of mankind, we do not and we will not submit our controversies to tribunals of that character.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I now understand the Senator from Iowa correctly, he would base his refusal to keep a solemn pledge in a solemn treaty—not the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but another one which binds us to submit to arbitration questions of the interpretation of treaties—he would base his refusal to comply with that sacred international obligation upon the ground that the interests upon the other side would be too strong for us with the court. He says that the world is interested against us. If that be true, then it must follow that we are interested against the world as well. Then, he would arbitrarily make us the judge in our own case, in behalf of our own interest, against the interest of all the other countries of the world, as he himself confesses. In other words, if I understand the Senator, if he and I make an agreement whereby I bind myself to sell him a horse at a time in the future at a reasonable price, and when the time comes I fix a price which he says is not reasonable, he denies that we ought to proceed to any tribunal because he undertakes to say that the tribunal would not be fair. Now, I want to ask the Senator whether he would submit to arbitration the question as to whether or not the tribunal was fair?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think I have made myself clearly understood. I would surely, if I were disagreeing with my neighbor about the price of a horse, refuse to submit the question to his arbitrament. I think under those circumstances there might be gathered a tribunal——

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to proceed, if the Senator will allow me. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. I would hope that there could be gathered together a tribunal which would have no interest in either myself or my adversary in the contract.

There are a great many questions which nations will not submit to arbitration, and I think that this is one of them. We must do justice; but if we refuse to do justice according to the judgment of the world, and that judgment is so well founded and of so great importance that the other nations of the world will not yield, then there is but one tribunal to settle it, and to that tribunal I hope there may never be another appeal; but it is the tribunal to which some questions must finally be referred.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon just one more interruption? I want to see if I understand him.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad to answer any question; but I hope the Senator, who will undoubtedly make an argument in the matter, will not make it in the midst of mine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will attempt not to make an argument. I want to ask the Senator a question to see if I understand him. I understand his last veiled allusion was to the arbitrament of war. Do I understand the Senator to take the position that, when we come to the question of the interpretation of this treaty, the only arbitral tribunal that he recognizes to decide this international dispute in a question arising under a treaty between ourselves and Great Britain, to which the other nations of Europe are not parties, would be the tribunal of war?

Mr. CUMMINS. In a sense; yes. I would hope that the tribunal of negotiation and of good sense might prevent any appeal beyond the will of the parties immediately interested. I see no other result. We have undertaken to do something in which the whole world is interested against us. Every nation that has a ship that will pass through this canal is interested in securing the lowest possible charge for the passage; and if the United States prescribes the tolls and an appeal is made from the United States to a tribunal made up from all the nations in the world, then the representatives of all those nations will come into the examination of the controversy with an interest and a prejudice that will incline them to decide it against the United States. The difficulty inheres in the very subject itself. There are not many treaties that contain obligations on the one side of which can be grouped all the world aside from the nation which undertakes the obligation; but this is unhappily one of them, and I see no escape from the conclusion I have suggested.

But I pass now to the further examination of what this contract means. What did we agree to do? There are two rules of interpretation that I am sure every Senator will approve, and I name them: First, we must give effect to each part, some effect at least, so that each part will be in reasonable harmony with every other part; and, second, the construction ought to be one that will permit its observance with the preservation of national honor. It is incredible to me that we will put an interpretation upon this agreement—as I think, a strained and unnatural interpretation—which every man with the least patriotic sense and with the least pride in his heart for the country of which he is a citizen knows the country will not observe.

I do not say that we could not afford to pass all vessel through the canal with the same tolls. We could afford to lose the money without the least suffering or peril upon our part, but the interpretation of this treaty which leads to the conclusion that we can not discriminate in favor of our own shipping, carried into other subjects, would rob this country of its right to protect itself, would rob it of its dignity, and would destroy its honor as a nation among the free nations of the world. We can not say that we are included within these rules or within the phrase "all nations" for one purpose and say that we are not within that phrase for other purposes; and if we now yield to the demand of Great Britain that this legislation, which is based upon a discrimination in favor of our own shipping, is in contravention of the treaty, we will be compelled to yield to her in matters that will involve, or that may involve, the life of the Nation, or we will then be compelled to conclude that we are violating our solemn promises.

I want to call the attention of the Senator to some things that this will do for the people of this country, and to some things that show to my mind conclusively that it was not intended by the men who made the agreement that the same terms and the same conditions should be imposed upon our shipping that may be imposed upon the shipping of foreign powers.

Let us see. Most of these things have been mentioned already, but I want to drive them home now if I can. Everybody admits that we made the same agreement with regard to ships of war that we have made with regard to ships of commerce, and that if we have agreed to charge our ships of commerce the same that we charge other ships of commerce, then we have agreed to charge our ships of war the same that we charge other ships of war.

I know, of course, that everybody will agree that we can not do that, and everybody says that must be eliminated from the compact; but I am inquiring as to the purpose and intent of the people who used this language, and my argument is that because they did provide that there should be the same payment for ships of war and that the conditions should be the same for these instruments of battle as are provided for the ships of commerce, therefore it was not in the minds of the men who made the agreement that we should charge our shipping the same as we charge other shipping.

We all agree, do we not, that it would be legally impossible for the United States to charge for the transmission of our ships of war through this canal? If there is a Senator here who can tell me how it can be done, I will be obliged to him. I say that it is legally impossible for the United States to pay itself for the passage of one of its warships through this canal. It is contrary to the fundamental principles of the law which applies to that subject. A man can not pay himself. A nation can not pay itself. If this Nation were to pay $5,000 for the passage of the Oregon through the canal, to whom would it pay it? It would pay the United States, and that is no payment at all. Therefore is it not entirely clear that those who used this language did not intend that the United States should be among those nations that were to pay the same for their ships of war and ships of commerce?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon one more interruption——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the Senator to defy any Senator to mention a case where the United States could pay itself anything. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that when we were providing for the building of the Panama Canal we undertook to provide that the material coming in for the building should come in duty free; but the Government was required to pay a duty to itself for material coming in.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have so high an opinion of the legal attainments of the Senator from Mississippi that I will not stop to argue that question further. The case which he puts would not be a payment to the United States, no matter what form might be employed. I understand perfectly that when a warship entered this canal its captain could pay the representative of the Government at the canal the sum of money required to pass the warship, and that that money could be transmitted to Washington and put into the Treasury; but what I said was that such a transaction would not constitute a payment for a passage through the canal, and can not constitute a payment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, to that last statement I perfectly agree, and it was with a view of bringing it out that I called attention to this other case.

In other words, the entire argument based upon the idea that the United States Government would have to pay tolls upon its war vessels is an idea based upon a fiction and a shadow, because even if it did pay it, or pretended to pay it, it would merely be taking out of one pocket a certain amount of money and putting it into another pocket, and it would not be a real payment.

So the entire argument made ad absurdum, to show that there could not have been any intention to charge our merchant marine, because otherwise we would have to charge our war vessels, falls to the ground, because both here and in Great Britain they were advised beforehand of the fact that any payment nominally made on our warships could not constitute a real payment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. But, moreover, Mr. President, the absurdity of requiring the captain of a war vessel to pay the tolls into the Treasury of the United States, and the absurdity of calling that a payment, would be duplicated in commerce.

The United States now owns, I believe, eight ships that ply between New York and Colon. The United States is directly engaged in commerce. I know that there intervenes the form of a corporation known as the Panama Railroad & Steamship Co., but that is a mere shadow. It does not touch the substance of the matter.

Suppose that after this canal is finished these 8 ships, with 8 more or 20 more that the United States may buy or build, shall enter the carrying trade between New York and San Francisco or New York and Valparaiso, or New York and any other port on the western shore. There is no reason why it should not be done, and indeed I am wholly in favor of doing it if the opportunity does not attract private enterprise.

We intend to have competition through that canal; and if by any mischance competition by water is destroyed or fails to appear, then the United States will be carrying commerce between our eastern and our western shores. And let me ask whether that is a contingency that was not present in the minds of the men who made this treaty? The other nations of the world are engaged in transportation. The other nations of the world have gone into the business of common carriers. Why should not the United States go into that business? It is the tendency of the times, as was known to every person who had anything to do with the negotiation of this treaty. And yet if that contingency was in the minds of the men who made this treaty, tell me how these ships that belong to the United States and are carrying commerce from one shore to the other can pay the United States for passage through the canal? As I said a moment ago, those who are standing for the interpretation that excludes this power of the Government will recoil from that interpretation when they face the fact that, carried to its logical end, it substantially forbids the United States to enter this trade. And if that be the interpretation, then we have agreed with Great Britain that never will we charter a ship and send that ship for commercial purposes through the Panama Canal.

The conclusion is so absurd—and it is not more absurd than it is dangerous and startling—that the American people will not endure any interpretation of this treaty that will preclude the exercise of their power to send their own ships, both in commerce and for war, through the canal; and they can not send either through the canal if the interpretation insisted upon here is to be the accepted construction of our agreement.

I think we ought to hesitate a long while before we agree that we have surrendered to Great Britain or to the rest of mankind any such power as I have described.

But that is not all. I suppose you all agree with me that as to the citizens of Great Britain, for instance, the United States could not discriminate as between them. Is there anyone here who dissents from that proposition?

The United States could not discriminate between citizens of Great Britain or France or Germany or Italy or any other nation with regard to their traffic through the canal. We have agreed we would not discriminate between their citizens. We have agreed that we would give them all an even opportunity, and we would allow them all to enjoy the same conditions. If this is to bear the construction which has been put upon it, then we have agreed that we will not discriminate among our own citizens with regard to traffic in the canal. If this be true, we can not send our coastwise ships through the canal at one charge and our ships engaged in the foreign trade subject to another charge. We have agreed in this purely domestic matter, a thing over which Great Britain has no more control and over which she ought not to have any more control than she has over the policies of heaven, and yet we have surrendered it to Great Britain, and we have given to the courts of Europe and of Africa and of Asia the right to say what we shall do between our own people as to this shipping.

I can not think that when the full depth of the sea upon which these men who contend for the other interpretation of the treaty is measured that there will be many who will desire to embark upon that sea.

But that is not all. It has been said here more than once that this interpretation not only does not give us equality, but it imposes upon us clear inferiority. There is not a lawyer, there is not a layman here, there is not a man of observation and sense, who will not agree that this subterfuge of paying tolls into the Treasury of the United States and having those tolls, by a law made theretofore, returned at once to the ships that paid them is unworthy of a great Nation like ours. It would be unworthy of an individual. It would be unworthy of anyone who values substance and does not promote form above the reality. We can not, if we have agreed that there shall be no discrimination by any form, in any form, at any time, return these tolls to the ships which paid them.

We could do that if there was no understanding beforehand. If there was no law beforehand for the return of the tolls, then it might not be subject to the criticism I have suggested; but if we pass a law that all American ships passing through the canal shall pay these tolls, and thereafter the Treasurer of the United States shall return to the ship the tolls so paid, we will have violated this treaty, under the interpretation given to it by some of my brother Senators, just as completely and just as certainly as if we were now to pass a law that no tolls at all should be charged; and, besides having violated the treaty, we would have exposed ourselves to the contempt of the whole world for endeavoring to do indirectly a thing that we had not the courage to do directly; and whatever else we may do, let us at least preserve a reputation for doing whatever we do openly, so that all the civilized nations may understand just what we are doing.

But that is not all. England will return to her ships the tolls that we impose, France will, Germany will, and probably all the nations of Europe will, and yet we will be tied by a construction of the treaty which, I think, does as much violence to its language as it does violence to the fundamental rights of American citizens. We can not escape from the situation into which we have been forced by a failure to boldly assume in the beginning that this treaty means what it says, what it must have meant in the minds of those who framed it, on account of the considerations to which I am now calling your attention.

But again, charges are no more required to be equal by this treaty than conditions. The conditions must be the same. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who is to answer me, what he thinks of this case. Suppose the United States should erect docks in the harbor of Cristobal and Balboa, docks in the entrance of this canal for the accommodation of American shipping? He will contend, I assume, that we can erect no dock there that is to afford a facility for an American citizen or an American ship but which must be equally open to a foreign citizen and to a foreign ship. We must not only give to these nations the benefit of all that we have already expended, but we must be willing to give to them the benefit of all the money that we hereafter will expend in order to encourage and stimulate and convenience our own shipping. If there is any difference between conditions and charges I hope that those who follow me will be able to point it out.

Not only so, we have a bill here which imposes a condition upon American ships that is not imposed on foreign ships. I want you to put away your varying opinions with regard to the merits of the proposition; I want you to look at it only to inquire whether it is within our power. This bill proposes that no American ship in the coastwise trade shall pass through the canal if it be controlled by a railway company. I should like to know of my friends upon the other side whether they think that is within the terms of the treaty. Have we violated our engagements with Great Britain when we have imposed upon our own shipping a condition of this character? According to the construction of those who would surrender this power we have violated it. We can not say as to our own shipping that it must be free and independent, unless we say it as to the whole world.

We have no more agreed that charges shall be the same than that conditions shall be the same. I want to know whether there is a Senator here or whether there is a man who loves his country within the borders of the United States who will be willing to accede to the suggestion that we have not the power to impose that condition upon our shipping.

I might pursue this thought indefinitely. I have not suggested these things to Congress in order to escape from any obligation that it has assumed. I for one am willing to bear the burden, whatever it may be, but I am not willing that Great Britain shall say what that burden is. I have mentioned these things in order to convince all of you that when this treaty was being made it is utterly impossible to conceive that our Secretary of State and our President and our other advisers had in mind or could have had in mind that all the charges and all the conditions of trade through the canal should be the same as to foreign and domestic shipping.

I repeat the one thought, and that is that we have engaged with Great Britain and through Great Britain with the whole world that this canal shall be open in war as well as in peace, and that we will not impose upon the trade of the world other conditions or other charges than those which are fair and equitable under all the circumstances which surround trade and commerce.

But I take one step further. The Senator from North Dakota said in a tone of triumph the other day that it was plainly evident from the second paragraph of article 3 that all these obligations had been assumed by the United States, and that it was and is one of the nations included in the phrase so often quoted, and he read, "The canal shall never be blockaded nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it."

I want those Senators who are experienced in the language of diplomacy and especially experienced in the terminology of war to tell me what a blockade is. I may be wrong, but as I understand it the blockade of a port is the intervention of ships of war so stationed that commerce can not enter the port. It is a measure that is adopted by one power against another with which it may be at war.

Tell me if you will whether our distinguished Secretary of State, if he had desired to say that the United States shall keep this canal open for commerce, would have said the United States shall not blockade this canal? It is impossible to conceive of the use of those words, if that be the intent. The United States could not blockade this canal any more than it could blockade one of its own ports of which it was in full possession. The United States is in possession of the Panama Canal; in possession of its 10-mile territory that adjoins it; in possession of its locks; in possession of every facility that makes it usable by the commerce of the world. If the United States desired to arrest the operations of the canal and prevent commerce from passing through the canal it would not blockade the canal. It could, by the turning of a screw, destroy the canal for use in a commercial way or in a warlike way either. Without its will not a single ship could pass through the canal.

Therefore, will you say to me that when John Hay was using the language here employed he intended to say that the United States should never blockade the canal? No; he said the canal should never be blockaded, and it is for us to see that it never shall be blockaded. We have agreed to maintain the canal so that it can be used by all the world, and if any nation shall attempt to prevent the ingress or the egress of vessels through the canal upon peaceful errands it is the solemn obligation of the United States to see that that effort does not succeed and that there shall be no blockade of these waters.

Again, if it was intended by the distinguished Secretary of State that his own country should be one of the nations upon which all these rules are to rest, then we are one of the belligerents mentioned in the other paragraphs of the rule. The third one reads thus:

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Neutralization does not involve the provision which I have just read so far as occupation by the United States is concerned.

I repeat, as I have said often, we have undertaken that these waters shall be open for the commerce of the world. I can easily understand the application of that rule. If Great Britain were at war with France these are then neutral waters. The ships of neither would be allowed to remain longer than the appointed time in or near the canal. Neither of the ships would be permitted to take on other stores than the laws of war permit, and the treaty becomes intelligible and can be executed with honor and for the welfare of all the people.

But suppose that the United States is one of the belligerents; we have a territory there 10 miles wide and a canal through it. We have acquired the one and constructed the other at immense cost, and the sovereignty of the United States is supreme over both. Do you think that any representative of the Government of the United States has ever agreed that under those circumstances a canal so built, with a sovereignty so exercised, that one of our own ships of war, when this Nation is a belligerent, must hasten through this canal, taking no other provision than would be allowed to a foreign ship and leaving it defenseless, if you please, against the belligerent with which we might be at war?

If any Secretary of State ever so dreamed it must have been at a time when he had forgotten all the traditions of the race to which he belonged, and if any Congress ever decides and proclaims that the United States can not use this canal for her ships of war when her life is at stake, that Congress will go down in history under the universal detestation of a liberty-loving land.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us suppose that a Japanese squadron was threatening San Francisco. Is it not inconceivable, as the Senator has suggested, that we would embarrass our ships of war in passing through that canal to defend our own Pacific coast?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is not only inconceivable that we would do it, but it is inconceivable that any representative of our Nation should ever have had it in his mind to agree that we should do it. It is not only an impeachment upon his intelligence, but it is an accusation against his patriotism as well, and therefore I can not believe we will ever give this treaty such an interpretation.

Finally, I desire to read another paragraph of the treaty:

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

This reading simply intensifies the observations I have already made with respect to the canal. Is there an American anywhere who believes that we ever agree in time of war to treat our ships and our men and the means for our safety in the way pointed out in this treaty? The statement of the case is the best argument that I can make upon it.

I hope, of course, that war will never come. I am not saying these things because I believe it is imminent. I am saying them to test the mind of the man who made this agreement for the United States, and I am saying them for the purpose of removing any doubt that may be in the Senate in regard to what was intended by this treaty.

We will do injustice to his memory if we attach to him the imputation of having surrendered to Great Britain or to the world these priceless, these invaluable rights for the maintenance of our dignity and the preservation of our safety. I for one will not believe that he ever intended to commit the American Government to a course so perilous and as I was about to say, so weak and so cowardly.

I desire to fulfill the treaty according to its letter and its spirit as well, and I regret more than I can express that these differences of opinion have entered the minds of Senators. It seems to me that we ought to stand as one man for a construction of this treaty which is not only demanded by its terms but by every consideration of national safety and honor as well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I had not thought to open my mouth upon this question. I shall not now detain the Senate over about four or five minutes by the watch, I hope. I shall not imitate the wondrous waste of wind power which has thus far characterized this debate.

I shall vote for the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States, but I hope not upon the grounds laid down by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in his fourth speech upon the subject. I shall vote for the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States upon the ground laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Olsen against Smith, in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States, that ground being, in short, that as foreign vessels never had any standing in the coastwise trade at all, any provisions with regard to the coastwise trade can not be a discrimination. It is clear to anybody who can read English that, whether this treaty ought to do it or ought not to do it, this treaty does forbid us to make any discrimination. The Senator from Iowa tells us that other powers will make discriminations by granting their vessels rebates equal to their tolls. Whenever they do, that moment we have the right, under the treaty itself, to put ourselves upon a ground of equality with them by making an equal rebate.

I agree with the Senator that if we have no right to make a direct discrimination we have no right to make an indirect discrimination by making rebates; but if other nations do it, as he freely predicts that they will, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] freely predicts that they will, then in order to reinaugurate the equality itself, which is the object of the treaty, we would have the right to do it.

That, however, is not the object of my rising to my feet, Mr. President. I rise to protest against the position taken by the Senator from Iowa, which conflicts absolutely with his own past position, with the position taken by him and me both, when the Bryce-Knox arbitration treaty was before the Senate for consideration, and which flies in the face of a solemn obligation of a solemn contract.

I shall vote to exempt coastwise vessels from these tolls, because I think we have a right to do it. I think the principle laid down by the Supreme Court is a correct principle in municipal and in international law, and I do not share the cynical opinion, expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Iowa, that the other nations of the earth in this controversy between us and Great Britain, constituting through their agencies The Hague tribunal, will be guided solely by selfish, pecuniary interests in considering the point. Upon the contrary, I have every reason to believe that they will be guided by the principle at stake, because their pecuniary interest will not be very large outside of Great Britain herself, and possibly outside of Germany.

The Senator's argument seems to be a Mephistophelean, metaphysical attempt to stand out from under the solemn obligation of a solemn treaty. We have a treaty, not only with Great Britain but with I have forgotten how many other nations today, a solemn treaty, pledging our national faith to submit questions of interpretation of treaties to arbitration.

When the Bryce-Knox arbitration treaty was before the Senate the Senator from Iowa voted with me and with 28 other Senators, constituting only 30 of us, I believe, against the amendment proposing to strike out clause 3 of article 3, thereby voting that in a case where the United States denied the right of arbitration the question itself of the right of arbitration should itself be submitted to arbitration; and in that case possibly, though not probably, to an outside commission. Now he says that, in spite of the solemn words of a solemn treaty entered into by Secretaries of State and by foreign ministers, presumably representing their nations, ratified by two-thirds of this Senate, and meeting the approval of the people of the United States, if, after we have exempted these coastwise vessels from these tolls, the right to exempt them is disputed upon the ground that it is a discrimination, he is not willing to leave it to any arbitration except to the god of battle—to war. He takes the position that the question as to the tolls—miserable dollars and cents—upon a few vessels which we would desire to exempt is a thing so important that he would break the solemn obligations of a solemn treaty and shed the blood of our own citizens and the subjects of a foreign empire rather than submit the question as to whether or not it was a discrimination to arbitration. It is against that provision that I rose to protest.

I stand here, as I shall stand always, I hope, for the principle that the judicial proceedings which have been instituted between man and man under government shall some day become instituted between nation and nation in the entire world. I am willing to arbitrate anything, except the life of the Nation, the independence of the Nation, because self-preservation is the first law of nature with a nation as with an individual. We may afford to differ, I think, as to whether we can, without discrimination and without violation of this treaty, exempt coastwise vessels; and I share the opinion of the Senator from Iowa that we may. I think the principle laid down by the Supreme Court is sound in law and in ethics and would be so held by any self-respecting international tribunal of arbitration; but to serve notice upon the world in advance from the seat of a Senator of the United States that we would go to war, sacrifice our youths, shed men's blood and women's tears, sacrifice our treasure, sacrifice the blood and the treasure of other nations, rather than to submit to arbitration a simple little question about dollars and cents of canal tolls is a position against which I wish to protest.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate except for a very short time. I have already spoken at length on this subject, and I shall only give a bare summary of the arguments made on the former occasion.

If there is any one object for which the Senate should have supreme regard it is the observance of good faith and justice toward all nations. We have become too much a part of a world-wide movement and our relations even with the remotest nations of the earth have become such that we can not afford to pursue any course except to observe our treaties and in all our diplomacy to present an example to the whole world of the observance of good faith and of the most sedulous regard for all our promises.

I still maintain, Mr. President, that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty prohibits discrimination in tolls or discrimination of any kind in favor of our ships in the use of the Panama Canal. To come to any other conclusion, to my mind, is a plain disregard of the express terms of this treaty. The English is clear; the words are definite in prohibiting this proposed exemption of tolls.

Something has been said about an expectation that the canal would be built along the Nicaraguan route. I think even the most cursory reading of the preamble of this treaty will show there is no basis for that contention. Other routes were in mind at the time, although the Nicaraguan route was the one most under consideration. It is clearly stated:

> The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in Article VIII of that convention.

And so forth.

"By whatever route may be considered expedient." That is, by Panama, by Nicaragua, by Darien, by Tehuantepec, or in any other locality. So it is clear that no argument can be based on the idea that but one route was under consideration and that we chose a different route.

Mr. President, I wish again to call attention to the most important clause in question:

> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Two interpretations are placed upon this clause to justify exempting American vessels from tolls. One is that it means "all other nations." Why, Mr. President, if "all other nations" is the meaning intended, what an absurdity it was to ask the United States to join in the treaty. If Great Britain and France and Germany were to be bound by it and the United States not at all, why did our Secretary of State frame this treaty? Why did the Senate solemnly deliberate upon it, amend it, and finally ratify it? Such a construction does violence to the plainest principles of interpretation.

But it is said the phrase, "on terms of entire equality," does not relate to tolls; that it only means equality in a general way; that the ships of France and Great Britain and other countries may all go through alike. Mr. President, that does equal violence to the language used. Let me again read it:

> 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Equality and the absence of discrimination are required in respect of charges of traffic.

Now, I want to speak briefly of an opinion that has been expressed here that we made a bad bargain when we entered into this treaty. Mr. President, it was but an expression of our policy for a hundred years, which was one of absolute neutrality and of entire equality in the use of navigable channels. We had taken the lead among the nations of the earth in insisting that there should be no discrimination, whether channels or canals be within or without the borders of any nation. When other countries claimed special privileges, our Presidents and our Secretaries of State protested. They protested not merely for the benefit of our own commerce, but for the commerce of the world. We have a record on this subject of which I think we may well be proud. We took this position in the case of the Straits of Magellan, the channels around Denmark, and, most of all, in regard to this very proposed isthmian canal; for, beginning in 1826 with instructions from Henry Clay, followed by resolutions of the Senate and House, messages from Presidents, and letters from Secretaries of State, we always insisted upon equality and neutrality. We did not cynically change our ideas and demands when it became evident that not some private company, not the French Panama Canal Co., or some other foreign corporation was to build the canal, but that we were to build it as a nation. We could not have changed without inconsistency.

I am a little surprised that in all this debate no reference has been made by advocates of free tolls to our demand along in 1888 and 1889 to 1891 that Canada should give to us the same access to Canadian canals, the same privileges, the same tolls that were afforded to the subjects of Great Britain residing in Canada, under a treaty in which the words "entire equality" were not used, but simply the word "equality," with the further fact that in the treaty Great Britain merely promised to use the best efforts to secure equality. We insisted upon equal rights; we insisted that the treaty not merely meant equality of tolls, but equality in opportunity in the way of trade. As if we had forgotten what happened 20 years ago, as if we had wiped off the books of our diplomacy the proclamation of President Harrison and the demand of President Cleveland, we say, "True, we then constrained you to yield to our contention that those canals should be equal; that tolls should be the same; that treatment should be absolutely identical; but now we are going to take on an entirely different stand."

Mr. President, that is all I care to say upon that subject, except that Secretary Hay, when this treaty was framed, was fresh, as it were, from a demand for the "open door" in China, when he asked not only Russia but other powers to give us equal access there and equal use of the railways built at Government expense, notwithstanding they had squadrons, fleets, armies, spheres of influence, and landed concessions in those localities while we did not have a shred of territory or any similar ground to stand upon in the claiming that we should have equal treatment.

Mr. President, it has been said here that if we yield this contention it means that we yield the principle for all time. It is said that we must take a stalwart stand against the protest of Great Britain and go right contrary to it. Why, it is fresh in the minds of Senators here that there has been pending a controversy in regard to the duty on print paper. We made a reciprocity agreement with Canada. Sweden and other countries have filed a statement with our Secretary of State to the effect that under the favored-nation clause they are entitled to equal access to our markets for their paper. If we followed this idea, that because Great Britain has filed a protest we must immediately stand against her contention, there could not be any question of revision of the tariff, or lowering the duies on print paper. On that principle we would say, "A protest having been filed, we will immediately restore the highest duties on print paper."

I can not for a minute listen to the idea that we are going to refuse to arbitrate this matter. We can not refuse without national dishonor. We have stood for arbitration. We have claimed that we were in the forefront of nations for the peaceful settlement of disputes, and our record shows that we have participated in more arbitrations than any other nation, both as judges and as parties. How are you going to avoid submitting this matter to arbitration? Let me read from the treaty with Great Britain of 1908 the questions to be submitted to arbitration:

Differences which may arise of a legal nature or relating to the interpretation of treaties—

That is, this case—

existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th of July, 1899, provided, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States.

Is the question whether some of our boats shall pay tolls or not a vital interest? Is it an interest which threatens our very life? Does it threaten our independence? Does it threaten our honor? How, then, without violating a treaty solemnly entered into, can we refuse for one moment to submit this question to arbitration?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Referring to the incident mentioned by the Senator from Ohio a moment ago relating to the admission of print paper to the United States, I ask the Senator this question: Suppose that Norway and Sweden, who claim free admission of print paper to our ports on account of our arrangement with Canada, should insist on arbitration, and should insist that the court of arbitration should be made up of a citizen of Norway and a citizen of Sweden. Does the Senator from Ohio then hold that we ought to submit that question to that court?

Mr. BURTON. I can really see no applicability of the question to the matter pending. The arbitration treaty of 1908 with Great Britain, from which I read, provides for submission to The Hague court. The tribunal is named. There is no possibility whatever that any demand will be made upon us if this is submitted to arbitration to select any packed jury for its determination.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator indicate how the jury could be otherwise than packed? Every nation of the world has the same interest in this matter against the United States that Great Britain has, because the agreement is in behalf of all other nations of the world. The Hague tribunal must be made up of men. Those men must be citizens of some country. How would you get a Hague tribunal composed of men who had any less interest in this controversy than two representatives of Norway and Sweden would have with regard to the controversy as to print paper?

Mr. BURTON. I have several observations to make on that question, Mr. President. In the first place, I think it ill befits us to take it for granted that the judges selected under a convention in which we took a prominent part will be so partial that we can not trust them.

In the next place, we should have considered that question when we entered into this obligation.

Again, we have no reason to believe that there will be any ground for partiality against us, barring, perhaps, two or three nations. The different countries in Europe or in the New World from which the judges would be selected have not such an extreme interest in the matter that their judgment would be liable to be biased.

Still another point. If that is an objection to this court, it is an objection to all. A litigant can hardly take a case before a judge who would not—at least in some indirect way, if you are seeking for phantoms or are seeking some ground of accusation against him—appear to have an interest.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURTON. I take pleasure in yielding to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I simply wanted to ask the Senator from Ohio if, in his opinion, the question asked by the Senator from Iowa did not answer itself, or if it did not answer the argument of the Senator from Iowa? In other words, if we admit that The Hague tribunal would decide against us, then do we not admit that, in the eyes of the nations of the world, if we adopt the Senator's construction of the treaty, we are absolutely wrong, and that the United States would stand solitary and alone?

Mr. BURTON. There is certainly ground for that opinion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I dissent from that view entirely. We know that Great Britain takes the other view. Does that constitute a conclusive argument that we are wrong?

Mr. FALL. Is the Senator addressing that question to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am.

Mr. FALL. The question addressed to the Senator from Ohio by the Senator from Iowa is the subject to which I was referring when he asked if we submitted this proposition to The Hague tribunal did we not know that The Hague tribunal would decide against us because the interests of the other nations of the world would be against us? That was the Senator's question, was it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. FALL. Then I say that suggests to me that in the eyes of the nations of the world, if we adopt the contention of the Senator from Iowa, we are absolutely wrong.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I said at first as to Great Britain, she is a just nation and an intelligent nation. Great Britain has decided this matter and has decided it against us. If we submit it to a representative of France, she has the same interest in it that Great Britain has. That representative would at least begin the inquiry with a prejudice or a bias against us. Now in the whole history of our country we have not submitted to arbitration a question in which all the members of the court held an interest opposed to that of the United States. If we submit to arbitration a question concerning the boundary between Canada and the United States we choose a tribunal the majority of which shall be impartial as to that controversy. I think we ought to insist upon that in any arbitration concerning the construction of this treaty.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have too much confidence in the great students of international law who grace the judicial benches in the old world, or who make a study of these great problems between nations, to think for a moment that we can not select an absolutely fair tribunal.

Mr. President, I confess that I myself would be glad to feel assured that we might exempt our boats from the payment of tolls. But if we pass this bill in the form in which it now appears, if we exempt our shipping from payment, it means that in two or three years, perhaps, there will be a very large payment to be made for tolls collected from the ships of other nations, and in the meantime a great degree of friction will be aroused. It will be claimed that we have acted unfairly. Other nations will question our observance of these treaties, and in many ways we shall involve ourselves in difficulties and controversies which are not consistent with our honor as a nation and which will not promote respect.

We can readily solve this problem. Let us begin by imposing tolls. Then if we desire to make exemptions we can do so when our right to exempt is ascertained, or we can pay subsidies if we choose. I utterly disagree with the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] that this is a decision for all time. We should, however, begin on certain ground. Then if we desire to have this question settled deliberately by the tribunal to which it must go, we can proceed to send it there. Again, the argument has been made that we have absolute jurisdiction over the Canal Zone; that it is ours; that we can do whatever we please there.

Mr. President, our title to that strip is not altogether without limitations, based upon treaties both with Colombia and with Panama; and I want to call attention to an article in this very treaty which I do not recall has been read. It is article 4:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Now, suppose those who drew this instrument had contemplated just what has happened, namely, that the United States should obtain a title, and, as a matter of fact we have obtained one, which to my mind comes very near to a fee simple title, how could they have expressed in clearer language the intention that the acquisition of the title was in no way to change the terms of the treaty which had been made, or its obligations? Whether we own that strip or not it seems to me immaterial. It does not make any difference what the nature of our title is, we are bound by this treaty and all its obligations, whatever the nature of the tenure may be.

Now, very briefly I want to touch upon some of the arguments that have been made. It is said that it is inconceivable that we could charge our ships of war, or those merchant vessels which belong to the United States, tolls.

Mr. President, that is a very simple proposition. There is no complication that arises there. If the warship pays the tolls to the collector at Panama for going through the canal it is but taking the money from one fund of the Government and paying it into another. If a Government-owned merchant ship does the same, the same Government which pays the tolls receives it, and it would seem to be no violation of the treaty if, considering the fact that the payor and the payee are the same, the absurd formality of turning over the money were dispensed with. That creates no exception to this treaty.

It is also said that it is inconceivable that in time of war we would not defend ourselves. Mr. President and Senators, there are two conditions that may exist between nations. One is of peace. The other is of war. Agreements that are made in time of peace and contemplating peace are binding forever, unless they are properly revoked. Under all conditions they are absolutely obligatory on the nations which enter into them.

But the misfortune of war comes, and in the midst of arms laws are silent. We make a treaty, in unequivocal language, that the citizens of another country shall have free access to the United States, and shall have the same protection within our borders that our own citizens have; but if war arises we can not tolerate an alien enemy among us, and that provision falls.

The fact that you can bring before the Senate a question based upon a possible condition of war does not in the least modify the natural interpretation of this instrument, because that contemplates an exceptional situation in which treaties, if not abrogated, are suspended.

Mr. President, one of our great naval heroes—Commodore Decatur—appeared at a banquet and said:

> Our country, may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong.

I appreciate the patriotism of the bluff old sailor who had performed so many acts of valor; but as a great principle I do not think we can accept his words. Patriotism does not mean that we should assume an attitude of antagonism against the desires of other countries. It does not mean that we should immediately fly into an attitude of combativeness the moment some country puts another interpretation upon a treaty from that which we hold. It means that when we are sure we are right we should go ahead. It means everlasting loyalty to our country, but that loyalty can never be better displayed than when as between this and other nations we display that same regard for justice and for fairness that we maintain should be observed between individuals.

I have spoken with earnestness upon this subject because I believe we are in danger of wandering away from the high standard of national honor in the observance of treaties which we have always maintained.

Just a few words more. An undue attention has been given, Mr. President, to the diplomatic phase of the situation. I do not think it is fair to the great body of our people that domestic ships going through that canal should be exempt from the payment of tolls. At an expense of approximately $400,000,000 we are constructing that canal. The expense of maintenance will be very large. Is it fair that those boats which enjoy the privilege of going through should not only have the route shortened 8,000 miles, but that they should also be free from paying the tolls, which would not amount to more, perhaps, than 50 or 60 cents per ton on the freight that is carried? Is it fair that those portions of this country which benefit so incalculably from the construction of this canal should, ignoring the enormous expense our country has incurred, say that all counts for naught, and the boats that go through shall not even contribute toward the maintenance of the canal?

I think you will find that the practical results of this will not be satisfactory. The consumer—that class in our community which many claim is so much neglected—will get very little benefit from the exemption from tolls. The price will be fixed by competitive conditions. Those who have ships using the canal will not be altruists. They will charge as high a rate as they can get. This 50 cents per ton will bring little of benefit to the consumers.

The ships will naturally possess a monopoly of trade between the coasts and the regions that are near by, because they can carry freight from the Atlantic or the Gulf to the Pacific so much more cheaply than it can possibly be carried by rail.

Now, benefit beyond measure will be conferred upon the regions contributary to the route made available by this canal, and it does not seem to me that it is just to the American people, to the taxpayer in the interior, that those who have already gained this benefit which is so great should have the still further benefit of exemption from tolls.

Mr. President, there are many other things that I should like to say in this connection, but I realize the weariness of Members at this evening session, and I will conclude my remarks.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. The Senator has made a motion, which is now pending, to strike out that portion of the bill exempting American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. If that motion should prevail I fear it would be accepted, and with good reason, by other Governments as an expression by the American Congress that this Government was without the right to exempt such vessels or any vessels of American registration from the payment of tolls.

As I have said before to the Senate, I am concerned about that question—that is to say, about the right of this Government in the premises, no matter how exercised, no matter whether American vessels charge tolls or are exempt from tolls, but leaving that to be determined as a matter of domestic policy, I am concerned about the right of this Government to do as this Government pleases in a matter of that kind.

Now, if the motion of the Senator should prevail, would it be a proper thing and meet the approval of his judgment to insert a provision to the effect that the right of this Government is preserved without prejudice at some future time to exempt vessels of American registration from the payment of tolls?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, while I would not exactly like that phraseology——

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will pardon me, the idea being merely to assert affirmatively in the bill that that right is not surrendered.

Mr. BURTON. Something to that effect I certainly should have no objection to, Mr. President. There are two questions here before us. One is the right, the other is the expediency of exercising that right if it exists. To my mind the objection on the second score is quite as strong as that on the first, but I should be entirely willing, when the Senate is in Committee of the Whole, to frame some provision which would assert that principle. I think the phraseology first suggested by the Senator from Missouri might sound somewhat like a threat to foreign countries, but to inserting a clean-cut statement in this bill that we do not exempt those boats from tolls because of a decision on the question of our right to do it I should have no objection. Indeed, I would not make any objection to taking the matter to The Hague for a decision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the time of the Senate very briefly on the subject which is now being considered. We have a proposition which comes from the House to exempt coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. We have the proposition which comes from the Senate committee to exempt all American vessels from tolls. The motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], to strike out the House provision, of course means that no vessels are to pass through the canal without paying tolls.

I have no trouble in reaching a conclusion with reference to the committee amendment. To me it is perfectly clear that it should be rejected. I have a good deal more trouble about the House provision, and I shall offer two amendments to it a little later on, and then with doubt I will vote for it.

No one believes in more sacredly observing a treaty made by our country with any other country than I do. If men can only maintain their standing by living up to their words, surely nations can not commend themselves when they disregard their agreements. If honesty is the best policy between men, it is equally not only right but the best policy between nations.

If we broke a treaty with Great Britain with reference to this canal, without going to The Hague, how easily and justly she could punish our commerce. Do not vessels of the United States pass out to the ocean from our Great Lakes through a British canal without tolls by a treaty agreement? I have not had time to refer to the treaty with reference to the canal around Niagara Falls, but I am under the impression that it is under a treaty with Great Britain that our lake commerce passes out in our vessels to the river and to the ocean.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will permit me, only a very small portion of our Lake traffic passes out through the canal. The Welland Canal can accommodate only vessels drawing 14 feet or less, and a very small portion of our Lake traffic goes out that way. It all goes out under a treaty entered into between Canada or Great Britain and the United States, simply affecting those two nations alone, whereby each grants to the other mutual advantages and privileges affecting lakes, locks, and canals, some of which are owned by Canada and some by the United States and some jointly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But our privileges are by treaty, and we would not for a moment have those treaties broken. Our foreign commerce is built up by our treaties in many respects, and policy as well as honesty requires that we should live up to them.

I see no offense in the action of Great Britain in calling our attention to this treaty at this time. It is entirely proper that if objection had been made under this treaty, at least a serious question could have been raised as to the fortifications placed upon the canal. At least, by silence consent was given. As we were about to take action that Great Britain intended to question, it was friendly rather than unfriendly to call the attention of the United States to her views upon this subject. I have no sympathy for the disposition which seeks an opportunity to make the eagle screech whenever our relations with a foreign country are involved.

Under the first paragraph of this treaty this subject has been discussed. It has been contended by some that because vessels of war are classed with vessels of commerce, and because, of course, the United States could not pay for her own vessels of war, therefore the clause does not mean that vessels owned by citizens of the United States passing through the canal shall be required to pay the same tolls as foreign vessels.

If this paragraph 1 was the only paragraph that bore on this subject, there would be a substantial basis for the argument, but when the treaty also refers to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the language there expressly declaring that citizens of the United States owning vessels and citizens of Great Britain owning vessels should pass their vessels through the canal with the same tolls, bringing that paragraph into this treaty to help us find out what it means, there certainly is a serious question involved. In article 2 we find the declaration that the rights of ownership, of construction, belong to the United States, and that clearly preserves to the United States the right as to our own war vessels. But the fact that the way in which these two terms, "vessels of commerce" and "vessels of war," are used, and the fact that vessels of war belonging to the United States are not required to pay tolls, justifies the further thought that where the relation of a vessel involved takes it out of the class of vessels in which British subjects are interested, then we may well contend, as with reference to the vessels of war, that such a vessel was not intended to be covered by section 1 of article 3.

I think we may justly insist, I doubt whether it would be successfully controverted, that so far as our coastwise vessels are concerned this treaty does not apply to them. Indeed, in the communication from the Attorney General embodying the views brought to our attention by Great Britain it is stated that upon that subject with proper regulations it is probable that no question by Great Britain would be made. Now, fortifying that view, one that we can logically deduce from article 3, section 1, and the attitude of Great Britain upon it with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Galveston case, in which they held in effect that language of this kind was not applicable to coastwise vessels, that it was no discrimination under language practically similar to the language found in this treaty to extend privileges to coastwise vessels that were not extended to foreign vessels, we can sustain the provision freeing coastwise vessels from tolls.

That decision squarely sustains the position that the treaty does not apply to coastwise vessels.

I do not express an opinion as to its application to foreign vessels, but if I were engaged in the practice and were about to be employed on one of two sides I would vastly prefer to help the side that it does apply to American vessels engaged in foreign trade. I think, however, we are justified in the conclusion, especially in view of the further fact that nearly every nation handles its coastwise business exclusively in vessels of its own, that this treaty did not mean to apply to coastwise vessels. The language used expresses no discrimination as to nations; it expresses no discrimination as to English vessels or French vessels or German vessels; it simply declares that the coastwise vessels may pass through the canal free. Our statutes, like the laws of most other countries, limit the coastwise trade to American vessels. I think we can safely rely upon this decision and the construction to justify the conclusion that we do not invade the terms of the treaty if we permit coastwise vessels to pass through the canal free. I apprehend that no possible question would be raised upon it, unless it were that the effect under the treaty would be to give coastwise vessels of Canada and British America the same privilege.

The two amendments which I desire to propose are, first, in line 13, page 6, after the word "engaged," to insert the word "exclusively," so that it would read:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Then I would be glad to see the following amendment added, at the close of this paragraph:

Except the actual cost to the Government of the United States of such passage; and the owners of the vessels accepting this privilege shall relieve the Government of the United States from all liability for claims of damages to vessels, their cargoes, their crews or passengers, incident to such passage.

I now offer those two amendments, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will send the amendments to the desk.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The word "exclusively" inserted after the word "engaged" perhaps does not change the present meaning of those lines, but it relieves them of any doubt of construction. It now reads:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

By adding the word "exclusively" we shall have it read:

Engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade.

That is the first amendment I offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the first amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 13, after the word "engaged," it is proposed to insert the word "exclusively," so that if amended it will read:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment just read. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I call for a division.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 32, noes 16.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 6, in line 14, after the words "United States," I propose the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, after the words "United States," in line 14, it is proposed to insert:

Except the actual cost to the Government of the United States of such passage; and the owners of the vessels accepting this privilege shall relieve the Government of the United States from all liability for claims of damages to vessels, their cargoes, their crews or passengers, incident to such passage.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let that amendment be again reported, Mr. President. I did not understand it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now I should like to have the Secretary read the clause as it will stand if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the clause as it would stand if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia should be adopted.

The Secretary read as follows:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade of the United States, except the actual cost to the Government of the United States of such passage; and the owners of the vessels accepting this privilege shall relieve the Government of the United States from all liability for claims of damages to vessels, their cargoes, their crews or passengers, incident to such passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment just read.

Mr. BRISTOW. That amendment would destroy the whole business. It is not free ships, but it is putting upon the coastwise trade an indefinite expense; it might be a dollar a ton, or it might be $2. That is what it means.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it simply lets each vessel as it goes through the canal make no contribution toward the great expense the Government has had in building the canal or for interest on that cost, but barely the cost of the immediate passage.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator from Georgia please state what the cost of "the immediate passage" would be?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly, I can not state that; but it has been estimated that the cost of operating the canal will be three and a half million dollars a year. The actual cost of one particular passage of course would be somewhat proportioned to the amount of business.

Mr. BRISTOW. If there were one vessel it would be three and a half million dollars, and if there were a million vessels it would be three dollars and a half.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not necessarily so. No; I do not think so. I think it would be under proper regulations and proper investigations, and it would be determined how much the actual expense of each passage through the canal would be. Of course there would be not the expense incident to the ordinary maintenance of the canal, but it would be the particular expense of the passage of the vessel through the canal.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator at what time would that expense be ascertained?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. At the time the canal was opened the Government could easily estimate, and by regulation fix, as a result of its investigation, in advance what the cost of transporting a vessel of a certain tonnage through the canal would be.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that would be absolutely impracticable, Mr. President.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, to adopt the proposed amendment of the Senator from Georgia is to work a discrimination against American ships engaged in the coastwise trade. It seems to be generally recognized that all foreign governments will do with respect to the Panama Canal what they are doing at the present time with respect to the Suez Canal. They are defraying the tolls paid by their ships as they go through the Suez Canal, and they will do the same with respect to their ships when they go through the Panama Canal. The result will be that every foreign ship will be reimbursed for every dollar in toll it pays to the United States Government, but American ships engaged in the coastwise trade will be subjected to the indefinite charge embraced in the proposed amendment. If the purpose of the amendment is to work equality among all ships, it fails, because it subjects the American coastwise vessel to an inequality which will not bear on any foreign ship using the canal. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senate, I will strike out the first part of the last amendment and leave simply the portion which requires the vessel going through free to relieve the United States Government from any claim of damage as an incident of going through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. After the word "States," on page 6, line 14, it is proposed to add:

> The owners of vessels accepting this privilege shall relieve the Government of the United States from all liability for claims of damages to vessels, their cargoes, their crews, or passengers incident to such passage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that leaves the same discrimination in a lesser degree to which the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] so aptly called attention. Foreign ships will have their tolls paid by their governments. That is being done to-day, as the Senator suggests, in the case of the Suez Canal, and we have reason to know that it is being discussed now by foreign governments so far as the Panama Canal is concerned. If a foreign ship gets damaged, it will have a claim, while if an American ship gets damaged, the owners will not have any claim.

Mr. BAILEY. That will be because they do not pay anything for using the canal; and if they have free passage they ought not to have a claim for damage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Neither will the foreign ship pay anything.

Mr. BAILEY. The foreign government will pay it back; but still the Government of the United States will collect it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well, Mr. President, it makes a discrimination against the American ship, and I do not believe the Senate of the United States is going to vote for an amendment of that kind. I think we went far enough in the previous amendment, when we discriminated against our 8 or 10 struggling ships in the over-seas trade—and probably not half of that number would ever go through the Panama Canal, because 4 of them are to-day crossing the North Atlantic, and at least 3 of them are in the far-eastern trade, going to Australasia—when we discriminated against those I think we went far enough, and I think we had better now treat with some consideration our coastwise shipping.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the people of the United States have constructed the Panama Canal at an enormous expense. I think at the time it was not contemplated that anyone would ask the enjoyment of the use of the canal free of charge, but a sentiment has grown up in favor of permitting the vessels of the United States to use the canal free of toll. Now, it is asked, if they do use the canal free of toll, they shall not levy upon our Government any charges for injuries which happen by reason of accident. The Senator who has just taken his seat objects that that is unfair to American vessels; that we ought to bear all the enormous expense of building the canal, pay the interest upon the investment and cost of maintenance and operation, let the vessels go through free, and, in addition to that, we ought to assume all the risk. I suggest now that it would be in order for us to pay a premium to vessels in addition to that, and I have no doubt the Senator from New Hampshire would vote for such a provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I would vote for any provision that would give our ships in the foreign trade equal opportunities with those of foreign nations; and that is what the Senator from Missouri would not do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I know the Senator from New Hampshire would vote to give our ships equal opportunity with foreign ships. I have no doubt he would vote to permit our ships to engage in the organization of monopolies and pools, as foreign ships do. I have no doubt he would be willing to tax the people of the United States and turn large portions of the money over to the shipowners of the eastern coast.

I did not expect in any manner to change the views of the Senator from New Hampshire; but I submit that, when this Government furnishes a canal free of charge, it requires considerable temerity to ask it also to assume all the risks of transporting ships through the canal.

So far as the argument is concerned, that we must put our ships on an equality with foreign ships, I have this to say: If the governments of other countries see fit to burden their people with taxation and pay those taxes over to ships that are, according to the best evidence, controlled by great pools and monopolies, fixing exorbitant charges, then that will be for the people of those countries to endure or to escape from as best they may; but, so far as I am concerned, if this Government builds a four hundred million dollar canal and maintains it free of charge to the ships of our country, I do not propose to assist in taxing the people to further benefit those ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no disposition to prolong this discussion, Mr. President. I expected the Senator from Missouri would charge me with being in favor of combinations which put money in the pockets of shipowners. That is the usual language of certain men in public life and of certain newspapers. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that these foreign shipowners, if they are in pools and combinations, are oppressing our people as well as their own people. We are paying foreign ships to-day $300,000,000 a year to transport our goods and our passengers across the ocean, and we are at a disadvantage to such an extent that our over-seas trade is practically blotted from the oceans of the world.

Mr. President, a great deal of discussion has been had as to the manner in which Great Britain manages these affairs. We entered into an agreement with Great Britain, and I think about 30 other nations of the world, that we should have reciprocal conditions on the ocean. To-day we can not restore the ancient and time-honored method of preferential duties, because we have a commercial treaty with 30 nations that forbids the doing of it. Yet the moment we entered into that reciprocal relation with other nations those Governments subsidized their ships and absolutely destroyed the efficacy of that agreement that we had made with them; so that we are to-day in competition with the other nations of the world with ships that get no help from our Government, while the other Governments are paying enormous tribute to their ships, and the result is that we have 8 or 10 ships. This great Nation is represented by only 8 or 10 ships engaged in the over-seas trade to-day, and we are carrying 8 or 9 per cent of our products to foreign countries and 8 or 9 per cent of our passengers.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator attribute the disappearance of the American merchant marine to subsidies paid by foreign governments?

Mr. GALLINGER. Very largely.

Mr. REED. Is it not a fact that our merchant marine disappeared before the custom of paying subsidies had come in vogue to any extent?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. They paid subsidies as far back as 1830. Our merchant marine did disappear, to a very considerable extent, because of the Civil War.

Mr. REED. I am not speaking of an occasional subsidy, but of the general policy. Is it not a fact that our merchant marine had dwindled before the policy of paying subsidies became general?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it goes without saying that if foreign governments pay subsidies to their steamships, and we do not assist our ships at all, and our laws require that to navigate our ships we must expend more money than foreign nations spend in navigating their ships, we can not compete with them. And so, I say, if we are going to have any merchant marine—and I have no apologies to make for the position I take on this subject—if we are going to have any foreign merchant marine, the United States Government must deal with it much more generously than it has done in the past, because we can not compete with Germany or England or Japan or France in a contest where those Governments are behind their merchant marine, giving them all kinds of assistance, while the moment we mention the subject of rendering any assistance to our merchant marine we are subjected to the cry of plundering the people to help shipbuilders and of advocating subsidies that are not in accordance with our principles of government.

Mr. President, at some future time we can perhaps discuss this question more at length. I did not intend to excite the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to make the kind of a retort he made. I think we can discuss this Panama Canal question without acrimony and without charging upon one another purposes that are not entertained by those against whom the charge is made. I have no disposition to plunder the people, to establish monopolies either in shipbuilding or in the sailing of ships; but I have a great interest in trying to do something to rehabilitate the merchant marine of this country, which to-day is in a condition that is an absolute disgrace to the people of the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I meant no more by my statement than to attempt to adopt what I understood to be the language of the Senator. He proposed to put American ships upon an equality with foreign ships, and he followed that by the statement in regard to the subsidies; and I intended to extend it further, to cover the question of pools and combinations which we know exist. I did not intend to charge the Senator with anything more than I understood to be implied by his own words, and I stated it in as forcible a way as I could.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is one thing certain, Mr. President; there is no combination of American ships engaged in the foreign trade, because we have not ships enough to combine; and if combinations exist, as I apprehend they do, and as it has been well proven they do, those combinations are composed of foreign ships and foreign shipowners, to whom we are paying tribute to the extent of $300,000,000 a year to support them.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, I think my colleague [Mr. REED] is somewhat justified in making the protest he has made, because the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—at least those two—and perhaps other Senators, have several times during this debate, with much eloquence and energy, exploited the efforts that they have made for years, without success, to rehabilitate the American merchant marine. I have heard them say they have struggled to do this and that they have almost given up the task in despair, going so far, by one expression or another, as to leave the impression, and perhaps intending to convey the impression, that their colleagues on this side of the Chamber were obstructing the patriotic efforts they were making. I think in the face of that statement, oft repeated in the last few days, something might well be said by way of protest, although I join with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] in saying that this is not an opportune occasion to enter upon that particular discussion. Undoubtedly the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Massachusetts, and other distinguished Senators upon that side, have labored with great assiduity and sincerity and earnestness to revive our drooping merchant marine, and have labored without success; but there are those of us who believe that their failure is not due to any lack of energy, but to the line upon which they were proceeding.

Mr. President, we will never succeed in reviving the American merchant marine by the granting of subsidies out of the Public Treasury. There are so many who believe that, not only upon this side but upon the other side, that I am persuaded legislation of that kind will not be enacted. And if I am mistaken about that, I still adhere to the opinion that the legislation, if enacted, will fail in accomplishing what is desired and expected.

Mr. President, there are at least two things that, more than any other, have brought about this unhappy condition, and those two things still stand in the way of a revival of our lagging and almost moribund maritime conditions. It costs much more under our laws to put a ship afloat under American register and under the American flag than it costs a competitor in Europe, for example, to put a like ship afloat, and it costs more under our industrial and labor conditions to operate our ships than it does to operate like European ships.

I think we should start with a law providing for free ships, at least for over-sea traffic, and work out our problem from that basis. The question of subsidy is a question that must be delayed, if intelligently considered, until in the development of a wise policy we have reached a point where it should be considered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have had no purpose at any time to question the sincerity of any Senator on the other side of the Chamber in any position that has been taken on any bill that I have advocated during my term of service that was intended to do something toward rehabilitating the American merchant marine.

There has been a difference of opinion—I concede there has been an honest difference—but up to the present time no Senator on the other side that I can recall has presented a bill which represented the views of our Democratic friends on that question.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator says that he thinks the problem can be solved by our adopting the free-ship plan.

Mr. STONE. Not alone.

Mr. GALLINGER. That simply means that we purchase our ships abroad; that foreign labor is expended on them; that we take that labor from our American shipyards, if we have any ships to be built here, and that we admit that we are incapable of competing with the nations of the world in this great industry.

I do not think it costs much more to build a ship in an American shipyard to-day than it does in a foreign shipyard. It costs a little more to navigate it—quite a little. There is no question about that. And unless we do assist the shipping interest in some way, of course, we will never be able to make any substantial progress.

The last bill I advocated was not a subsidy bill. It was a bill extending the provisions of the act of 1901 for ocean mail pay to some extent; and we have reason to believe that if that bill had passed we would have had a very great revival of American shipbuilding and ship navigating. But every Democratic Senator voted against it, and some Republicans, and it failed. I did then feel that there was not any use in undertaking at present at least to get any legislation along that line.

Now, I hope that some Democratic Senator—the Senator from Missouri, for instance—will formulate a bill that, in his judgment, will accomplish the result which all of us are desirous of bringing about.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator pleases, a bill has been introduced in the House——

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. STONE. And, I think, favorably reported. I am not sure but that it has been passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it never has been passed.

Mr. STONE. If it has been passed, it is in the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not in this body.

But, Mr. President, as I suggested, and to that the Senator agrees, this is not the time to discuss that subject. My only offense was that I suggested that I thought, in view of the fact that foreign Governments are paying the tolls on their ships through the Suez Canal and they intend to pay them through the Panama Canal—there is no doubt about that—we ought not to place any burden upon our own coastwise ships, even to the extent of forcing them to exempt the Government from responsibility for any loss which such vessels might sustain in being damaged in going through the canal. The damage might be the result of gross negligence on the part of the men operating the canal, and I do not think really that if a ship of our coastwise trade were destroyed through gross negligence the owners of the ship ought to lose that large amount of money, while if a foreign ship were so damaged it could make a demand and be reimbursed. That is the only offense I committed, if it is an offense. It is an honest view that I hold. It may be not the view of the majority of the Senate. I am quite willing to have it submitted to the vote of the Senate, and I shall cheerfully abide by the result, whatever it may be.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the Senator from New Hampshire takes his seat I want to say, by preliminary, that I think the Senator has committed no offense. We have our opposing views, and we have been told from the other side with great frankness, as was said by my colleague not once but many times in the last two days, that we over here are engaged in an attempt to destroy the shipping industry of the United States.

The Senator is entitled to his views, and I say again that all I have sought to do was to turn in a little different form what I had understood to be the expression of his opinion. But I am interested in what the Senator has said about our ability to construct ships practically as cheaply in this country as in foreign countries. If that is true, the question, of course, arises why they are not constructed here.

But the thing that principally interested me was this: A few weeks ago a bill was brought before the Commerce Committee which proposed to authorize a company to purchase a foreign-built ship and register it here. The use to which the ship was to be put was that American goods and American wares of various kinds were to be transported by it to the ports of South America and there displayed. It was an advertising proposition, the gentlemen intending to advertise the various States and their products, and they did not want to do it under a foreign flag.

They therefore asked the privilege of registering this ship. That bill came before the Commerce Committee. When it did come before the Commerce Committee these gentlemen stated they could buy a foreign-built ship for about 60 per cent of the price they would be obliged to pay for an American-built ship. There appeared before the committee a representative of Cramp's shipyards protesting against the passage of the bill, declaring that it was unjust to them to permit the purchase of a foreign-built ship, because foreign-built ships could be constructed with foreign labor cheaper than American ships. There also appeared a representative of the American steamship line plying between this country and Honolulu, who protested that it would be unjust to him, because he or his company had been compelled to buy American ships at a vastly greater price than they would have been obliged to pay for foreign-built ships.

Now, if it be true that American shipyards can construct vessels as cheaply as they are constructed abroad, then the facts were misrepresented to us by this American shipbuilder.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did not mean to say, and I think I did not say, that they could be constructed as cheaply, but approximately so. I will say to the Senator that if we were on equal terms, so far as shipbuilding is concerned—that is, if we could standardize our ships as they standardize them in Germany and in England, building 8 or 10 of the same type at the same time—in my opinion we would build our ships very nearly as cheaply, if not as cheaply, as they are built abroad. But the trouble is that we are to-day not building any ships for the foreign trade. If we have an order it is for one ship, and it costs much more to build one ship than it costs to build 6 or 12 of the same type where they are standardized and every economy is practiced.

I do not think we can build our ships quite as cheaply here now as they can abroad, but I think if we ever get around to rehabilitating our merchant marine so that we will have ships to build in numbers, we will be able to compete with foreign countries in the matter of shipbuilding. That is my individual opinion.

Mr. REED. I desire to send to the desk an amendment which I intend to propose to-morrow. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be printed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I voted for the first amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, which wrote the word "exclusively" in this proposed law and confined free tolls entirely to ships that were exclusively engaged in the coastwise trade. I am opposed to the second amendment which he proposes, to fasten upon such ships an obligation or a condition that is not imposed upon ships that pay tolls.

I am opposed to that for two reasons. One is that if we are to make these ships free we should make them free and not impose conditions upon the ships that are not imposed upon ships that are not engaged in the coastwise trade. The other is that by compelling the ships engaged in the coastwise trade to relieve the Government from any liability for accident or negligence we practically by that course fix the obligation of the Government to respond to damages suffered by ships that pay tolls.

Now, I am not prepared to write in the statute book to-day an obligation that the Government is to assume toward ships that pay toll with reference to accidents or negligence. I am not prepared to say that the Government ought to be responsible in any case; and if we compel ships engaged in the coastwise trade to free the Government from a certain liability, we, by inference, declare that the Government is subject to that liability as to ships that pay tolls. If we are to have legislation upon that matter, the legislation should be very carefully thought out and considered.

My view is that we should either impose tolls or we should not impose them upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade; and that if we conclude to free them from tolls, we should enforce from them no obligation to relieve the Government of certain liabilities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 14, after the words "United States," insert the following:

The owners of the vessels accepting this privilege shall relieve the Government of the United States from all liability for claims of damages to vessels, their cargoes, their crew, or passengers incident to such passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment just read.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to strike out the words as they have been amended by the insertion of the word "exclusively." The Secretary will read the clause which it is proposed to strike out.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. STONE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is that to strike out the word "exclusively," or all the sentence?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is to strike out the entire sentence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not in order before that to offer an amendment to amend the section before the proposition to strike out is considered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That being the case, I offer an amendment left for me to offer by my colleague [Mr. PERCY], a member of the committee. I ask for the reading of it and the consideration of it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "United States," in line 14, page 6, insert:

Vessels owned exclusively by American citizens and not built within the United States shall be entitled to registry and the benefits thereof, and to the protection of and be subject to the navigation laws of the United States as long as such vessels are engaged in the transportation of merchandise and passengers through the canal, and such vessels so engaged in such transportation shall be entitled to engage in the coastwise trade while en route to or from the canal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, just one word to explain the amendment so that it will be clearly understood. It merely provides that vessels owned by American citizens, even though not built in America, shall be entitled to American registration, to the protection of our navigation laws, and to engage in the coastwise trade.

I hope the amendment may receive the approbation of the Senate and may pass.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we have heretofore had it argued that we ought to have free ships in our over-seas trade, but now we are to have free ships in our coastwise trade, if this amendment is adopted. I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But a moment ago the Senator from New Hampshire suggested that if any Senator on this side of the Chamber had any proposition to offer as a result of the enactment of which the American merchant marine would be stimulated and increased and American business carried in American ships could be stimulated and increased he would like to hear from them. Now, then, it has struck my colleague—and his idea meets with my approval at any rate—that we could not adopt any better measure to make the American flag fly over American shipping than by permitting American citizens to buy the ships wherever they could, and let them engage in the coastwise trade, and, as they are entitled to the protection of the navigation laws under this amendment and to American registry, they could also engage in any other trade that they chose and fly the American flag.

There are those of us who want to encourage the American merchant marine, and then there are those of us, speaking of the entire Senate, who do not want to encourage the American merchant marine unless they can enrich by the monopoly of American shipbuilding the shipbuilders of this country. What we want to do is to get an American merchant marine, owned and operated by Americans.

The Senator but a moment ago said that, so far as the building of ships is concerned, the American shipbuilders can build a ship approximately at as low a cost as foreign shipbuilders. Later on he said that in order to make this cost still less a certain degree of standardization would be necessary, and all that. I have no doubt that American shipbuilders have sufficient brains to meet this competition fully as well as they are meeting any competition.

Mr. President, it must not be forgotten that the most highly protected industry in America is the American coastwise trade, and protected with it by the same monopoly is the American shipbuilder, because all foreign competition is excluded from the American coastwise trade, and all ships not built in American shipyards are excluded from the American coastwise trade. You have given to one a monopoly of the navigation, and you have given to the other a monopoly of building the ships floating the American flag. In other words, you are not operating for the benefit of the American merchant marine; you are operating for the benefit of the American shipbuilder. If you really do want more ships flying the American flag and officered by American captains and manned by American sailors, the adoption of this amendment will help you procure that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not uttered a word that could be construed to mean that I think there is any need of enlarging the coastwise shipping of the United States. It is an absolutely protected industry, and our shipyards are abundantly able to manufacture the ships that are required in that trade.

Let this amendment be adopted, Mr. President, and American citizens can go all over the world and buy all the tramp steamers that are for sale, put them under our flag, compete with our American ships, and lessen the industry of shipbuilding in our American shipyards, where they are now producing ships for the coastwise trade.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In that connection I will ask the Senator this question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it be not true that Great Britain admits to her coastwise trade all ships from any country?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is not quite correct. I think to a limited extent she does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think she makes no limitation, provided they merely comply with the regulations of the coastwise trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. But however that may be, I feel very sure, Mr. President, that when we have shipyards in the United States employing labor at a high price, which shipyards are fully equipped to manufacture the ships for our coastwise trade, we do not want to go out into the markets of the world and buy the tramp steamships, all the half-worn-out steamships of England, France, Germany, Sweden, and Norway, and put them in competition with our ships which are built in our own shipyards. I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment is not now in order. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] is a complete amendment by itself, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] starts in after the language proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Ohio, and has nothing to do with it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let us vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not prepared to say that it is not germane, and if the point is made under the rules of the Senate it will have to be submitted to the Senate and not decided by the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it has a tendency of perfecting the language.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The claim I make is that it has nothing to do with the question of tolls, but it is a question of admitting foreign vessels to American registry and comes in at a point in the bill entirely separate from the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi offered it as an amendment to this sentence, and inquired of the Chair before offering it whether an amendment to that particular sentence was in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But it does not amend the sentence. It is a new sentence. It proposes to add after the conclusion of the sentence some other language.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true, but it perfects the preceding language, according to the idea, if it is adopted; and it is my understanding that it is always in order to perfect a concept before you strike it out.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree entirely to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Even if the amendment is to add to it instead of being a change of phraseology within it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think it had anything to do with the concept about tolls. This question of tolls is separate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has a good deal to do with the concept——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has a good deal to do with the concept as to what constitutes coastwise vessels.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws his point of order.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If this amendment should be adopted and then if the amendment of the Senator from Ohio were adopted, would it strike it out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would strike it out also. The whole matter would go out.

Mr. JONES. I would not think so. It is an independent proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is offered as an amendment to the clause. The Chair repeats that as to whether it is a germane amendment is a question which, under the rules, if the point is raised, would have to be submitted to the Senate and is not to be decided by the Chair. That is the rule of the Senate.

The Senator from Connecticut has withdrawn the point of order and, therefore, there is no question for the Chair to decide in regard to that matter. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi to the sentence which it is moved to strike out. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon consultation with some of my colleagues it is thought better not to do it, and to dispatch business I will withdraw the call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The demand for the yeas and nays is withdrawn. The noes have it and the amendment to the amendment is not adopted. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to strike out the sentence which has been amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether at this stage, the yeas and nays having been ordered, that order can by unanimous consent be vacated and that a division instead of the yeas and nays be had upon this question. I will say, if the Chair will permit me, that with a view to expediting the business of the Senate it is thought that perhaps it would be better not to have a yea and nay vote, but that the question be taken by a division.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why not a viva voce vote first?

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent to have the order for the yeas and nays vacated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the order for the yeas and nays be vacated.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I think it very important that we should have the yeas and nays on this amendment, and I must withhold my consent to the request of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York objects. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] as amended. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who is not in the Chamber. I therefore withhold my vote. Were he present I should vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. If he were present he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea." I am compelled to refrain from voting.

Mr. JONES (when Mr. POINDEXTER's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague, if present, would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], but upon this question I have his written statement that if he were present he would vote "nay." As that is the way I desire to vote, I feel at liberty to vote and will do so. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent from the city. As stated by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], he is paired with that Senator. If he were present, the Senator from Michigan would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who is absent from the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer the general pair I have with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce the following pairs: The Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]; the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]; the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON]; and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GARDNER] is necessarily absent, and that if he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have a pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. ASHURST. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber and that he is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—11.

Brandegee	Fall	Nelson	Root
Burton	Gronna	Oliver	Wetmore
Crane	Lodge	Penrose

NAYS—44.

Ashurst	Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bacon	Dillingham	Massey	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Smoot
Bryan	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Stone
Burnham	Jones	Perkins	Swanson
Catron	Kenyon	Pomerene	Thornton
Chamberlain	Kern	Reed	Townsend
Clapp	La Follette	Sanders	Williams
Crawford	Martin, Va.	Shively	Works

NOT VOTING—39.

Bailey	Curtis	Hitchcock	Rayner
Bankhead	Davis	Lea	Richardson
Bradley	Dixon	Lippitt	Smith, Md.
Briggs	du Pont	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Brown	Foster	McLean	Stephenson
Chilton	Gamble	Myers	Sutherland
Clark, Wyo.	Gardner	Owen	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Gore	Paynter	Warren
Culberson	Guggenheim	Percy	Watson
Cullom	Heyburn	Poindexter

So Mr. BURTON'S amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As to the amendment which I offered a moment ago as an amendment to the amendment, I now wish to offer it as an amendment to the text of the bill at the appropriate place. It will be seen from the reading. I think it is on page 6, line 14.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, while that is being looked up, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he expects to press this bill to a conclusion to-night?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, from the progress we have made and in the direction we are going, I have not the slightest idea we will get anywhere near a vote on the bill to-night.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. On that I call for a division.

The motion was agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes 26, noes 24; and (at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 8, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 7, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, that the way is always open for the betterment of life's conditions, but to turn to the right or to the left invites defeat while a straightforward movement toward the things which make for righteousness promises victory for the individual, for the race. Keep us, we beseech Thee, in the straight and narrow way which leads to life everlasting. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I notice from the reading of the Journal that it seems to say that the Speaker sustained the point of order yesterday made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in reference to the right to make a motion to adjourn, without stating what I understood to be the fact, that the Speaker sustained the point on the ground that the motion was dilatory, without passing upon the other question.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly correct.

Mr. MANN. I hope the Journal will be corrected in that regard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have that corrected. The Chair is glad that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] brought the matter up. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] raised two points of order at once, or, although not exactly at once, he did get them both in at one time. The Chair intimated that he was going to sustain the first point of order, and the gentleman from Illinois said the Chair was wrong, whereupon the Chair invited him to produce his authorities, if any he had. But the gentleman from Alabama immediately raised the point of order that it was dilatory, and it was so clearly dilatory that the Chair ruled upon that point without passing upon the other one at all.

Then the Chair examined into the decisions and found this curious state of affairs—that the question had never been raised at all; that is, so far as Hinds' Precedents shows. But there is one decision there that looks as though whoever was in the Chair at the time would have held that the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois was correct. That is as far as the authorities show.

Mr. MANN. Since the Chair has mentioned the subject, will the Chair permit me to say that this matter has been ruled upon several times since I have been a Member of Congress, and since the publication of Hinds' Precedents, and it was held that the motion was in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is glad to have the information. The practice has been that immediately after a quorum develops the Chair simply announces that a quorum has been developed and that the committee will resume its sitting. The philosophy of the thing seems to the Chair to be against the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois, although the Chair is not decided. But the Chair thinks the committee did not rise for the purpose of going back into the House, but it rose under the rule that the Chair thinks compelled the committee to rise. But the Chair will investigate that matter thoroughly before he rules on it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had still further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, and 4, asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. BURNHAM, and Mr. SHIVELY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7012) to permit the construction of a subway and the maintenance of a railroad under the post-office building, at or near Park Place, in the city of New York.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7195) to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Missouri River.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the call rests with the Committee on Patents.

TRANSPORTATION FOR CERTAIN AMERICAN CITIZENS IN MEXICO.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a great emergency exists for the immediate passage of Senate joint resolution 120, as amended by the House Committee on Military Affairs, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to consider what he says is an emergency resolution. The Chair really does not know what is in it.

Mr. MANN. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that it be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 129) to provide transportation for American citizens fleeing from threatened danger in the Republic of Mexico.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to furnish transportation from El Paso, Tex., to such place in the United States as each shall elect, those American citizens fleeing from the Republic of Mexico who are now or who may hereafter be temporarily supplied with shelter and sustenance, in whole or in part, by the Government of the United States in or near El Paso, Tex.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, upon vouchers to be approved by the commander of the United States forces at Fort Bliss, Tex.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the Clerk report the House committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 1 after the enacting clause and substitute the following:

"That until March 1, 1913, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, he is hereby authorized to furnish transportation, which shall not be negotiable or transferable, from places in the United States on or near the Mexican border to other places in the United States, to those American citizens who shall have fled or may hereafter flee from the Republic of Mexico who are now or who may hereafter be unable to pay for their own transportation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution as amended.

Mr. HAYDEN. I desire to offer an amendment to the amended resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following at the end of section 1 as amended:

"That subsistence and clothing shall also be furnished to said persons, in the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] reserves a point of order, and so does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment, perhaps, through an excess of caution. I am aware that an appropriation has already been made for clothing and subsistence for American citizens who have fled from Mexico, but we do not know how long this Mexican revolution will last. Congress is soon to adjourn, and it seems to me that in the meantime, when Congress is not in session and no appropriations can be made, the Secretary of War ought to have ample funds with which to provide subsistence and clothing for the refugees who may hereafter come over from Mexico. For that purpose I offer my amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we provided the other day for subsistence, and the gentleman from Arizona knows—or, at least, he ought to know—that gentlemen on both sides have been working on this Senate joint resolution. Unanimous consent has just been given to consider it. Now the gentleman seeks to introduce another proposition. I do not think it is fair to the House. I make the point of order that it is not germane to a resolution providing for transportation to add one providing for subsistence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. MANN. There is an amendment to it, first.

The SPEAKER. No; the amendment has been agreed to; not this amendment, but the other amendment.

Mr. MANN. I thought this was offered as an amendment to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. No; this amendment of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] simply recited that it should be added to the other amendment. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent Mr. HAYDEN was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

INVESTIGATION OF THE PATENT OFFICE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Committee on Patents was called.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Patents to call up House joint resolution 337, requesting the President to cause an investigation of the Patent Office and make a report with recommendations to Congress.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause the accountants and experts from official and private life now or hereafter employed in the inquiry into methods of transacting the public business of the Government in the several executive departments and other executive Government establishments, to investigate fully and carefully the administration of the Patent Office with a view of determining whether or not the present methods, personnel, equipment, and building of said office are adequate for the performance of its functions, taking into consideration the present character and volume of business, and also such increase in complexity or volume as may reasonably be expected in the future, and to ascertain and recommend specifically to Congress not later than December 10, 1912, what changes in law, what increases in appropriations, and what additional building accommodations may be necessary to enable the Patent Office to discharge its functions in a thoroughly efficient and economical manner, and to what extent any expenditures which may be recommended can be met by increases of Patent Office fees.

All expense incurred in carrying out the purposes of this resolution shall be paid out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, and the sum necessary for said purposes is hereby appropriated: Provided, That the total expense authorized by this resolution shall not exceed the sum of $10,000.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BULKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that that request is not allowed under the rule.

Mr. MANN. To save any question about it, I will object.

The SPEAKER. The rule seems to contemplate some kind of an exception; but bills called up from the Union Calendar shall be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Speaker, pending the going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether we can make an agreement about time for general debate.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is necessary at this time to make an agreement. We can not tell how much time will be required.

Mr. BULKLEY. Is the gentleman willing to limit general debate to half an hour?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should object to that myself.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that we go into committee.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] will take the chair.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Chairman, this resolution is presented with the unanimous favorable report of the Committee on Patents. The reasons for its passage are so fully set out in the report presented by the committee that I hardly think it necessary to go over them in the debate. The resolution is not in any sense a muckraking resolution, and the investigation proposed is not a muckraking investigation. It is heartily approved by the Commissioner of Patents and the Secretary of the Interior. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior indorsing this resolution has been printed as a part of the committee report. The President and the chairman of the Economy and Efficiency Commission have both expressed the opinion that the commission could well devote itself to this study without seriously impairing any other duties which may be before it.

The resolution carries an appropriation of $10,000 to enable the commission to do this work. The detailed estimate of this sum has been set out in the letter from the chairman of the Economy Commission, and is embodied in the report of the committee. I want to be frank, and say that I think this work could be done whether this appropriation is carried in the resolution or not, because the Economy Commission already has $75,000 appropriated for its work; but if no appropriation is carried in this resolution, it will simply mean that the commission will do that much less work on some other subjects which are before it, and it might result in some impairment of the results that that commission would otherwise attain. I believe it is not desirable for the House to place itself in the position of in any way embarrassing the work of that commission or the program that they have laid down. I therefore hope that the appropriation will be agreed to, as well as the balance of the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. What is the main reason for this resolution? What does it purport to do? Has not the Efficiency Commission now full power to investigate the various departments?

Mr. BULKLEY. The commission has power to investigate the executive departments, and would undoubtedly have power to make an investigation of the Patent Office. This resolution calls for a somewhat broader investigation than the commission would otherwise make in this respect. It asks for opinions as to whether the force of the Patent Office is sufficient to do its work, and whether the salaries paid in the Patent Office are sufficient to maintain the proper standard of efficiency among the employees. The Economy Commission informed me that they would not feel authorized under the existing law to go into such questions as that. Their scope would be merely confined to determining whether the force could be cut down in any way, or whether any of the processes could be shortened or done more cheaply. They would not feel authorized to consider the question whether it would be in the interest of the public service to increase salaries or to increase the force.

Another effect of this resolution is that it requires a report with constructive recommendations not later than December 10, and thereby requests the President to cause the commission to devote its attention to the subject at some time between now and December 10; whereas, if we passed no resolution, they might not consider it during that time, and it might be a number of months, or it might be beyond the end of this Congress, before the commission would get to the subject of the Patent Office in the absence of a specific request.

Mr. SABATH. And the committee are of the opinion that there should be an investigation as soon as possible?

Mr. BULKLEY. The committee would like to have a constructive report embodying recommendations as to what is necessary to bring the Patent Office up to date, and would like to have it in hand by the beginning of the short session, in order to base legislation upon it next winter.

Mr. SABATH. Has the committee any special reason for investigating any special department of the Patent Office as to its conduct in the way business is transacted; has it any special reason why this resolution is reported?

Mr. BULKLEY. If the gentleman will read the report of the committee, he will see that in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, as well as in the judgment of the committee, a great many patents are being issued which ought not to be issued. That is to say, patents issue on ideas that are not really patentable. The commissioner believes that the fault is due largely to the inadequate equipment and personnel of the office. He feels that with better salaries and a larger force he could practically eliminate the issuing of patents that ought not to be issued.

Mr. SABATH. So the commissioner himself is in favor of the resolution?

Mr. BULKLEY. Enthusiastically in favor of it.

Mr. SABATH. He admits that he is not able to cope with the situation?

Mr. BULKLEY. He says that the means at hand are not sufficient; that his force and quarters are not adequate to do the work as it should be done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Are the conditions in the Patent Office very bad?

Mr. BULKLEY. I believe they are, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why does not the President himself direct the experts he has had for the last two years, with $175,000, to go into this particular office if the conditions are so bad?

Mr. BULKLEY. I can not speak for the President as to why he has not directed the investigation hitherto, but I will say that I have discussed this matter with the President, and he believes that an investigation would be a desirable thing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why does not he direct it to be made? They have had $175,000, and the sundry civil bill will carry—because there is no dispute over it—$75,000 additional for this year, making $250,000 that the President has had at his disposal to make the investigation in the various offices and executive departments for the purpose of recommending measures that will result in economy. It is a somewhat unusual and anomalous thing for the House to be compelled to request the President to investigate one of the departments of the Government where the conditions are pointed out as so imperatively in need of investigation.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I can not say why the President has not hitherto directed such investigation. But that is no reason we should not have the investigation; on the contrary, all the more reason why we should direct it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Have not the experts made some investigation of the Patent Office?

Mr. BULKLEY. I did not know that they had.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. BULKLEY. I think not, but I do not know positively. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield me a few minutes?

Mr. BULKLEY. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Ten minutes.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

MESSAGE FROM THP SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CULLOP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. JONES, and Mr. OVERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

H. J. Res. 346. Joint resolution to correct an error in an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved June 30, 1912; and

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign Governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene.

INVESTIGATION OF THE PATENT OFFICE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the bill as presented by the Patent Committee is a very important bill, far more so than appears on the face of it. There is a great monopoly or great monopolies that are recognized by the Government of the United States. These monopolies are created under our patent law. They are engines that enable the owners of them to make vast sums of money, and they are often used not only as a means of oppression, but to stop the progressive development of business; and yet I am not here to say that I am opposed to giving to a man who finds a new idea or brings into life a new thought a patent on his new idea or thought. I think the policy of the Government that entitles him to a patent, that offers him the reward of having the exclusive right to make and sell the new invention for 17 years, is in the interest of progress; it is in the interest of development; it puts a premium on brains, and in the end is beneficial to the people.

But I do say that when we have a bureau organized for the express purpose of creating a monopoly, that it is of the utmost importance that we shall have that bureau manned by competent men, and that the work that it does shall be both efficient and effective. Now, I do not think that is the case with the present Patent Office.

It is difficult, in the first place, for a man to get a patent. There is often delay after delay, and when he has got his patent papers, under the present régime, they often amount to nothing. He is compelled to go to the courts to establish his rights after the patent papers have been granted to him.

In the next place, a man can secure a patent for a very small fee. It often involves a great right and a great responsibility. Now, I believe that the Patent Office should be so arranged and the business done in such an efficient manner that when a man makes an invention and secures a patent that, in the first place, it shall be so carefully examined that on the face of it it is going to carry some weight and credit with it and not be a challenge to the courts to determine his rights; in the second place, I believe that only the most competent men should be engaged in that business. I know and you know that the experts that are engaged in the Patent Office, whenever they become most efficient and most valuable to the service, are taken out in private employment.

The Patent Office is not a charge on the Government. It is one of the bureaus in the Government that is self-sustaining. The fees that are collected in the office pay for the running of the bureau. But they do not pay enough to enable salaries to be paid to the examiners to maintain and keep the best expert men to work for the people who desire to obtain a patent. In my judgment, the patent fees that are charged should be increased. The care with which an examination is made should be more than doubled, and sufficient salary paid out of these fees, not out of the Government Treasury, but out of the fees that are paid by men who want to obtain the patents, to get the very best experts there are, so that when a man pays for his patent he will have something that is of value to him in the first instance.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this House can appoint a committee and send it to the Patent Office to examine the details of that office, to reorganize it on a proper business basis, to estimate what are fair fees and fair salaries to be paid, and accomplish the result desired. Up to this time the department itself has never been able to lay the information before Congress on which this Patent Office should be reorganized, and it is running under a system to-day that was maintained when it had a few hundred patents a year, in the early history of the Government. To-day it is a great business office, coming in contact every day with great business institutions of the country, and yet it has not been remodeled along modern business lines.

I have an earnest and sincere respect for Mr. Cleveland, who is the head of the Economy Commission appointed by the President. I believe he is an able man, a conscientious man, and a man that understands business details and the system of modern organization of a business department. This bill as reported from the committee proposes to authorize this Economy Commission to make a thorough, careful, and full investigation of this important bureau that is of so much value to the American people, to determine upon what lines it should be remodeled to bring it up to date, with modern methods, and to determine what salaries should be paid in order that efficient men may be maintained, and what additional fees should be charged for the issuing of patents in order that the burden of this work shall fall upon those who obtain the patents as well as the benefits of them, and not upon the Government. I think that is a good purpose. I think it will work out for the benefit of the people of the United States. It certainly will be of great benefit to Congress when the report is made. Since this bill was introduced I have talked myself with Mr. Cleveland. He tells me that to do the work and to do it efficiently and have his report ready at the next session of Congress, when it should be brought here, it will require the expenditure by him of $10,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why should he not spend that sum out of the money placed at the disposal of the President to do this other work?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, he stated to me that the reason he could not do that was that the appropriation which had already been made of $75,000 would be required to do the work that the President had directed him to do, and more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But some of it should not be done at all, and if the commission had directed its efforts along the lines originally contemplated, for the $250,000 they would have had, they would have done much more efficient work, and work that would have been more beneficial to Congress.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be, but what I am stating is this: I am not interested in that. Possibly they are doing work under the direction of the President that it is not necessary for them to do, but the head of the commission states that to do the work the President has commanded him to do will take the money that Congress has appropriated, and of course he has to obey the orders of the President of the United States and has no discretion about it. This bill seeks to order him to do a new piece of work. It is not common sense that he can do the work without money. He must have clerks, and he must have an organization. I say that this work is too important for the country and for Congress for us to neglect it and let it go, with the chief of this economy board saying that he must obey the orders of the President and do other work with the $75,000 already appropriated, and that he can not do this work because he has not the money. I say that Congress can not afford to put itself in that position and take the chance of the work remaining undone for the sum of $10,000. [Applause.] I believe that Mr. Cleveland is an honest and upright man, a man of ability and capacity, and I believe the $10,000 will be well expended for the benefit of the American people, and will be of great benefit to this Congress to enable it to legislate efficiently on the most important proposition to your constituencies and to mine, and for that reason I shall support the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, with much that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has said I am in thorough accord. Everyone is familiar with the policy of the Government in issuing patents to protect to a limited degree the exclusive right in the inventor to matters which he invents so as to stimulate the inventive genius of the race. That has been the history of nearly every civilized country; but this Patent Office and the information about it is not a myth, nor is it very mysterious. There is sufficient information now before Congress to let it know, at least, one cause of the inefficiency of the bureau. The Commissioner of Patents himself testified this year that between 30 and 40 of the employees of the office, most of them among the highest-priced employees in the office, are so inefficient, or their efficiency has been so impaired, that it very materially interferes with the proper conduct of the office. He says that their efficiency has been impaired to from 25 to 50 per cent and that that number in the office were not up to the required standard. Naturally, any office with such a condition existing can not do the class of work that is required of it.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not interested so much in that phase of the matter. In the first place, I do not believe that appropriations for the maintenance of any office of the Government should be measured at all by the revenue-producing capacity of the office. It is immaterial to me whether the revenue of the Patent Office shows a profit or a deficit. The important thing is to make such appropriations as will enable the office to be properly conducted. It is a mistaken theory that our Government or any branch of it should be conducted in such a manner that it shall be regarded as the conduct of some business establishment, and that the services rendered in the transaction of the public business should be compensated at such rates as will pay for the maintenance of the office. It happens that in the Patent Office, because of the very large number of claims filed, the income of the office is in the neighborhood of some $2,019,388, in 1911, leaving a net surplus of $65,000 over and above the total expenses for maintaining the bureau. I have never thought it made any difference whether the revenue from the Patent Office exceeded or did not reach the amount appropriated. What it is important to do is to appropriate what is necessary to carry on the office efficiently.

When the Commissioner of Patents recommends from time to time, as he does, some additions to his force, then naturally Congress is reluctant to furnish additional employees when the commissioner confesses that he is retaining between 30 and 40 employees whose efficiency is impaired from 25 to 50 per cent. There is no logical reason for such management of such an office and there can be little or no excuse for the maintenance of such a condition in it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. LAFFERTY. What is the cause of the impairment of the efficiency of the clerks, or did the commissioner explain?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Superannuation.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Old age?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To some extent.

Mr. LAFFERTY. But the commissioner was powerless to get rid of these clerks under the present law, was he not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; in fact he is required under the law to remedy the situation but does not; but, Mr. Chairman, that is apart from this resolution——

Mr. BULKLEY. If the gentleman will permit, are not the conditions which the gentleman has just outlined in themselves a very good reason for the investigation of this bureau through some outside source other than by the commissioner himself?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all; the remedy is one that does not need any investigation for this purpose. We have the admission of the head of the office himself, but that is not the objection I have to this particular resolution. I have no objection to a resolution requesting the President to utilize the experts for investigating this particular office, but I have considerable objection to the gentlemen employed by the President under authority given by Congress endeavoring in this way to supplement the appropriations made by Congress for this very purpose. Two years ago, Mr. Chairman, at the suggestion of the President he was given $100,000, for the following purpose:

To enable the President to continue, by the employment of accountants and experts from official and private life, such officials to receive no compensation beyond their official salaries—

That was subsequently put into the law when it was found that the money was being used to supplement the official salaries of some Government employees—to more effectively inquire into the methods of transacting the public business of the Government in the several executive departments and other executive Government establishments, with the view of inaugurating new or changing old methods of transacting such public business so as to attain greater efficiency and economy therein, and to ascertain and recommend to Congress what changes in law may be necessary to carry into effect such results of his inquiry as can not be carried into effect by Executive action alone, and for each and every purpose necessary hereunder, including the employment of personal services at Washington or elsewhere, etc.

For the last fiscal year $75,000, together with the unexpended balance of $100,000, was appropriated. During the present session of Congress these experts, this so-called Commission of Economy and Efficiency, were given three entire days before the Committee on Appropriations to present the statement of their accomplishments. Remarkable as it may seem one of the most important and imperative things the committee had to do was to regulate the organization of the so-called experts so as to prevent a continuation of an indefensibly top-heavy organization.

One commissioner was employed at a compensation of $10,000 a year; one was employed at a compensation of $40 a day, but not to exceed $6,000 in a year, and that was at the rate of $12,000 a year. Three others, if I recall correctly, were paid $6,000 each and the secretary was paid $5,000 or $6,000, so that out of an appropriation available for the last fiscal year of $130,000 to conduct the work they had an organization the executive feature of which alone was costing $40,000 a year. The committee recommending the expenditure for the current fiscal year was compelled to provide that not to exceed three experts employed under this provision should be paid at a rate in excess of $4,000 a year. Mr. Chairman, I can speak with the utmost freedom about these experts, because I think I can safely say that had it not been for my efforts they would not have been continued last year. I not only induced the committee to continue them last year, but I was instrumental in preventing some gentleman interposing a point of order to eliminate them from the bill when it was before the House. I was anxious for these gentlemen to accomplish something that would enable us to economize and reduce our expenditures and eliminate useless offices. Their conduct so far is in striking contrast with what happened in the Treasury Department. For the Treasury Department, covering a period of two or three years, the committee appropriated $160,000 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to investigate and employ experts for the purpose of placing the Treasury Department upon a more efficient basis. Forty thousand dollars of the $160,000 was expended and changes were made in the organization of the department by which a saving of $500,000 annually has been effected. I should like some gentleman to point out any reform that it has been possible for Congress to enact at this session as a result of the expenditure of $175,000 for these so-called experts employed by the departments. I have searched for them, I have hunted for them, I have inquired for them; I do not know of a single one which those gentlemen originated which was of such a practical character that the Congress might afford to incorporate them into the law. There have been some reforms effected. Some of the reforms indorsed by these gentlemen were originated by Congress, many of them, years, 20 years ago, by the Dockery Commission, which continued for two years, and expended $40,000 and recommended and had enacted legislation which resulted in an annual saving of over $600,000 a year. I have not so much faith in the practicability of all of these gentlemen as I have in their integrity and good intentions. It somewhat amazed me and my colleagues on the committee were greatly staggered when we were informed that if it was desired to have this so-called Commission of Economy and Efficiency perform effective and substantial work during this fiscal year, to do that work in the manner in which it should be done for the benefit of Congress, that an appropriation of $500,000 would be necessary.

It would be necessary in a very brief time to appoint a commission to curtail their activities, if we were to permit them to conduct their operations in the manner suggested. After a most careful investigation, after having presented it in the fullest manner possible, after listening patiently to the gentleman who occupies the position of chairman of this committee for three days, commencing at 10 o'clock in the morning and running until 6 every day, without any division of opinion the Committee on Appropriations determined that $75,000, with the limitations placed around it, was all that Congress should place at the disposal of the President for the employment of these persons in the investigation of the various departments of the Government during the present fiscal year. The Senate did not make any change in the recommendation of the House, and that is what will be carried in the law.

The President can direct these experts to investigate the Patent Office, or the Pension Office, or any other office that he desires, or the House can pass this resolution directing the President to have the investigation of the Patent Office made out of the appropriation that is to be made. But I resent the suggestion that Congress has determined to give them insufficient money, and that in order to enable them to do what, perhaps, is the most imperative work to be done by them, it is necessary to give them $10,000 without any limitation whatever upon its expenditure or upon the payment for services to be rendered under it.

I have had some experience with these gentlemen. I believe that they mean well, but I do not admire some of their methods. One of the greatest difficulties that has been experienced has been to keep them off of Congress. They do not apparently have very much respect for Congress. Indeed, they have great contempt for the manner in which we do our business. We are archaic. We are behind the times. We do not know either the character of the information we want nor do we get it, according to the reports of these gentlemen.

They have investigated the budget systems of a number of foreign Governments which are of a character entirely different from that of the Government of the United States. They are suggesting and trying to engraft upon our system of government a budget fashioned after the budget prepared in Great Britain and fitting into a parliamentary system of government. It can not be grafted into our system. We have not the same system of government that Great Britain or France has. The control of this House does not pass or the Government go out of power on the recording of some adverse vote on an important question. Members of the House are not taken to form the Government or administration, and are not made members of the Cabinet to represent the Government in the House and prepare the budget, with the responsibility of having favorable action upon it or of going out of power.

As to the budget theory of Great Britain, Mr. Chairman, whoever has examined the procedure of the House of Commons can readily understand the difference between their proceedings on the bills making grants of money and our proceedings upon our appropriation bills. It is the imperative duty of the speaker of the House of Commons or the chairman of the committee of the whole House of the Commons to declare out of order any proposed amendment to increase a grant for any purpose recommended by the Government, and it is one of the unwritten laws of the land that whenever the Government is defeated in the house upon a request for a grant of money for any purpose, the head of the particular department of the Government under whom the matter comes shall resign from the house.

Just think what would happen in this House if gentlemen in charge of appropriation bills were compelled to resign their seats and appeal to the country every time the House overturned them upon their recommendations for appropriations! Or just think what would happen to the administration, frequently submitting estimates $100,000,000 in excess of the amounts eventually appropriated, if the action of Congress in failing to grant in such a substantial manner the requests of the administration compelled it to appeal to the country! [Laughter and applause.] The difficulty about the proposed budget is that gentlemen who have been proposing to engraft the parliamentary system upon our Government apparently have never comprehended the theory upon which our Government was founded.

It may be that these gentlemen are best fitted and best equipped to make this investigation. If this particular investigation is imperative, and it is believed by the Committee on Patents that they are best fitted to make it, I have no particular objection to their making it. They may perhaps be better employed in investigating that office than in investigating many other offices of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, to illustrate some of the results of their work, there was a controversy not long ago between the Weather Bureau and the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department about the publishing of certain maps. The President appointed as referees, to hear both sides and to determine what should be done, three men who, in my opinion, were the most competent in the entire Government service to be selected for that work—Gen. Crozier, the Chief of Ordnance in the War Department; Mr. Ralph, Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; and Mr. Putnam, the head of the Lighthouse Service. They went into the matter very thoroughly; they had representatives of both sides appear before them; they had them submit written statements; they made certain findings of fact; and they made a report, and it was referred to these experts from official and civil life. The experts disagreed with these three gentlemen. I have read a mass of stuff gathered for the purpose of convincing those interested, that the three men noted in this Government for the efficiency with which the establishments under them are conducted were unable to determine this matter, and that these other gentlemen, not nearly so familiar with the Government, nor understanding the conditions so well, knew much better than they what should be done.

It illustrates many things that have occurred. I do not believe that this House should increase by $10,000 the $75,000 to be placed at the disposal of these gentlemen during this year. I have no objection to the investigation of the Patent Office, and no objection to its being made by these persons; but, after the most thorough investigations, both committees having jurisdiction of the matter in Congress have determined that $75,000 is all that should be expended by them during the current year.

Mr. SABATH. Has the gentleman any information as to how much of this appropriation has been used up by this commission up to the present time?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Which appropriation?

Mr. SABATH. The appropriation that the gentleman speaks of—$75,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has all been used, together with a very large sum for printing, which has been charged to the congressional allotment.

Mr. SABATH. So that if this resolution would not carry this appropriation of $10,000 this commission could not go on with its investigation to-day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They could go on with it now. They are in existence now. They have been carried along by the extension resolutions. There is an appropriation of $75,000 in the sundry civil bill for the current year which they will have.

Is that a most important work? Then it is what was desired when the money was given to the President, to make investigations into places most imperatively needed. If this situation exists, they ought to be compelled to go there and make this investigation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes, I will.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the gentleman, and I think he agrees with me, that of the investigations in all the bureaus of the Government, the one that is needed the most is an investigation of the Patent Office and a reorganization of the Patent Office along business lines.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is probably true.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now the President of the United States has given these men other work to do. The appropriation bills do not direct them to do this work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, the truth of the matter is these gentlemen determine the lines of the investigation, and the President merely signs the orders, so that it is true that he has and that he has not directed this other work to be done.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My understanding is this: I think they do efficient work, but I am not concerned about the other work they do; and I know that a great many people in this country are suffering, that the business of the country is being injured by the lack of a reorganization of this Patent Office; and I know from what I hear from these men that if you do not include this appropriation of $10,000 they are going to do other work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know how to prevent that. There is only one change needed in this resolution, and that is to strike out the word "requested" in line 4, on the first page, and put in the word "directed," and they will do this work, because it will be the only work directed to be done under the law, and some of the other work will have to wait.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that what I am concerned about is not the appropriation itself, but what I am concerned about is having this work done and done at once, and that Congress shall insure its being done. There is no use of our passing this resolution if we are not going either to provide the money or to enforce the work being done. If the resolution is drafted so that we can be assured that this work is going to be done and done at once, I am not concerned further; but I say it is a great work, demanded by the country, and it would be merely picayunish on our part to say that we will not have a reorganization of a great bureau like this that is coming into contact with the business interests of the country every day and costing people hundreds of thousands of dollars a year by reason of the inefficiency of that department, and that we will not spend $10,000 to reorganize it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that is true, but I am interested in this respect: We have these people on our hands. If they can render valuable work commensurate with the expenditure being made for them we desire to know it. Here is what is apparently the greatest opportunity in all the executive departments to demonstrate the capacity and efficiency of these gentlemen employed by the President.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Offer your resolution, and let us get a vote on it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I intend to. In my opinion the thing to do is to compel these men to be utilized in this work within the line that Congress determines. If by next December they have demonstrated their usefulness, if they have shown that they have the capacity and efficiency and practicability in this work that will justify their continuance, Congress will be benefited very materially. But next December, when the President requests a continuation of these gentlemen, there ought to be something to show for their work. In spite of all the reports that have been submitted and in spite of all matters that have been printed—and I have devoted long hours outside of the sessions of the House to going through the reports, as not many gentlemen here have—I do not recall a single thing originating with this commission that has resulted in legislation which has produced any reforms. Perhaps I ought to say this, that upon their suggestion there have been adopted a number of labor-saving devices; but if we have to spend $250,000 in order to have some of these department officials adopt labor-saving devices which should obviously be installed in great governmental establishments, this commission is not what we need. It is a head of the Government who will put competent men in control of the various Government services.

When I have the opportunity, Mr. Chairman, I shall propose two amendments. One is to strike out the appropriation carried in this bill, and the other is to substitute for the word "requested," in line 4, on page 1, the word "directed." Then, if it is believed to be desirable, they can use not only $10,000, but they can use such other part of the $75,000 appropriated to maintain their organization as will be necessary to complete in the most thorough manner possible this investigation which is desired, and it is more important to us that at least one thorough investigation be made by these gentlemen than that they fritter away their efforts in partial investigations that will not result definitely in any way at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have been much interested in the discussion by the gentleman from New York of the general subject of appropriations in connection with the proposed legislation. I have been much interested in what he has said. The gentleman has had a very wide and varied experience in matters of appropriations, and I am glad to give my testimony that, barring the fact that he may be somewhat slightly influenced from time to time—I think that influence is ordinarily not great—by the exigencies of the Democratic political situations, he is ordinarily a very safe man to follow in the matter of appropriations.

I was also very much interested in what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the floor leader of the majority, said with regard to our patent laws. It seems to me highly important that some Member or Members of Congress having knowledge of patent law and the history of patents and experience of patentees should draft some legislation whereby, a patent once obtained, the patentee would be secure in the benefits of his patent without the necessity of protecting himself against endless and expensive suits. If the legislation before us looked to the attainment of that condition, to the curing of the evils to which the gentleman from Alabama referred, I should be much inclined to support it, but it does not seem to me that it would be likely to have any effect at all, directly or remotely, toward the amendment of the patent laws in such a way as to secure the patentee in his proper rights or to secure the public from an unreasonable use of the monopoly a patent grants.

It is proposed to allow the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency to thoroughly investigate the Patent Office, with a view of making recommendations tending to promote the efficiency and economy of the office. It is also proposed that the commission making such an examination shall make recommendations to Congress relative to changes in law, but these recommendations are not contemplated along the line of fundamental changes in patent legislation, but rather in the direction of securing increased efficiency and economy of the operations of the Patent Office.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. LAFFERTY. If the gentleman will look at page 3 of the report, at the letter from Mr. Cleveland, he will find that this investigation will go to the extent of examining all the members of the patent bar of Washington to get their views as to the needed legislation concerning substantive rights of patents.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not read the report; and, as my friend knows, a report, while it has some bearing on legislation, does not affect the character of the legislation. The legislation itself clearly does not contemplate recommendations that would go so far as to embrace propositions of radical changes in the patent laws themselves.

Let me suggest that however efficient this commission may be—and I do not question its efficiency—the commission was not appointed with a view of its knowledge of patent legislation or any other special sort of legislation. It is, I assume, expert as to the manner of transacting public business. Therefore, both by reason of the language of the resolution and in keeping with the character of the commission itself, the report would have to do necessarily with recommendations touching economy and efficiency rather than legislation having to do with the rights of the people on the one hand and the patentee on the other under the patent laws.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did I understand the gentleman from Wyoming to say that he regarded this measure as one which would enable the commission to make recommendations with regard to the basic law of patents?

Mr. MONDELL. My suggestion was that it would not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Following the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as well as I could, I have been wondering whether the right of a man to hold a patent as the result of his ingenuity is to be reported upon by this commission, which is intended apparently to recommend certain clerical changes in the management of the office.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the view of the gentleman from Pennsylvania coincides with mine, that there is nothing in the resolution to authorize the commission to make investigations of such a character that they would be justified in making recommendations of fundamental changes in patent laws; nor, on the other hand, do I understand that they claim to be qualified to wisely advise Congress in such matters.

Mr. BULKLEY. If the gentleman from Wyoming will yield for a brief suggestion——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think one more question will enable the gentleman from Ohio to explain fully. Referring to the measure now before us, the question is as to investigating fully and carefully the administration of the Patent Office. That would seem to be primarily the purpose of the commission, but among its duties narrated on page 2 I find that it is to report, among other things, "what changes in law" are to be made. It is not only the clerical management of the office, not only the economy of operation and the efficiency of the employees, but "what changes in the law" shall be recommended by the commission. Does that mean that the commission is to make recommendations which will materially change the basic law of patents and thus raise the whole question of the right of a man whose brains and ingenuity have brought forth something of value to the public to the enjoyment of his property and interest therein?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entirely correct in his statement that the commission is authorized to report changes of law. But what sort of changes of law? Changes touching possible increases in appropriations and relative to additional buildings and improvements necessary to enable the Patent Office to discharge its functions in a thoroughly efficient and economical manner. There is nothing contemplated there but reports on economy and efficiency. In other words, this Economy and Efficiency Board is, by this resolution, directed to perform its proper functions in connection with the operations of the Patent Office. It is to investigate with the view to increasing the efficiency and economy. Curiously enough, they are also expected to report on what additional appropriations may be necessary.

That leads me to remark that my experience has been, with most of these economy commissions, that they generally end up with some recommendation for changes, with a considerable increase of expense.

Mr. BULKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. BULKLEY. The gentleman's interpretation of the purpose of this investigation is, in my judgment and in the judgment of the committee, entirely correct, and was very well stated. The committee, in fact, made an amendment by inserting a comma after the word "accommodation," line 9, page 2, in order that it should refer only to what might be necessary to the office for the discharge and convenience of business in an economical manner.

In addition to that, I think it might not be inconsistent with economy to explain that a larger sum of money might be economical—that to spend more money and get better results might be an addition to the efficiency and economy. It is not contemplated to add any charge to the Treasury. The intention is to increase the fees sufficiently to meet all expenses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I was led to make the inquiry of the gentleman from Wyoming by the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who referred to the possibility of monopolies growing out of patent rights. Now, that naturally raises the question of the basis upon which patents are issued. The bill permits the commission to recommend changes in the law. I desired to know whether the whole question of patent rights was to be raised?

Mr. BULKLEY. If the gentleman from Wyoming will be good enough to yield further, I will say that I think the gentleman from Alabama meant this, that the issuing of a patent is in itself the creation of a monopoly. In other words, that we have in the Patent Office a factory turning out monopolies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Monopoly by law, however.

Mr. BULKLEY. What he said was that when we are creating monopolies by law we ought to be careful that they should be properly created, and that patents and monopolies should not be allowed to individuals who have not accomplished a real invention.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman the direct question whether it is contemplated by this measure to in any way raise the question of the right to issue patents or any other question affecting the right of patents?

Mr. BULKLEY. No; it certainly is not. All that is meant by this is to improve the quality of the patent, so that when a man has a patent he has something entitled to more respect than he has now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows of course that if he is a specialist in some particular line and writes understandingly on the subject for the information of the public he is protected if he seeks the right by copyright, and that perhaps he ought to be protected in the right to derive whatever benefit is to be derived from the production of his own brain and his own hand. To that extent the law grants him a monopoly. Perhaps it might not be fair that some other who was simply a plagiarist should take advantage of the gentleman's efforts and labor and by reason of the cry of monopoly deprive him of the result of his lifetime effort. I wanted to know of course if we were going to discuss broad questions like that.

Mr. BULKLEY. No such idea as that is contemplated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Or if the commission had any such power or authority.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that I have the same understanding of the joint resolution that its author has. It seems to me it is very clear in its terms, and I was led to make these observations by reason of the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] calling attention to the necessity—and there is a real necessity I am informed, though I am not an expert on that subject—for a revision of the patent laws for the protection of the people on the one hand and the protection of the patentee on the other. I think it is a fair indictment of our patent laws to say that they neither fully protect the honest patentee nor on the other hand do they fully protect the people from extortion under a patent or in connection with a patent, and as the gentleman from Alabama rather conveyed the idea that in some way this investigation might aid in the solution of these problems, I thought I should call the attention of the committee to the fact that such investigation or recommendation is not what is contemplated by this resolution.

This resolution calls upon the Commission on Economy and Efficiency to examine the Patent Office, and make recommendations along the line of efficiency and economy. This Commission on Economy and Efficiency is, I understand, composed of gentlemen who are experts in lines of dispatch and economy in business methods. I am not one of those who are generally overenthusiastic about these Government expert commissions that undertake from time to time to improve the business methods of the departments. I think that in the majority of cases they have cost quite as much as they have saved, and I think in some cases their recommendations, while entirely proper and justified from the standpoint of an expert, are not found to be altogether practical and workable in the Government service.

I find that this resolution, curiously enough, falls into and lends itself to that seeming inevitable tendency of economy commissions to increase expenditures, for it calls upon the commission to recommend, after investigation, changes in the law. What for? Why, for the purpose of suggesting what increased appropriations may be necessary for the economic management of the Patent Office, what additional buildings may be necessary for the more economic administration of the Patent Office, and so on and so forth. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] says that these additional expenditures are not to increase the burdens of Government because the commission is called upon to recommend how these increased expenses in economy of management shall be met, and by whom? By the patentee. Were the patentees in most cases corporations abundantly able to pay the fees, I think there would be no objection to increasing the fees, but we all know that patentees ordinarily, at least those that I have had experience with—the patentees that come from my country and that appeal to me to help them—are almost invariably men of very limited means, to whom an increase in patent fees would constitute a very considerable burden and hardship.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I would like to state to the gentleman, for fear his statement may create a wrong impression, that corporations can not obtain patents. They can not become patentees.

Mr. MONDELL. What I meant was that if the party behind the patentee were a corporation.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Of course they can have them assigned to them.

Mr. MONDELL. In other words, if the individual is wealthy, or if he has the support of a wealthy corporation, and we could segregate that class of cases, it would be a very excellent thing to add to the burden upon the theory that the patent if it is worth anything is worth considerable and that, as it does confer a benefit, it is very proper that the beneficiary should pay something for his privileges.

A really useful patent does not ordinarily lay any burden on the people, because it is so beneficial in its application to the affairs of life that even though the patentee may be protected and receive a very rich reward, in the main it is very useful and helpful to the people at large. It is upon that theory that we grant a patent monopoly. But the patentees with whom I am acquainted are generally men who can not afford to pay increased fees. However, I did not intend to elaborate upon that point. I simply called attention to it to point a moral and adorn a tale, and to call attention to a fact that has been protruding itself upon my attention for the years that I have been here, and that is this, that whenever we get an economy and efficiency organization of experts for the purpose of suggesting consolidations that are supposed to be useful and economical, who are called upon to make suggestions that it is hoped will promote large economies in the public service, my experience is that their recommendations in the majority of cases lead to very considerably increased outlay, a very considerable increase in cost. It is possible that in some cases that was only temporary, and that ultimately there may be a very considerable saving, but in the first instance the changes proposed by these expert commissions generally cost us some money, and that fact seems to be clearly understood by the gentleman who framed this resolution, for he has called upon the commission to make recommendations with regard to increased appropriations. It is true the excuse for doing that is that it is proposed to lay the burden not on the people at large, but on the individual who seeks the patent. This investigation of the Patent Office by the Commission on Economy and Efficiency is something that no one can object to.

The commission was created for the purpose of making just such investigations, and at the proper time the commission came before the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee, after careful consideration of the needs of that branch of the service, made an appropriation, or proposed an appropriation, for the work of the commission which was considered sufficient for its purposes. The commission can begin this investigation at any moment. There is nothing in the resolution that enlarges the present powers of the commission. Without the resolution, the commission may, and I suppose will, in due course of business begin, carry on, and conclude just such an investigation of the Patent Office as is herein proposed, and the commission has a very goodly appropriation for the purpose of doing such work. However, Congress has never at any time made any suggestion to the commission, as is done here, that it make suggestions of increased appropriations or of enlarged buildings and of further expenditures and burdens to be placed on the parties seeking the aid of Government bureaus. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is no real demand for this legislation. It gives no additional power to this commission. It does not enlarge its field of usefulness. The effect of it might be to withdraw the commission from investigations which it is now conducting, which are as yet incomplete, to take up this particular investigation in the immediate future——

Mr. BULKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment—when in the orderly development of the commission's work it might not take up this work of investigation for some little time.

Mr. BULKLEY. I would like to say upon that point that I have the assurance both of the President and the chairman of the Economy Commission that if they get this appropriation they can go ahead with this work without disadvantage to the other work, and if they do not get the appropriation it will to some extent withdraw them from other work.

Mr. MONDELL. Am I to infer from what the gentleman says he seeks an increase in the size of the commission because the individual members of the commission can not be spurred to any increased activities by an increase of the appropriation? If they can carry on the work they are now carrying on and still carry on this work it would require the employment of other experts.

Mr. BULKLEY. The suggestion is that by having more clerical service they can do more work themselves.

Mr. MONDELL. This commission is trying to do good work. I think of all the commissions of the kind we have had this commission has been most practical and least inclined to radical and revolutionary and sudden changes. It has proceeded about its work in an orderly way with enthusiasm, but without hysteria, and has made some very excellent recommendations, some of which have been adopted by Congress, and I think the commission can be trusted to do this work in an orderly way under the regular appropriation. But I particularly object to this direction to take up this particular work with the suggestion that the commission inform Congress not how much we may save, not how much the Government may save by the efficiencies and the economies proposed, but what additional appropriations we shall be called upon to make by reason of the proposed economies. That is rather contradictory in terms to the ordinary individual, but not at all to some members of some economy commissions that I have known—economy which leads to increased expenditure. If it were only temporary, and eventually led to economies running through years, such changes would be wise. I have in mind some changes in Government service, made on the recommendation of efficiency boards, which have very largely disturbed the operations of departments for a considerable number of years.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. LAFFERTY. How would it be possible to get a new building for the Patent Office without an additional appropriation, and does not this bill contemplate housing the Patent Office in a new, safe, fireproof building of modern construction to protect the millions of American patents and records from fire?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think that the Congress of the United States, representing the good people of this Nation from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and containing gentlemen alive to the public service as my friend from Oregon is, is fully competent to decide when the time has arrived when we can afford to and ought to build a fireproof building for the use of the Patent Office without the recommendation of any experts, either before or after careful investigation. I think we are all alive to that situation now. Mr. Chairman, what I have said, however, is rather preliminary to some general observations I have to make. I am particularly interested in this measure, because it shows such a warm approval by the majority of one of the many and far-reaching and beneficial reforms instituted under this administration. I said a moment ago I had not generally been very enthusiastic about efficiency commissions, but I have nothing to complain of in regard to this present commission appointed by President Taft; nothing to criticize and much to commend, and our friends on the Democratic side admit this commission appointed by our wise President is so well qualified to pass upon questions of efficiency and economy that they desire to enlarge its sphere of action and, without any request from them, give them an additional appropriation of $10,000 to allow them to enlarge their work. Mr. Chairman, when the time comes that the history of this administration shall be written, free from all color or bias that the present always gives and lends to current events, one of the splendid accomplishments of this administration will be found to be in the direction of giving increased efficiency and economy to our great Government bureaus.

There are three general lines of causes tending to increase appropriations. There is the natural growth in the country calling for increased, and very properly increased, expenditures in connection with all public activities. Secondly, there is constantly a growing demand, coming from the people themselves, that the Government shall embark in new activities and enterprises, enterprises sometimes paternalistic, sometimes almost socialistic. There is a tendency in that direction, which it is the duty of legislators to guard against constantly, and yet, so far as they serve the best interest of all the people and the activities proposed are within the constitutional powers of the Federal Government, the probability is that under the influence of the people we will continue to increase our appropriations and enlarge their scope.

There is a third source of influence which brings about increases in Federal expenditures, and sometimes we fail to realize how potent it is. In my opinion it is quite as potent as either of the other two causes to which I have referred. That is the influence of the Government bureaus, exerted directly on Congress through requests for appropriations, exerted directly on Members personally, and exerted on Members through their constituents, and through the press of the country and organizations which are interested in enlarging the spheres of activity of Federal bureaus.

Now, I take it for granted that this suggestion of an additional $10,000 did not come from the President's Bureau on Efficiency and Economy, either directly or indirectly. I think those gentlemen would not do a thing of that sort.

From what I know of them, I think they are high-class gentlemen, who would not lend themselves to a movement to increase their appropriations unnecessarily. And yet that is one of the ways in which Federal appropriations and expenditures are constantly and continuously increased by the influence of the bureaus, exerted through a thousand different channels, sending out literature, and meeting and appearing before organizations in our various districts, urging good people in behalf of a seemingly worthy cause to importune Members to aid in the unfolding of constantly enlarging schemes of Federal expenditure.

Never in our history had these and other classes of influences leading to larger expenditures been exercised so forcefully and successfully as they were exercised during the last years of the administration of the predecessor of the present incumbent of the presidential office. During the administration of President Roosevelt our appropriations mounted mightily year after year, so that in the last two years of his administration the annual ordinary expenditures outran the annual ordinary income by $65,000,000, and one of the hard and ungrateful tasks which President Taft found before him was that of checking this tremendous increasing demand for Federal expenditures. How successful he has been has been written in the appropriation bills of the past three years. While prior to the beginning of this administration expenditures mounted at a very rapid rate, during the three complete years of the present administration, with all of the growth of the country, with all of the increasing demand for Federal expenditures, the appropriations have been kept below the appropriations of the last year of President Roosevelt's administration.

Mr. Chairman, it is true that in the last two years the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and his colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations have been entitled to some credit for keeping down the appropriations, and yet I think the gentlemen themselves will admit that in the first instance and in the main the President himself is entitled to the principal credit for keeping down estimates of expenditure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We found to our great misfortune this year that the President so kept down the estimates in the last Congress that the general deficiency bill, that has not yet passed the House, carries $1,800,000 to supply the necessary funds to pay the Army and to pay the bills for the subsistence of the Army during the last year. The estimates were arbitrarily reduced, against the protest of the Paymaster General and the Commissary General of the Army. So that, while the President is entitled to the credit of keeping down the estimates, it is a very different thing from keeping down the expenditures.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reminds me of the fact that if the gentleman from New York has any disturbance of mind over the present deficiency, his condition will be pitiable indeed when the deficiency bill at the end of the present fiscal year comes in, because however the estimates may have been cut down, the gentleman from New York and his colleagues, by their own confession, have further scaled the estimates down to a very scrimpy eight months' basis, and of course, when the eight months roll around and there are four months more in the fiscal year, there must necessarily be very large deficiency estimates to meet not the failure of the departments to recommend adequate appropriations, but the failure of the committee to make the appropriations, or to recommend to the House the appropriations which the departments requested.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course, the gentleman does not wish to make an inaccurate statement.

Mr. MONDELL. No; quite the contrary; and I surely am not making one.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This House has not done anything of the kind. In certain instances for contract river and harbor work and for contract public-building work it has done what has been done for 15 years. Congress, at the long session, appropriates the funds required until the next bill becomes a law. It is not for the purpose of reducing the amounts carried, but for the purpose of controlling in a legitimate way the expenditures to be made.

The gentleman need not be alarmed. If there are any deficiencies to be submitted for this fiscal year, there will be more vacancies as a result than ever before in the history of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say that they do not intend to appropriate for the Army?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We mean to appropriate for the Army for the coming fiscal year as soon as the Senate consents to pass the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The statement of the gentleman from Wyoming in regard to the acton of committees is absolutely correct. The President did order arbitrary reductions in the estimates of appropriations. The estimates so reduced were submitted to the committees of this House, and they, instead of recommending the amounts submitted by the departments, have cut those amounts. Now, what has happened in connection with the Army? There are to-day in every section of the country business men who have not received payment for supplies furnished to the Army in the last 90 days. In the city of San Francisco——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is because the Republican Congress did not make adequate appropriations. I pointed out the fact that the general deficiency bill is carrying $1,800,000 to supply deficiencies occasioned by the inadequate recommendations of the committee of which the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] himself was a member, in reporting appropriations that were insufficient over the protest of the Commissary General and the Paymaster General of the Army.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not mistaken about that, because I had to do with the making of the appropriation to supply the deficiencies and heard the statements of the officers concerned.

Mr. KAHN. The deficiency is due to the increased cost of the ration.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. It is not entirely due to that.

Mr. KAHN. After the estimates of the Commissary General had been submitted to the committee, and the amounts had been allowed, the price of the articles entering into the ration went up. It was an unforeseen condition, and the consequence was that the amount of money that had been appropriated was not sufficient to pay for the food supplies for the soldiers.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield further.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us conclude this by just one statement. I repeat that both the Commissary General of the Army and the Paymaster General of the Army made the statement before the Committee on Appropriations that the estimates for the support of the Army during the last fiscal year, prepared by them, were arbitrarily reduced over their protest, at the direction of the Secretary of War, and as a result a Republican Congress appropriated $1,800,000 too little for pay and subsistence alone, and it was owing to the desire to make a showing of economy that the gentleman's constituents are inconvenienced in not having their pay.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is mistaken. The great deficiency is due to the fact that the cost of the ration increased.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Very slightly to that fact.

Mr. KAHN. Two cents a man for each meal per day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would be very little of the amount.

Mr. MANN. Is not the amount carried in the Army appropriation bill this year less than it was last year?

Mr. KAHN. Very much less.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] said it was too little last year.

Mr. KAHN. And I made the prediction in the committee that next year a much larger deficiency appropriation will be demanded by reason of the very niggardly amount that was allowed by the Democratic Party this year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Next year the cost of living will be reduced, and the cost of the ration will not be so high, under a Democratic administration.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rather regret this interruption, for the reason that I started in to compliment the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. He did not hear my compliment at the beginning of my speech, but as he came within earshot I again threw him a little compliment, and I did not intend to refer again, as I did time and again while the sundry civil bill was under consideration, to the fact that the exigencies of the Democratic campaign were such that they actually appropriated for only eight and nine months instead of for one year. For instance, they were not even appropriating enough to employ charwomen and caretakers on the public buildings we had last year, when we have 100 additional that must be cared for next year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That statement is inaccurate, I will say to the gentleman. He is mistaken in his statement.

Mr. MONDELL. I know it is a painful subject to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken when he makes that statement. I know what I am speaking about. I helped to prepare these items.

Mr. MONDELL. The subject is painful to the gentleman, and I had in a way promised him not to refer to it again.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman did not promise me.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman's excuse was that some Republican committee had sinned somewhat at some time in the same way; and that being true, that it is entirely proper for a Democratic committee to absolve itself from all wrongdoing, no matter how monumental it may be, if a Republican committee at any time ever fell into the same error in the slightest degree.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course the gentleman knows that the appropriations for the construction of public buildings, which were made until the 4th of next March, are not available for the payment of charwomen or other help; and if the gentleman has inadvertently confused the two appropriations——

Mr. MONDELL. I will say "caretakers."

Mr. FITZGERALD. No.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] at the time the appropriation bill was under consideration called attention to the fact that you had not appropriated enough to take care of the public buildings.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was the gentleman's conclusion—that we had not appropriated enough—but if we had appropriated all the money for all the purposes the gentleman from Illinois requested, even a Republican administration would have been compelled to take advantage of the provision of the Payne-Aldrich bill and issue bonds for the payment of the current expenses of the Government. We saved this administration that responsibility at least.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the fact remains, however, that not only has the Appropriations Committee, but other committees, on a considerable number of important items in every bill that has been reported—not on every item, because manifestly that would be impossible—have appropriated for only eight or nine months, and by confession of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] he excused the committee for that action on the ground that there was a fairy tale that he had heard somewhere to the effect that some Republican committee had, to a limited extent, done the same thing at some time in the past. Of course, appropriating for 9 months instead of 12 makes a very excellent showing for the party responsible for appropriations—until after the 5th of November. Then we will come back here and whatever is to happen will have happened, and, however large the deficiencies may be, they can have no retroactive effect upon the November election except as we may call attention to them between now and the ides of November.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said a moment ago, of all the good works of this administration there is none for which it is more entitled to the gratitude of the American people than for keeping down appropriations. I have in mind another reason for gratitude on the part of the American people; gratitude for the fact that we have in the White House a President so high-minded and patriotic that his own personal and political fortunes never enter his mind in connection with the discharge of a public duty. [Applause on the Republican side.] We passed an appropriation this morning by unanimous consent for the transportation of refugees from the Mexican border. For a year or more we have had a condition down there on the border well-nigh intolerable. Our sympathies as individuals go out and our hearts bleed for those of our own people who are subjected to the inevitable hardships, dangers, and suffering that comes from civil war. It would have been easy any time within the past year for the administration to have created a condition on the border such that the entire American people would have arisen en masse, demanding our intervention in Mexico. I am as firmly convinced of it as I am of any fact of which I have knowledge that if we had had a President less wise, less patriotic, or more impetuous than the man who occupies the presidential chair, if we had had a man seeking in the midst of a preliminary presidential campaign opportunity to strength himself with the people, we would to-day be engaged in a bloody and costly war. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We have never changed Presidents in the midst of warfare and ordinarily we never will. One of the temptations that surround a man who occupies the highest office in the gift of the American people, as he approaches the end of his term, is the temptation that might be all-controlling and all-compelling with a man who is not high minded and patriotic, to create a condition which could be easily created whereby public sentiment would demand of us that we should make the declaration that would bring on war with all its horrors and with all its expenditures.

I can imagine a condition under which, with a certain class of men occupying the White House—and let us hope that none such shall ever occupy it—we might now have not only one but two wars—one in Cuba and one in Mexico; for in both places conditions have been such that an ambitious man, a very impetuous man, a man not intentionally led by his own ambition, but a man constrained somewhat by the fact that the American people always sustain the Government in war, might have created a condition under which there would be but one candidate before the American people to-day with any chance of success whatever.

I thank God, and every true American should thank God, that whatever their views may be of the wisdom of the policies of the administration of William Howard Taft in this trying situation, which would ordinarily compel a man of ambition, a man of less loyalty to the American people, to embroil us in a bloody war, that he had led us onward through all the difficulties which have surrounded us in peace and with honor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the House at length. I have listened to the arguments, and it seems to me that the discussion has taken a very broad range. Gentlemen have talked about many things not pertaining to the resolution at all. I want to answer some of the arguments of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] regarding that part of the resolution to which he is opposed, and especially to that part which appropriates $10,000 for the purpose of making the investigation. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a very important matter. I know of no bureau of this Government of more importance to the American people than the Patent Office. The Patent Office was born almost with the Government itself; we have had a Patent Office since 1790. The patent laws have not had a general revision for a great many years, and the Patent Office has not been reorganized, I think, since it came into existence.

There are some important situations confronting the Patent Office, and those situations are very important to the American people. The inventors of this country, as a class, are very important individuals to the American people. In fact, I do not know of any class of citizens in this country who have done more real work for the benefit of the American public than have the inventors. All of the inventors of this country, or those whom we have had before the Committee on Patents, are in favor of this legislation. The inventors of the country want this legislation enacted and want this investigation made.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] wants to strike out the word "requested" and insert the word "directed," and in addition he wants to amend by striking out the appropriation of $10,000. Mr. Chairman, I doubt very seriously whether it would be proper for this House or Congress to "direct" the President to do anything, and especially to do the thing that this resolution calls for. Therefore I think it would be unwise for the House to direct the President to make the investigation.

Now, in regard to the appropriation, it is a well-known fact and the people of the country know that the Patent Office has taken in and turned into the Treasury about $7,000,000 more than it has taken out of the Treasury. In other words, the inventors of this country absolutely pay more into the Treasury of the United States every year than it takes to run the Patent Office. Therefore, in view of the fact that the Patent Office has a surplus, as you might say, during its history of $7,000,000, it seems to me that an appropriation of $10,000 for the purpose of making this investigation is a very small matter indeed.

The gentleman from New York says that the investigation would be made whether the appropriation is made or not. Of course, Mr. Chairman, if I knew that to be true, if I knew that the investigation would be made without the appropriation, certainly I would be very glad to strike it out. But I do not know whether the investigation will be made, for there is a peculiar situation in the Patent Office.

The gentleman also raised the point that the Commissioner of Patents had made the statement that there were 40 or 50 inefficient men working in the Patent Office at the present time. That is true, and the reason for it is this: When a man becomes extremely efficient and an expert in the Patent Office, the great corporations of the country, like the General Electric Co. and the United Shoe Machinery Co., come along and take him out as they want an expert for their company. They want an expert patent lawyer. They want a man who knows the Patent Office from the beginning to the end. They want a man—probably more than one—they want men who have started at the bottom in the Patent Office and have worked themselves up to the commissionership or assistant commissionership. They therefore pay them larger salaries and take out the most efficient men; pay them two or three thousand dollars more a year than the Government pays them, or that the Patent Office can pay them under the present schedule of salaries, and therefore they take the best men away from the Patent Office.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman believe that by any method of legislation we can put a stop to that?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. By what method?

Mr. OLDFIELD. By raising the salaries.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think the Government would ever pay a salary high enough, fixed by statute, so that the corporation which desired the most efficient man would not offer a higher salary?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is exactly right to this extent. They could not get all of the good men, as they do to-day, and they would not do it, because men will work in the Patent Office for the Government for less money than they will for the International Harvester Co. For example, I had a conversation with a man in the Patent Office the other day, probably the most efficient man in the office outside of the Commissioner. He himself tells me that he would prefer working in the Patent Office. He has been there 20 years. He has a family, and there are good schools here and he has his little home, and he would much prefer working in the Patent Office at a salary of, say, $5,000 a year, than to take a salary of $6,500 or $7,000 a year from the General Electric Co., or the International Harvester Co., or the United Shoe Machinery Co., and so on. Of course, it would be impossible to fix the salaries so high that these great corporations would not come along and employ, in a great many instances, the best men; but to a certain extent we could keep these men there.

Mr. MANN. The case the gentleman cites is not an illustration, it seems to me, upon his side of the proposition. The gentleman of whom he speaks has been in the Patent Office for 20 years, and he has not been taken away from the Patent Office.

Mr. OLDFIELD. They are trying to get him right now.

Mr. MANN. Possibly he prefers Government service. Some men do. He has stayed there at his present salary although corporations are willing to pay higher salaries. But take the man who does not prefer the Government service, and who is willing to go where the highest rate is paid, does not the gentleman believe the Government never will be able to compete with the salaries offered by outside people, where the Government necessarily fixes the salary on a statutory basis.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I realize the force of the argument of the gentleman from Illinois and I know to a great extent it is true, but I do believe if the salaries down there were increased probably 50 and even in some cases 100 per cent, as they ought to be increased, it would not cost the people of this Nation, except possibly the inventors, one penny, and the inventors would be glad to see the salary increased so that they could have more efficient service and more efficient examinations and could get a better patent than they do now under the present régime.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, as I interrupted him, I think myself that the salaries in the Patent Office ought to be increased. I have advocated that proposition for years, but not upon the ground usually stated, that the men are taken away from the Patent Office by outside parties, because that will always be the case. Every Government office is more or less a college or school from which we graduate men into private employment at higher compensation.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to argue that question further with the gentleman from Illinois, but I would state this: Under the present law the initial fee in a patent case, when the application is filed, is $15, and the final fee is $20. I am advised, and I have worked on the proposition and investigated it as much as I have been able to and I find it to be true, that if that were reversed it would be a good thing. A great deal more work is done by the Patent Office on the initial fees than on the final fees. Therefore, if the initial fee were $20 and the final fee $15 the Patent Office would take in several hundred thousand dollars more annually than they do under the present arrangement of fees.

If that were increased to $25, instead of $15, there is no doubt in the world but that we could have better salaries and more efficient service and investigations of all kinds in the Patent Office, and when the inventor receives his patent under that sort of condition he would have something which would be worth a great deal more than the present patent which is being issued to-day.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. LAFFERTY. In regard to the men leaving the Patent Office and going into private employment of such concerns as the International Harvester Co. and others, is there any law on the books now which would prevent men from practicing as attorneys before the Patent Office, say, for two years after leaving the Government service?

Mr. OLDFIELD. No; there is no such law on that subject.

Mr. LAFFERTY. As the gentleman from Illinois suggested a while ago, is there any way to prevent a man having inside information leaving the Patent Office and taking it to a new employer or a private corporation? Would not a law such as I suggest prohibiting them from practicing before the department within the period of two years after leaving the service have a tendency to correct that evil?

Mr. OLDFIELD. That probably would; but I do not know that that would be a wise law, because it would be manifestly unfair to say to a man that he could not take employment and get as much out of his employment as he can.

Mr. Chairman, I think this resolution ought to be passed, and I think the appropriation should be made so that various conditions that exist in the Patent Office at this time may have a thorough investigation and that some recommendations may be made to Congress when it meets in December. We find a great deal of trouble in our committee, and I suppose the same is true of all committees in the House, because members of the various committees hesitate quite a good deal to vote favorably for any particular bill unless some person in authority has furnished them adequate information. In my opinion we need this information. I believe it would be worth a great deal to the American people if this resolution could be adopted and recommendations made by some board in authority when Congress meets in December.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have had some business with the Patent Office and the work that they have done for me has always been efficient, but I favor this legislation as I would anything which would increase the efficiency of the department. I understand this is practically a unanimous report from the committee, and I am glad to see it is recommended by the President and also by the Secretary of the Interior. Ease in securing a patent is, I believe, of great advantage to the country, especially to poor men who are unable to employ a lawyer. Last week this matter was brought to my attention. Two miners came to Washington from my district. They made application about a year ago for a patent upon a mining tool, and a question arose as to its interference with an American or foreign patent. It has taken nearly a year of investigation and considerable correspondence, with no result. The two of them came down here to find out if they could not bring the matter to an issue. This is a very useful tool, but they could not afford to undertake its manufacture until they could be assured of some protection for their device.

Upon presenting the case to the Patent Office they immediately offered to do anything they could to help the men. I did not see them after they had made their visit, but I received a letter yesterday in which they stated that they received the best of attention at the department. They then asked further information in connection with the securing of the patent, which the department has promised to attend to at once. But the point I make is this, that if there had been immediate action upon this application or within a short time the inventors would have been enabled either to drop the matter or engage in its manufacture. They were delayed in the use of the fruit of their inventive genius. I consider as one of the greatest assets of this country the inventive genius of its people. I do not favor the suggestion of the committee that there might be a slight increase in Patent Office fees. They should be kept low, and every encouragement and assistance given inventors, especially those who can not afford to employ lawyers.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman will permit, I understood the chairman of the committee to state a few moments ago that he is opposed to the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, namely, changing the word from "requested" to "directed." Now, what reason can the gentleman give in objecting to that amendment? I am inclined to believe that the President now has the right and the power to direct this Efficiency Commission to do this investigation, but he has failed. Now, what assurance have you that if this resolution is reported or passed in this form that he will pay any attention to it and that he will not ignore it, as he has some others where attempts have been made by us to provide a more economical administration not only for the Patent Office but for each and every department.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will state to the gentleman my first objection to striking out the word "requested" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "directed" is that would probably not be the proper way to do this thing. In other words, I do not know whether we would have the authority to direct the President to make this investigation; and if we do not have such authority it would be improper to direct the President to make the investigation. It says that the President be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the accountants, experts, and so forth.

Mr. SABATH. The President has to execute the laws of the land. Now, he has failed, and we have the right to direct him to do so. He has failed to order this commission to investigate departments where investigation was mostly needed.

Mr. OLDFIELD. If we have the right to direct him, I have no objection to directing him, none in the world.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know of any resolution passed in this House during his term of service directing the President to do anything?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I do not recall any, and that is one reason——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is contrary to the custom of the House.

Mr. OLDFIELD. That is my understanding.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And has the House any right to direct the President to do anything?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I have made the statement I do not think so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman one more question, since it has been raised by my friend from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. OLDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the commission have any money with which to make this investigation of the Patent Office?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Well, I will state to the gentleman I am not informed on that point. Now, I will make this further statement, however, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], who is a member of the Committee on Patents, has had this resolution in charge, and as I understand from conversation with him he has talked the matter over with the President and probably the Vice President and others, and also with the members of the Economy Commission, and my understanding is that they say themselves they have no money with which to do this particular work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois made the statement that the President had failed to make this investigation.

Mr. SABATH. That he had failed to request this commission to do it and instructed them to do some other work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, the gentleman will understand that it is not fair to criticize the President for having failed in the performance of his duty when he had neither the money nor the authority to perform that duty.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman had been here, he could have learned of the gentleman from New York that the commission has enough money for this purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then will the gentleman state why it is necessary to bring in a resolution of this kind. If the President has the authority and the money, why is it necessary to pass this resolution?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield to further interrogatories.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will question the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. OLDFIELD. What is the question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The question is this: If the President or the commission is provided with sufficient money to pursue these inquiries, why is it necessary for Congress to pass this resolution?

Mr. OLDFIELD. It is not necessary if it is true, but I do not think it is true.

Mr. BULKLEY. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion? I believe the President has authority to direct this investigation, but inasmuch as he has not done so, if Congress wants to get the information, it seems to me that it is entirely proper to request it. As to the money, $75,000 has been appropriated for the work of the Economy and Efficiency Commission. I know of no reason why they should not be directed to investigate the Patent Office and the expenses paid out of the existing appropriation, if such a course will appeal to the judgment of the President. If the gentleman cares to question the President's judgment as to which course the Economy and Efficiency Commission should take, he can do so, but for my part I do not care to raise the question of whether the President is using good judgment in not directing the commission or not. The fact is that he has not directed the commission to do this particular work, and he assures me that if they get this appropriation of $10,000 for this work that the work can be done without disarranging the other plans he has in mind for the commission. I do not know what those other plans are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is sure, is he, that the $75,000 of original appropriation for the commission will be sufficient to make an investigation of all the departments of the Government——

Mr. BULKLEY. Oh, no——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). Including the Patent Office?

Mr. BULKLEY. Oh, no. The $75,000 is only intended to do such work as can be done within the fiscal year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then evidently the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is incorrect in the statement that the President has failed in the performance of his duty if he had neither the money nor the authority.

Mr. BULKLEY. Well, the President has failed to direct this particular investigation, which he might have done, but I am not disposed to question his judgment. The commission has done other work, and the other work is very important, too. I think the work in the Patent Office is very important, but if the President in his wisdom chooses to direct them to do other work, I do not care to question his action.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. SABATH. I notice that the resolution provides that the commission shall investigate and also report what changes in law should be made. Now, if I am not mistaken, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD] has introduced an excellent bill, changing the patent laws, and the bill is pending now. Can the gentleman inform the House whether there is any chance of that bill being considered and reported? I believe it is an excellent bill and ought to pass.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] that we discussed in the committee the very question which the gentleman asks me; that is, whether or not this commission, if authorized under this resolution to make this report, would report in regard to a general law covering patents, or statutes relating to patents, and we came to the conclusion and prepared the resolution so that whatever changes of law they would recommend would be confined to changes of law regarding the workings and administration of the Patent Office and not the general basic patent laws.

Now, the gentleman refers to the bill about which there has been some discussion. We have had a number of hearings on the bill to which my friend from Illinois refers, to codify the patent statutes. I will say to the gentleman that a substitute for that bill will be reported to the House in a few days, but it is not believed that it will be possible to discuss the bill or pass the bill at this session of Congress.

I will say to the gentleman that that bill provides for three or four important things. The first thing it will provide for is a compulsory license. Most of the other nations of the world have compulsory-license statutes. This, however, differs from other laws of the kind in that this bill does not apply to the original inventor, but applies only to those corporations or persons who acquire patents for the purpose or with the result of stifling competition.

Another proposition which it attempts to meet, and which I think it will meet perfectly, is the condition that arose out of the recent decision in the case of Dick against Henry, decided by the Supreme Court on March 11 last. In that case it was held that the clause to the effect that "the inventor shall have the exclusive right to make, use, and vend his invention" carried with it the right to dictate how the machine shall be used and what accessories must be used with the machine, and also it would no doubt be construed to mean that the seller of a patented thing could fix the resale price of the patented article. This bill will provide that the lessee or the licensee or purchaser of any patented article shall not be liable to an action of infringement of the patent because of any breach of the contract of sale or any provision thereof. In other words, the position that the Committee on Patents has taken in regard to that proposition is that the patent can not be infringed in any way except by counterfeiting it in some way; in other words, making some article like the patented article without authority for so doing. We think that the provisions in regard to the resale of these articles ought to rest upon contracts, because they are nothing more or less than a contract with regard to the resale price of those articles.

The same is true with regard to the United Shoe Machinery Manufacturing Co., for example. When they sell machines to make a shoe, or to put heels or bottoms on the shoe, they rent the machines for so much per annum. Those machines are patented. They have a tying clause in those contracts, however, that compels the shoe manufacturers to buy thread and tacks and wire from the United Shoe Machinery Manufacturing Co. Therefore they are enabled to have an additional monopoly. They already have a legal monopoly, under the law, of the patented thing, but they force a monopoly in unpatented things. The position which the committee has taken is that that is not right; that on the contrary it is wrong, and not what the original framers of the patent statutes intended.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. With pleasure.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Has not the President of the United States recommended that a commission be appointed for the purpose of investigating the general subject of patent laws, with a view to ascertaining what changes are necessary since the Supreme Court decision was rendered? I should like to ask the gentleman what has become of that recommendation of the President. Has the committee acted upon it or not?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will state to the gentleman that the President has in a message to Congress recommended that a commission be appointed by the President to revise the patent statutes, to rewrite the patent laws, and make suggestions in regard to the patent statutes. That veto message to which the gentleman has referred was referred to the Committee on Patents, of which I am chairman, and we have not considered it for the reason that at the time it was referred we had already begun an investigation regarding compulsory licenses, to ascertain whether that was proper and wise legislation for this country or not. We had already started the investigation which was partially caused by the decision in the Dick-Henry case, and therefore we have been taking up the time in preparing a bill based upon the testimony that was heard for 28 consecutive days. We had 28 public hearings. We had before us manufacturers of patented articles from almost every State in the Union, and we had prominent inventors and prominent patent attorneys before us; and for that reason, after we had started the investigation along that line, we did not take up the other proposition. But after the bill which I expect to report in a few days has been acted upon by Congress, I shall be glad to consider the advisability and the propriety of authorizing the creation of a commission to rewrite the rest of the patent statutes of the country.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I asked this question, if the gentleman will permit me, because during the last two or three months I have received hundreds of letters from constituents of mine in which they protest against the enactment of what is called the Oldfield bill. I have not myself carefully examined the provisions of that bill, but evidently my constituents do not approve its provisions, and they have written me to that effect, and therefore I thought that probably that subject was important enough for a commission to take ample time in the prosecution of a full investigation as to what changes should be made in the law.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will state to the gentleman that I think the Committee on Patents has already done the work and done it properly. With regard to that particular proposition I dare say the gentleman's constituents who are opposed to that bill are persons who are probably, some of them, jewelers, who sell safety razors and who sell Waterman's fountain pens, and sell a great many other patented articles. They want the resale price to be fixed by the manufacturer, so that all of these persons in the city of St. Louis or any other city will have no competition. There is no competition in patented goods.

Just to show you how far this thing goes, I had a letter a few days ago from a merchant up in Michigan. He said he had bought some phonograph records and some phonographs. I believe he paid $15 apiece for the phonographs. He paid 21 cents apiece for some of the records, and 30 cents apiece for some of the records. The resale price was fixed by the manufacturer of these phonographs and records. The resale price to the public was $30 for the phonograph, 50 cents for the 21-cent records, and 75 cents for the 30-cent records. He decided to quit business. He sold everything else that he had and wanted to sell these records and phonographs. He could not sell them at the fixed price, because the man to whom he wanted to sell said he could get them from the factory for that price. Then he tried to sell them to the factory. They offered him $10 apiece for the phonographs, 15 cents for the 21-cent records, and probably 20 cents for the 30-cent records, or something like that. They would not take the goods back at a fair price and they would not permit him to sell them at less than the fixed resale price, but on the contrary went into the Federal court and obtained an injunction against him to prevent him from selling them below the price fixed by the manufacturer.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Based on infringement?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Based on infringement. So he wrote me he would let those things rot in his store.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I can well understand how the manufacturers of these patented articles should object to legislation which would deprive them of the benefits of their patents to a certain extent, but I can not see why retailers like those who have written me should object, because there certainly is competition among them. Anyone who wishes to do so can sell these articles, and, I suppose, can get them from the manufacturer and put them in his store for sale.

Mr. OLDFIELD. But he must sell them at the price fixed by the manufacturer.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. What reason has that man to protest against your bill, if your bill would cheapen the price?

Mr. OLDFIELD. He does not want the price cheapened. He does not have any competition. He has a good profit, and if the merchant across the street must sell a fountain pen for $3.50, or a Gillett safety razor for $5, then the merchant on this side of the street is all right. There is no competition at all. What is the difference whether the manufacturer fixes the price, or all of the retailers get together and fix the price, as far as the public is concerned.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. In reference to the bill, not its merits, but for the information of the country concerning the probable progress of the bill. As I understood from the papers, the bill was ordered reported some time ago by the Committee on Patents.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The report has not yet been filed. The Committee on Patents has been on the eve of being called on calendar Wednesday for some time, and if this bill had been reported it would have been called up now. I should like to ask the gentleman whether the purpose in reporting the bill now is mainly to get the matter before the country for further consideration by the people who are interested, rather than with the idea of forcing it to passage soon.

Mr. OLDFIELD. That is the exact reason. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and a great many others have come to me and said that they had hundreds of letters. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] said he probably had a thousand letters protesting against the bill. I hardly thought it was fair to the Members of Congress who had these letters of protest to force them to vote on this proposition at this session of Congress, and I wanted to get up as good a report as we could, to make it as plain as possible, and give everybody an opportunity to study the question, and give the people of the country an opportunity to see what is provided for in the bill, and ascertain what is the sentiment of the country upon the proposition.

Mr. MANN. I think the procedure adopted by the gentleman has been eminently fair and is the proper course. I supposed that was the reason, but I thought the country might understand from the gentleman's statement that the bill was presented, and that if anybody has any fault to find with it, this gives an opportunity to write to Members of Congress on the subject.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And it is not to be pressed for passage this session?

Mr. OLDFIELD. It is not to be pressed for passage at this session of Congress.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Are not these protests from the local agents of the men holding the patents?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I have no doubt the manufacturers of patented goods are inspiring a great many letters that are being written to Members of Congress. I know I have received letters from dealers in my district. I have received letters from persons who sell safety razors, and from some of those who sell different kinds of firearms, and I have no doubt that a great many of those letters are being inspired by manufacturers of patented goods. I see no reason in the world why a manufacturer of patented goods should be permitted to fix the resale price of his product any more than a manufacturer of any other sort of goods. The same argument that can be made in favor of the manufacturer of a patented article fixing the resale price of his goods can be made with regard to the manufacturer of any other article, patented or unpatented, fixing the resale price of his goods. Take a mimeographing machine, for example. They will sell the machine for $45, and there is a contract which says that all of the ink and paper must be bought from that company. Those are unpatented articles. They say it is so much easier to collect for the purchase price of the machine in that way and therefore they ought to be permitted to do that; but the same argument would apply with regard to a barber's outfit.

Take a barber's chair. The manufacturers might go to the barber and say, "Here, this chair cost a good deal, but I will give it to you at half price provided you will buy your soap, towels, and brushes from us." That is on the same principle. Every argument that can be made in favor of the manufacturers of patented goods to fix the price of their goods for resale can be made for the manufacturers of unpatented goods.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman seems to lay stress on the fact that letters in reference to this matter had been inspired by the manufacturers of patented goods. Is it not true that on practically every question that is presented to Congress and in which the country gets interested before Congress does, the same procedure is followed—that central agencies communicate with people on the outside and request them to communicate with Members of Congress? Has not the gentleman received scores of petitions in reference to sugar and various other matters inspired by some central plant.

Mr. OLDFIELD. The gentleman is right.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then there is nothing wrong in this any more than in the other matters.

Mr. OLDFIELD. No; but the people of the country ought to understand the situation. I do not think they do anything wrong by asking their customers to write to Members of Congress, but I think that Members of Congress ought to have the other side before they vote on the proposition.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think the gentleman is right. I think that Congress many times acts on this artificial demand when it does not reflect the opinion of the people at large.

Mr. OLDFIELD. The next proposition in the bill which the gentleman asked me about simply makes the Sherman antitrust law apply to patent monopolies. That is, those patent monopolies where it is a monopoly of monopolies. A great many of the best patent lawyers in the country to-day take the position that the Sherman antitrust law does not apply to patent monopolies. I do not know whether they are correct in that opinion or not, but this bill will provide that the Sherman antitrust law shall be applicable to those monopolies created by the accumulation of patents.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAFFERTY. In regard to the International Harvester Co., in the essential mechanism of the self-binder, is not the knotter a patented part, and has not the International Co. bought up all the patents and improvements on the knotter that has gone through the Patent Office?

Mr. OLDFIELD. That is true.

Mr. LAFFERTY. As I understand the bill, it would make it a penal offense for the owner of one patent to buy another patent with the intention of restricting or interfering with its manufacture or sale.

Mr. OLDFIELD. That is the intended result. The bill says "for the purpose or with the result of suppressing competition."

I might elaborate on that point. By virtue of the International Harvester Co. having the patent on the knotter they fix the resale price of the entire machine. Take the thrashing machine; by virtue of a little insignificant patent on the knotter they can fix the retail price to every farmer in the country, and all farming machinery in the country where the knotter enters into it. They can go further than that if they want to, but I do not think they will, because it would not be good business; but the manufacturer of a patented plow to-day, under the present law, could sell a plow to a farmer in your district or mine and have that plow placarded with the statement, "This plow shall never be resold for less than $25." The farmer might use it for 10 years and then decide to sell it. If they found out that he was about to sell it for less than $25, the manufacturer of the plow would have the legal right under the law to go to a Federal judge and have an injunction entered to prevent the plow being sold to the farmer at that cut price.

I say it is not fair to the people of the country, and I believe that Congress will bear out the Patent Committee when this bill is voted on. I believe that the Congress of the United States will say that no man has the right to fix the resale price of a product after it has left his hands. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States will ever say that a manufacturer in one State, New York, for instance, has the right to fix the resale price of a plow used in California after it passes out of his hands. As a matter of fact, on patented goods we pay a tax the same as on other property; we pay insurance on them, and it is our property just as much as our horse is our property.

Under the peculiar situation, under the decisions of the courts of the country, the patent lawyers of this country did not find out—they never supposed that this was the law until after the Sherman antitrust law was passed in 1890. The first case was in 1896, and they seemed to be trying to get around the Sherman antitrust law. The courts have held that in regard to unpatented articles in restraint of trade they could not fix the retail price. In the Dr. Miles medical case they held that because the medicine was not a patented medicine these contracts regarding the resale price were in restraint of interstate commerce, in restraint of trade, and in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

This bill will only seek to do this: It just takes one right away from the patent manufacturer, and that is the right of an infringement suit when a contract is broken. They can go into the State courts, and if it is a reasonable contract they can enforce it; they can compel the enforcement of their contracts the same as any other individual in the country can enforce his contract.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will.

Mr. MANN. Under the existing law, is it not feasible for the owner of a patent to refuse to have it sold at any price, or forbid anybody from making the article?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman's bill cover that?

Mr. OLDFIELD. You can not compel a man to sell if he does not want to sell.

Mr. MANN. Quite the contrary. When we grant the exclusive privilege of an invention we can require him to sell it for a price that is fair, and if he undertakes to do as many now do, turn the patent over to large corporations which do not want to put them in use, and forbids them from being made——

Mr. OLDFIELD. Oh, I misunderstood the gentleman. This bill takes care of that.

Mr. LAFFERTY. How is it taken care of?

Mr. OLDFIELD. It provides that when a person or corporation acquires an invention for the purpose or with the result of suppressing competition, then anybody can get a license by going to a Federal court and demanding a license.

Mr. LAFFERTY. That does not answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois. Suppose the inventor refuses to do anything with the invention after having acquired the exclusive right?

Mr. OLDFIELD. You can not do anything with him.

Mr. LAFFERTY. That point is not covered, then.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman stated if he refused he could go to a court and have the court fix the license fee. That was in one of these bills.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will that be in the gentleman's bill as reported?

Mr. OLDFIELD. No; it will not in that form. It is in the bill, but it does not apply to the original inventor himself. It does apply to any person to whom an invention is assigned. It applies to any person who acquires a patent, but we were unable to report a bill which would make it apply to the original inventor himself.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, did I understand the gentleman's bill would authorize a court to fix the license fee?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Has the gentleman examined the constitutional question as to whether you can require a court to do that?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Is that a judicial function?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I have investigated it thoroughly.

Mr. COOPER. It strikes me that that is one of the functions that can not be deputed to a court.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I know it is a very close question, and there are a great many who do not agree with me upon that proposition, but I think that we have worked it out.

Mr. COOPER. That brings up the exact point that is in controversy between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the court.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. That the court can not fix the rate, but it can decide whether the rate is confiscatory or not.

Mr. MANN. Of course the court does fix the license fee where the patent has been infringed; that is, it fixes the amount of compensation upon the basis of the license fee; but whether it can do it for the future is another question.

Mr. COOPER. That is what I mean—to fix the license fee—and it strikes me that the court can not do that.

Mr. OLDFIELD. The court does it in this way: If an invention is suppressed anybody can go into a court and compel the granting of a compulsory license; but as that has worked out in Great Britain and Canada and all other countries, they do not have to resort to the courts very often. When they know that a man can legally compel a license, they usually get together and agree upon a license. It seems to be easier to do that if they know they must do it.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. The last two days I endeavored to get copies of the gentleman's bill and have been unable to secure a single copy, being informed that the entire number printed is exhausted. I have received from the gentleman from Arkansas a great deal of information, and I have no doubt that other gentlemen listening have received very much beneficial information upon the gentleman's bill and what it contains. Is it possible for the gentleman to ask for a reprint of the bill, so that we all could study same?

Mr. OLDFIELD. I will state to the gentleman that bill 23417 has been exhausted for some several days, probably a week; but a substitute for that bill will be reported, I think, to-morrow, and then the gentleman can get all of the copies he desires.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I have received a large number of letters from retail dealers insisting that if this bill becomes a law their business will be very seriously injured, arguing that under the present system they sell a patented article at the same price at which it is sold by the larger concern in the larger city. If this law passes, the mail-order house will take their business away from them, they say. I have had a large number of letters and that is the substance of all of them. I would like to have the opinion of the gentleman upon that contention.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, it resolves itself into this proposition: If competition will hurt the retail dealers in the gentleman's district and in my district and in all of the other districts, if competition is damaging to them, this bill will probably be damaging to them. Of course, under the law now and the way that manufacturers of patented goods sell their articles, there is absolutely no competition from the time the article is manufactured until the time it is sold and used thousands of miles away. I can readily see why Bill Jones and John Smith and Bill Johnson, who are all merchants in the same town and who all handle these Gillette safety razors at $5 apiece, want the price to stay there; and when these three merchants must sell those razors for $5 each there is no competition. There are hundreds of articles in the same situation. Of course the retailers of the country do not want competition, and they are going to raise every argument they can against this. But I believe in competition. I believe that if the mail-order houses can sell those articles to the people of the various communities of this country more cheaply than the retailers at home can do it we had better let them do it and give the people the benefit of the cheaper price. That is my theory of the proposition. [Applause.]

[Mr. BERGER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, the House joint resolution under consideration seems to have been attended with careful preparation, and the discussion of it manifests that the proponents of it are earnestly desirous of effecting a practical reform. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen in charge to what I think would be an advisable amendment. Would it not be well, in line 8, on page 2, after the word "increases," to insert by way of amendment the words "or decreases," so that when the commission took the matter under consideration they might also find that they could decrease expenses as well as increase them? I do not desire to offer that as an amendment, but merely suggest it.

In the course of the debate it occurred to me to inquire whether it is within the scope of the resolution to add to the subject of inquiries of this commission that they may go fully into the relation of patent attorneys to the Patent Office and to the granting of patents, so that they may inquire and see to what extent the credulous and zealous originator of some idea in California or in New York or in Missouri, thousands of miles away, is influenced or maltreated by the patent attorney. Conceivers of patent ideas become zealous on the subject. They think their idea is practicable; they think it is good; they believe in it; they think it is patentable; and there is a disposition on the part of some patent attorneys to encourage and lead them on in believing it is patentable, and I doubt not many of the honest, hard-working people, our constituents, all over the country have been bled and bled by the patent parasites for 5 years, 10 years, 20 years, and finally their patent is turned down. It is a small individual matter, but they are throwing away their money and the grafter is getting the spoils. I do not know that it would be germane to this particular inquiry, but if so I would be very glad to make the suggestion to gentlemen who have given it such careful and such thorough study. I know of one instance in my brief service where a woman had conceived an idea which she thought was a patentable conception. She paid $50 to an attorney, and it was found out on later investigation that in the first instance the Patent Office had advised substantially that it was not patentable. Fortunately she had among her files a letter which stated that if the patent was not obtained the money would be refunded by the attorney. Ordinarily these lady constituents of ours do not preserve their correspondence——

Mr. OLDFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. In just one moment. Of course, I took up the matter and presented it to the attorneys with such remarks as I thought proper in connection with it and was fortunate to collect for and send the woman $50 after it had been withheld for three years. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I want to state to the gentleman I know of some conditions just like those he has related. They are absolutely true, and it is the purpose of this resolution to investigate that very thing here in the city of Washington in regard to the conduct of lawyers and the conduct of patent officials here and find out just about the very things of which the gentleman speaks.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am indeed glad to have that information. It is accurate, for I know the gentleman has made a careful study of it. Important as this question is, I have not been able to find where the legislatures of any States or the national as well as local organizations representing the working, scientific, commercial, and patriotic persons have beleaguered Congress with hundreds of thousands of any such petitions and letters as I beg to read.

I have here a letter that has just come to Members of this body from the national secretary of a great patriotic society known as the Daughters of Liberty, Mr. W. V. Edkins, which is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., July 29, 1912.

Hon. S. A. RODDENBERY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:-From reports at hand it is apparent that the Dillingham bill for the restriction of immigration is to be sidetracked as a political exigency.

Let us quote from Mayor Gaynor, of New York:

"You have the hardest police situation in the world to deal with. We have in this city the largest foreign population of any city, and a large number of them are degenerates and criminals. The gambling of the city is almost all in their hands, not to mention other vices and crimes.

The published names of everyone connected nearly or remotely with Rosenthal and his murder show them to be of the same class of lawless foreigners to which he belonged."

The Dillingham bill is the result of facts like the above and others equally alarming brought out by the report on immigration.

After being brought face to face with these conditions, whatever latent and slumbering American patriotism there is should be aroused to the manifest necessity of a restriction of such immigration as has been proven beyond any question of doubt undesirable and positively injurious to America, Americans, and American institutions.

Is it possible that the representatives of the people are beyond any patriotic impulse, except so far as political necessities require?

I can not believe that our fair land has no claim upon you that would deter you from arising and insisting, even at this late day, upon the passage of this bill as a matter of protection of every interest that may be termed American. Does this appeal to you as a call to duty?

Yours, respectfully,

W. V. EDKINS,
National Secretary.

I hold here another letter which is typical of the way the folks at home are writing their Congressmen from some of the so-called "doubtful States," and to which was written a most courteous hasty reply telling about the "crowded condition" of the work both in the Rules Committee and the House, and inclosing a copy of letters of certain chairmen of committees testifying to the hard work the Congressman was doing to further in every way the consideration and passage of the Dillingham bill and assuring the constituent, as he would see from the inclosed, that the bill would go through the first thing in December.

The constituent wrote:

———, ———, August 1, 1912.

Hon. ——— ———, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: This House has seemed very responsive to the requests of the old soldiers for increased pensions, the labor unions for some legislation such as eight hours and anti-injunction, and other bills for other classes, but appears to have overlooked the importance of such progressive legislation as the splendid immigration bill, containing needed reforms proposed by the congressional immigration commission and passed by the Senate three months ago.

There are a great many of us that are anxious for the House to be as responsive in the matter of this patriotic immigration legislation as the commission, composed of Members of Congress, and the Senate have been. According to Congressman DIES's speech in the House and from what we hear there seems a disposition on the part of some to "strangle" and "sandbag" this needed patriotic legislation as a result of the opposition of the foreign steamships, the large employers, the foreigners whose prejudice and credulence have been aroused by their campaign of falsifications and misrepresentation of the Dillingham or immigration commission bill, certain other selfish interests and influences, and some of the good public-spirited people who have been misled and are being used by this selfish opposition.

Consequently I am taking the liberty of writing you to urge that this House at least consider this needed patriotic legislation, and that this be done before the House adjourns in view of the weeks the immigration bill has been before the House now.

Very truly, yours,

——— ———.

During the three months that the Senate immigration bill (S. 3175) was being considered and debated in the Senate, up to its passage by that body on April 19 last, many letters were read by Senators, and there are a few of them from which I desire to quote, in order that this House may not plead ignorance of the deep and widespread interest and demand that exists in favor of this House considering right now these immigration bills that have been before it for months.

The first one from which I quote was written by the national president, Mr. C. S. Barrett, and the national secretary, Mr. A. C. Davis, of the Farmers' Union, and, among other things, said:

Inclosed please find the statement of our committee's spokesman before the House Committee on Immigration. We beg to call this and also Senate Document No. 251 to your attention in connection with Senate bill No. 3175, now on the Senate calendar and to be voted upon next Monday.

These two documents fully explain our interest and attitude with reference to this legislation. They show that interest and attitude to be deep-seated and of long standing. From these documents you will see that our organization and its extensive membership are unalterably opposed to section 31 of the bill extending the work of the so-called Division of Information, and that we have been for a number of years urging the enactment of the very legislation, such as the educational test, recently recommended by the congressional Immigration Commission.

Mr. O. D. Hill, one of the secretaries of the Farmers' National Congress, wrote from Kendalia, W. Va., in part, as follows:

The farmers of the country are opposed to the present kind and quantity of immigration. The subject of proper restrictions and their enforcement by means of an efficient administrative policy, such as Canada has, have been discussed every year, and resolutions passed every year for some time at our annual congresses. The above farmers' organization is representative. It held its thirty-first annual session at Columbus, Ohio, last October. The meeting lasted one week, and there were over 2,000 delegates from all parts of the country present.

At that meeting the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas the congressional Immigration Commission's report of 40 volumes has just been published and recommends the very measures which this organization has been advocating in its resolutions for years to judiciously restrict undesirable immigration:

"Resolved, That we enthusiastically approve the commission's legislative recommendations that the head tax be increased, the illiteracy test be enacted, the foreign steamships be fined for bringing undesirables, and that other judicious measures be adopted, which are hereby urged upon the Congress of the United States."

Secretary Frank Morrison wrote for the American Federation of Labor, under date of March 18, 1912, as follows:

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I see by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that you will speak before the United States Senate on the substitute amendment offered by yourself to the immigration bill, S. 3175, and that you will deal specifically with the subject of restriction by means of the illiteracy test.

In order that you may also know the latest action of the American Federation of Labor on the subject of immigration, I hand you herewith copy of the proceedings of the thirty-first annual convention, held at Atlanta, Ga., last November (1911), on page 66 of which you will find a statement by President Gompers on the subject of immigration, showing the Immigration Commission to have completely indorsed the attitude of the American Federation of Labor upon the general subject matter of immigration, particularly that of the requirement of an educational test. On page 287 of the same report you will find the report of the committee on president's report, reaffirming former actions of the conventions of the American Federation of Labor, and instructing the legislative committee to continue their efforts to secure the passage of either the Gardner or the Burnett bill, or, for that matter, any other suitable measure providing for the educational test. This report was unanimously adopted by the convention.

Hoping that this may be of service, and with best wishes for your every success on this important question, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary American Federation of Labor.

Under date of March 15, 1912, the general master workman, Mr. J. W. Hayes, wrote a letter to the same Senator, from which I quote the following:

As you know, the order of the Knights of Labor has long favored the exclusion of undesirable immigrants, and as a means of doing so has also favored the illiteracy test and still continues to favor such a policy. We hope that you will be successful in securing the passage of your amendment to the Dillingham bill. We think this is one of the most important measures to be considered by this Congress—the exclusion of undesirables by the illiteracy test as recommended by the Immigration Commission.

Among other things, Mr. John H. Noyes, national legislative committeeman for the Junior Order United American Mechanics, wrote the Senator, who succeeded in having the Burnett illiteracy bill substituted for the illiteracy test wording in the Dillingham bill, there being only 9 votes against it out of 96, as follows:

I see by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that you are to speak next Monday on your illiteracy-test amendment to the immigration bill (S. 3175) now pending before the Senate, and I beg to say that there are over 400,000 members of the above patriotic society that have been urging for several years with more and more emphasis the adoption of such a test for adult aliens.

The membership feels that there is quite too much illiteracy in the country already, and that we ought to require of our own, by means of compulsory school-attendance laws, that they be able to read and write—as well as of foreigners entering the country—on the ground that a rudimentary education better fits one for the struggle for life and for citizenship in this county.

Mr. W. B. Griffith, writing for the Mechanics of New York State, said:

On behalf of some 30,000 members of the above patriotic organization in the Empire State I beg to say that the adoption of the reading test for adult aliens, as proposed by your amendment to S. 3175, will meet with universal favor, because we firmly believe that an elementary education makes our own native born better and fitter producers as well as citizens.

While the proper restriction of immigration will be opposed by the foreign steamship companies, the large employers and padrones, certain importers who fear an increase in freight rates as a result of restriction, and other selfish and misguided interests and influences, the great majority of people in this State, and particularly the farmers, laborers, and patriotic persons that are organized, are not only in favor of the legislation, but are very much aroused over the laxness of our immigration laws and the feebleness of our administrative policy, as compared with those of Canada, Australia, and some other new countries.

And Mr. Charles H. Stees, national secretary of the Patriotic Order Sons of America, wrote from Philadelphia:

The extensive membership of the above patriotic society, which has, for instance, over 100,000 active members, all voters, in my State (Pennsylvania), and has thousands in every State east of the Mississippi and in some States west of the Mississippi, are very much in favor of your illiteracy-test amendment to S. 3175, and the 30,000 members in the Old North State will appreciate your efforts in behalf of that measure, which is in keeping with our public-school system and which would merely require of adult aliens coming here what our public-school system and compulsory school-attendance laws exact, or ought to, of our own native born.

A letter from the national joint legislative agent of the four railroad brotherhoods, Mr. H. E. Wills, contained the following statement:

I am writing to say that the railroad organizations which I represent are deeply interested in the further limitation of the present enormous influx of labor by means of the reading and writing test proposed by your amendment and so strongly recommended by the Immigration Commission. As I brought out recently in a statement before the House Committee on Immigration, which has voted to report such a measure, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Order of Railway Conductors, and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen have for a number of years discussed in their conventions and publications the need of such legislation and have passed resolutions urging it.

No such representative widespread interest has been manifested in this patent legislation now before the House, and yet we have time to consider it and devote a whole day to it, even though we are almost ready to reach the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization under the call of committees, and I observe that some of my colleagues are quite willing to give the widest scope to an investigation and discussion of this resolution, which necessarily results in "killing time" and making it impossible to reach the immigration bills this session on Calendar Wednesday.

Not only have the officials of organizations representing millions upon millions of our citizenship not manifested any such interest by letter in the pending measure, but their organizations and the people of the States through their respective legislatures, have memorialized Congress one after the other for immigration legislation, as the last Tennessee Legislature did in the following petition, which was duly approved by the governor, and which is typical:

Whereas the United States Immigration Commission, after four years' investigation and the expenditure of $1,000,000, has made a 42-volume report to Congress; and

Whereas it is being proposed that the immigration evils from which the Northeastern States are suffering be relieved by diverting and distributing the aliens now crowding into and congesting the slums, sweatshops, and city centers of the Northeast; and

Whereas the Immigration Commission clearly points out that this is the only country with any considerable net foreign immigration, our laws and administrative policy are the weakest of any new country, and that "substantial restriction is demanded by economic, moral, and social considerations" and the illiteracy test is recommended "as the most feasible single method for excluding undesirable immigration": Therefore be it

Resolved by the State Senate of Tennessee, That we hereby memorialize Congress to immediately enact some such illiteracy test as is recommended by the Immigration Commission, as is law in Australia, New Zealand, and other new countries, pass other needed legislation along the lines of the Immigration Commission's suggestion, and do not pass any legislation looking to the diversion and distribution of the kind of alien population that is now congesting the northeastern cities and causing so many evils there; and be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of the senate at once to the President of the United States, to our two United States Senators, and each of our Representatives at Washington, D. C., with the request that it be presented to Congress and properly referred.

And to my Republican friends I want to commend the perusal of the memorial of the Ohio State Legislature—and a quite similar one from Pennsylvania—for while I do not believe in protecting the products of labor from the products of foreign labor by anything more than a revenue tariff, I do believe in protecting our own workingmen from the cheap labor of western Asia and Europe, just as much as I believe in keeping out that of eastern Asia. The Ohio memorial reads as follows, and I hope the words will be listened to by friends across the aisle in order that there may be a pricking of their consciences and that possibly some of the sinners may return to a revenue tariff while the light still holds out for them to see their way back to this House:

Whereas the dumping of a million immigrants into the United States annually is a fact for which the world offers no precedent, and is a menace to American institutions, the American home, and the American laborer; and

Whereas there are now many bills before the Congress of the United States for the better regulation of immigration and the revision of the tariff; and

Whereas the regulation of foreign immigration is a necessary supplement to the tariff, an essential element in the protection of America from ruinous competition by cheap labor at home, ruinous in our endeavor to establish an American industrial democracy; and

Whereas a protective tariff, without proper immigration regulation, is a travesty on the industrial problem: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That we respectfully ask our Senators and Representatives in Congress to enact more stringent immigration laws to protect our people, both native born and naturalized, against wholesale immigration from foreign lands.

Of course in spite of all this it may be that you will be able to explain to your confiding constituents that you have no idea of delay; that you have no idea of consuming time so that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization will not be called at this session of Congress. Remember that there is no filibuster; that they are honestly seeking the information touching this patent resolution, yet having in their minds the fact that the longer the time they consume on this the more certain they will be not to have a vote on the immigration legislation. And that calls to mind a matter I should like to submit. The other day it was remarked that the chairman of the Rules Committee of the House had stated in writing that early in December a special rule would be brought in for the consideration of immigration bills. I want to say for the benefit of the chairman of the Rules Committee that in December we may not need any rule to get up the bill. In December, it will come up under the regular rules of the House, of its own sweet will. His promised proffered assistance is needed right now. Now is the time when we need action by the Rules Committee, if we want to respond to the demands of the people of this country for this beneficent, wholesome, progressive legislation. Nobody knows——

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia what difference this so-called Burnett bill will make in the present immigration law? The gentleman seems very anxious to have it passed. The only further restriction in the bill I can see is that it requires the immigrant over 16 years to be able to read a printed slip in some language or dialect; and would that really restrict immigration if it should be passed?

Mr. RODDENBERY. It would make all the difference in the world. Pass the Dillingham bill, even adopting the radical recommendation of the committee, and the whole bill of 60 pages is in conference. But I have not the time and this is not the occasion to go into the details of the Dillingham bill and its 39 sections or the Burnett bill. I desire to pursue a different line of argument at this time, but this much is so, namely, the foreign steamship companies, the Shipping Trust, the large importers, traffickers, and employers of cheap labor, the advocates of the wide-open American door to allow to enter species of aliens like "Gyp the Blood," "Lefty Louie," "Jack Rose," and those other assassins, who, for the price of gambling in the city of New York, will take human life—these, and every instrumentality that walks in brazen shame with human vermin, protest against the Dillingham-Burnett or Immigration Commission bill, and that is sufficient for me. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I will.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I understand that the fellows the gentleman mentioned a second ago can read and write.

Mr. RODDENBERY. And the fellows I mentioned a moment ago may not have been able to read and write when first they put their foot on what ought to be a freeman's soil. [Applause.] And whether they can or no, those they prey upon and use can not. They and their kind have come to this country and obtained the benefits of our institutions. Dense in their ignorance, criminal in their hearts, they have taken advantage of opportunities of luring the unsuspecting illiterates into their gambling dens in the midst of the vices of the Tenderloin, and in collusion even with high officers of Tammany's Tiger have they brought shame and disgrace on the Empire State of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I will.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I hold in my hand a copy from a St. Louis newspaper which reads as follows—I will read only the first two paragraphs:

Because railroads in Illinois were clamoring in vain for 80,000 laborers for summer track repairing, and other industries are equally unable to solve the problem of labor shortage, four large St. Louis agencies are establishing branches throughout southern Illinois.

Tony Blaisi, supervisor of private employments of Illinois, was in St. Louis yesterday to determine whether the St. Louis agency should be licensed in Illinois. After finding the demand for laborers on the St. Louis agency was mainly from Chicago and Illinois corporations, he decided to recommend they be given licenses.

I have also learned recently that 500 colored men were imported from the South for the purpose of doing necessary labor for which nobody else could be found. In other words, there is at the present time a great shortage of labor in the United States, especially in the great Northwest, and the farmers can not find enough to move their crops.

If my friend will investigate and examine the reports of the Department of Commerce and Labor he will find, for instance, that last month 50,000——

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield further to the gentleman. The gentleman can at a future time make his speech and quote the few paid articles he has found that have been put in a few subsidized newspapers by the foreign steamship companies and large employers that work men 12 hours a day, 7 days a week, 52 weeks a year on starvation wages and enjoy a high protective tariff enacted by his party without protecting our workingmen from the pauper labor of Europe.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will not the gentleman let me finish this sentence?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That 50,000 unskilled laborers arrived in this country, and 177,000 unskilled laborers departed from this country, so that consequently the question of immigration is not a problem at this present time. On the contrary, I think Congress will soon pass resolutions inviting people to come here to do that particular kind of work for which immigrants are needed.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman by calling his attention to the finding of the Congressional Immigration Commission, for which he voted six years ago, and the finding of the Senate committee that investigated the high cost of living. The Senate committee reported after a thorough investigation that one of the contributing causes was the tremendous alien influx. There were some on that committee who concluded, and rightly too, that a high protective tariff that masqueraded under the disreputable guise of affording better wages to our workingmen had even as much if not more to do with the skyward soaring of the prices of necessities.

But to answer the gentleman in kind, I will read to the House a few uninspired newspaper articles that did not have to be accompanied by any large steamship or other newspaper advertisements. First let me call attention to what the Congressional Immigration Commission found after a most searching investigation, conducted by the ablest and most talented experts of the United States Bureau of Labor that could be obtained. The facts are available. If the gentleman will just turn to his set of 42 volumes of 500 pages each, which was prepared by that official investigating body known as the Immigration Commission, he will get the truth, and it will make him free of his present delusions, for it was therein proved, to the complete satisfaction of the nine distinguished members of that official body, that "There is an oversupply of unskilled labor in this country, as a whole, due to unrestricted immigration." There can be no question about that fact having been established. We do not need the testimony of organized labor, which has been driven entirely out of the basic industries like steel, where, according to undeniable facts, much of the labor is in far worse slavery than any black man ever was in the South. It is so recorded in one official report after another by the Bureau of Labor and published as Senate documents.

But to reply in kind, let me call the gentleman's attention to what the New York Herald said January 14 and April 13, 1912:

[New York Herald, Jan. 14, 1912.]

500,000 UNABLE TO GET WORK HERE—WARNING SENT BROADCAST TO MECHANICS AND LABORERS TO SHUN NEW YORK.

More than a million skilled mechanics and laborers are idle and daily seeking employment in New York City, according to figures compiled yesterday by the manual labor bureau of the National Employment Exchange. "The labor market in this vicinity," says an officer of the bureau, "never has been so stagnant and glutted as now, and never has there been such a small demand for labor of any class."

Because of this condition and because it is rapidly becoming worse, the National Employment Exchange, which is supported by about a hundred prominent financial and industrial leaders in the country, issued a warning yesterday to all mechanics and laborers to stay away from New York City.

"We want this warning to go into every hamlet in the country," said Edward W. Carpenter, manager of the exchange, yesterday, "and particularly into the industrial towns and cities of the Middle West, which are pouring their thousands into the city.

"The severe weather of the last few weeks has brought all outdoor labor to an end, throwing out many thousands of men already here. Such wide publicity has been given to the construction of the new subways that many more thousands—tens of thousands—of men have left their homes in other cities to come here, believing there would be no trouble in obtaining work.

"HUNDRED MEN FOR ONE JOB.

"A wrong and dangerous impression has been given. There is only one job for every fifty or a hundred men seeking it. This includes every branch of skilled workers and laborers, as well as civil engineers and educated men. If we could only spread word throughout the country that these places, even down to the diggers, have been filled long ago and that there is a waiting list, it would help to lighten the burden under which we are struggling.

"A much stronger demand for labor is apparent in the Middle West than here. We can not even now supply an order for 200 miners in West Virginia because the men want to stay in New York. New York is a Mecca which attracts men, and there is not the labor here to support them.

"While our manual labor bureau, in Cooper Square, insists that at least 500,000 men are out of work in this city, I personally know that there are more than 300,000 idle. Of course, at the bureau they are in more intimate touch with the situation, and they probably are right. In any event, it is an appalling situation and one that demands prompt relief.

"Most of the mechanics and laborers who come here have nothing more than a railroad ticket. The result is that they at once become objects of charity, thus burdening the community with an enormous and unnecessary tax. It is regrettable that many of them become street beggars."

In connection with this statement and warning by the National Employment Exchange the various constituent societies of the Associated Charities have issued urgent appeals for quick help. Each society declares that the demand upon them never before has been so great. The free lodging houses are overcrowded and nightly turn away hundreds of homeless and destitute.

"GOOD CHANCE NEXT SPRING.

"Next spring and summer we can place more men than we can find," Mr. Carpenter continued, "but that is at least three months away, and how this army of idle men are to exist until then is beyond me. There is no work here now for the men, and all who can should get away from New York. We want to make the warning particularly strong for men out through the country to stay away from this city until work on the great public improvements and private enterprises opens in the spring. If they come here they will starve.

"Our records show that more men are coming every day. They are giving up jobs that pay them on an average of $18 a week to come to New York. They not only want to better themselves, but they want to see New York. They have no money to sustain themselves in idleness, we can not find employment for them, and they quickly become destitute.

"A pitiful thing about this is that many of these men bring their wives and children here, and all of them must accept charity—if they can get it.

"No mechanic or laborer should come to New York now unless he has sufficient money to support himself for three months. I wish I could devise some way to get the hundreds of thousands of unemployed now in New York away from here. There is a much better chance for them in the industrial centers of the Middle West. If they remain here they must beg, accept charity, or starve. The outlook is not bright."

POLICE COMPLAIN OF BEGGARS.

Police Commissioner Waldo said yesterday that there are more beggars in the city now than in many years, and that policemen are having much trouble with them. They are not the professional beggars, who are handled easily, because they can be convicted quickly, but the mendicants are mostly able-bodied men, who are willing to work, but can't find employment.

Few, if any, semipublic organizations in the country have a list of more distinguished officers and supporters than the National Employment Exchange. Otto T. Bannard, president of the New York Trust Co., is president; Paul M. Warburg is treasurer; and Eugene H. Outerbridge, secretary. Among the directors are Jacob H. Schiff, Robert W. De Forest, and Francis L. Hine.

Subscribers to the $100,000 fund supporting the exchange includes the Russell Sage Foundation, J. Pierpont Morgan, Frederick G. Bourne, John D. Archbold, John R. MacArthur, Paul M. Warburg, Mortimer L. Schiff, Francis L. Hine, John G. Milburne, James S. Sorymaer, Jacob H. Schiff, John D. Rockefeller, Edward S. Harkness, Robert W. De Forest, George F. Baker, Elbert H. Gary, Otto N. Kahn, V. Everit Macy, Felix M. Warburg, Otto T. Bannard, Isaac N. Seligman, William H. Moore, and L. F. Lorce.

[New York Herald, Apr. 13, 1912.]

UNABLE TO COPE WITH RUSH OF ALIENS; BIGGEST ON RECORD; PERIL TO COUNTRY—HEALTH OF CITY AND NATION MENACED, IT IS ASSERTED, BY LAX INSPECTION—THOUSANDS UNFIT PERMITTED TO ENTER—AUTHORITIES DECLARE FACILITIES AT ELLIS ISLAND ARE INADEQUATE FOR HANDLING GREAT HORDE—MORE BUILDINGS NEEDED—CAN NOT PROVIDE QUARTERS FOR PERSONS WHO SHOULD BE DETAINED PENDING AN INVESTIGATION.

Because of the inadequate facilities for the examination and care of the immigration which is now pouring into this country, and which was reported at its highest tide in the history of the port yesterday, thousands of aliens, diseased both mentally and physically, are permitted to enter and spread their evil influence widely. At Ellis Island, where the immigrants are examined, it is impossible properly to examine the large number of immigrants now, and as a result a gross injury is inflicted upon the health of this country.

For the most part the immigrants come from the unhealthy parts of southern Europe and carry contagious diseases. Many are weak minded, a condition difficult to detect, especially in children, and they are sent here by their relatives abroad because they can receive better care in American institutions. A majority of the immigrants get no farther than this city, and prominent medical authorities here have often declared that the foreigners are responsible for much of the disease in the tenement quarters.

William Williams, commissioner of immigration, stationed at Ellis Island, said yesterday in an interview to the Herald that improvements were sadly needed. He said it was impossible to care for the flood of immigrants during this season, and that of necessity many aliens were passed who should be held for detention.

CONDITIONS IN A BAD WAY.

"I do not want to be an alarmist," he said, "but conditions here are in a bad way. We need additional buildings and additional facilities for handling the increased immigration. As it is, we must rush through with them, and this is hardly fair to the country. There are many cases which should be held until a second and complete examination could be made, but we have not the accommodations for them here. It is a serious question, and Congress should take cognizance of its importance and make ample provisions.

"We have many cases in the spring months, when immigration is heavy, that we can handle only with reasonable care. It would require an expenditure of more than a million dollars for the erection of buildings to properly examine and care for the aliens. I will not say that we are obliged to make a superficial examination of immigrants, but we examine them, under present conditions, only with reasonable care."

The immigration this month has passed the high-water mark. In April of last year, which was a big month and which tested the capacity of the department, 83,575 immigrants arrived at Ellis Island. In April this year the total is expected to be more than 100,000 immigrants, which will be the record for the department.

To date for this month 6,000 more immigrants have arrived than in the same period of April last year. In March of this year, despite the uncertainty of labor, 83,654 immigrants arrived, as against 75,306 of last year, which was one of the biggest years of immigration in the history of the department.

HEALTH OF COUNTRY MENACED.

By those in authority, it is said that Ellis Island, as it is conducted at this time, is wholly inadequate, and as a result the health of the country, and especially of this city, is menaced. Recently the Herald published statistics showing that more than 60 per cent of the occupants of charitable institutions and insane asylums in New York were foreign born and likely entered here under the lax system of the immigration authorities. An official at Ellis Island yesterday said:

"The immigrants coming to this country, especially from the south of Europe, are not the dull, ignorant people they are commonly supposed to be. They are smart, and for the most part clever in their attempts to dupe the immigration officials. There is so much faking among them that it is often difficult to arrive at the truth.

"We have found that many aged men and women, who come here ostensibly to join their sons and daughters, come for no other reason than to enter some American charitable institution for the remainder of their lives. They have no children here, but through agents get other persons to pose as their children until they pass the authorities. We naturally pass them on, as we have no means to detain them until a proper investigation is made."

The same condition is said to exist in the examination of persons for tuberculosis and like diseases. Also, it has been found impossible to properly examine children who are believed to be slightly demented. One official said yesterday that many weak-minded children are passed by the authorities in the rush months of immigration, because they have no time to make a complete examination.

CAN CARE FOR 1,800 AT NIGHT.

Commissioner Williams said yesterday that they can care for only 1,800 persons at night at Ellis Island. When almost twice that number arrives, as is the case this month, the authorities are obliged to rush them through. Aliens who naturally would be detained until a complete examination could be made are permitted to enter this city. Commissioner Williams blames the state of affairs upon Congress for refusing to make appropriations for suitable quarters and facilities to maintain an efficient standard of inspection.

"We are up against it here," said Commissioner Williams, "but the strictest sort of an investigation will prove that we are doing the very best we can in the circumstances. We handle every immigrant with reasonable care, but when they pour in on us as they have in the last few weeks, of course the physicians have to hurry through with their inspection.

"No one is more interested than I in making a thorough examination of immigrants. But what are we going to do? Already we have had complaints about putting the aliens in three-tier cots, the only manner in which we are able to care for 1,800 each night. Last year 749,642 aliens arrived at this port, and of that number 14,500 were deported for various reasons. The steamship agents abroad are responsible in a large measure for accepting as passengers persons who are totally unfit to land here.

WOULD INCREASE THE FINE.

"In 1911 the steamship companies were fined $14,000 for bringing in passengers mentally affected or with contagious diseases. I would favor increasing the fine from $100 to $200 as one means of preventing the rush of foreign imbeciles and unhealthy subjects. It means increased taxation to care for this great number of mentally and physically incapacitated persons. I understand that New York pays more than $8,000,000 annually to care for the indigent insane, and of this number at least two-thirds are foreign born. These figures show the advisability of Congress spending one-eighth of that amount for adequate facilities to make proper examination of aliens coming to this port.

"Our hospital department is totally inadequate for a proper execution of the law relating to the detention of the physically and mentally defective. We are doing the best we can in the circumstances, but it is a serious proposition and means a great deal in the future health of this country.

"We are sadly handicapped in not having sufficient quarters for the immigrants detained pending investigation. And the quarters we have are poorly ventilated and must be used both night and day. Our dormitories are in bad condition, and the responsibility for the continuance of these conditions must rest with Congress.

"The complaint that there are many feeble-minded alien children in the public schools of New York, who have passed Ellis Island, is due to the lack of time and facilities for a thorough examination as to mental condition. It is true that this element of feeble-minded persons forms a large part of the inmates of the Elmira Reformatory and contributes largely to the criminal class. But we make every effort to exclude them. Greater effort should be exercised, I know, to prevent the landing of feeble-minded immigrants. But we can not do that without additional facilities. It is a physical impossibility."

CAUSE FOR ALARM.

That there is cause for alarm from the big influx of immigration now flowing into this country without proper inspection is admitted by everyone familiar with the circumstances. From the plague-ridden districts of eastern and southern Europe thousands of immigrants are coming here every week. There is no question that many of them are suffering with diseases characteristic of their country, and not a few are in the early stages of consumption.

One steamship agent, who canvasses abroad for passengers, declared that he had found that young aliens come to this country for their health. They are made familiar with the examination to which they will be subjected upon their arrival here and fortify themselves for the ordeal.

They also are acquainted with the fact that in March and April an unusually large number of immigrants come to the United States and that the examination at that time must necessarily be conducted in a lax manner. Consequently those who are mentally or physically deficient take advantage of the rush season to enter this country. Once here they are willing to enter a charitable institution, where they will receive better care than at home.

"Ellis Island has all the help, both medical and otherwise, that is necessary," said Daniel J. Keefe, Commissioner General of Immigration, in Washington last night when his attention was called to a report from this city that the immigration records were being broken this month and that the great rush made it impossible for the authorities to make an adequate medical examination.

"The rush always takes place in March, April, and May, and slackens off about June," he said. "It is not unlikely that the record is heavy this month, and I have not seen the figures, but I feel we have all the help that is needed and take no stock in the report that the medical inspection is inadequate or that the health of the Nation is menaced."

Despite this assertion by Mr. Keefe, Commissioner Williams declares the medical inspection is not what it should be. He said that Ellis Island could ordinarily care for the immigration in a proper manner, but during the rush months of spring the heavy tide of immigration made it impossible to take the usual precautions.

Here is an editorial, not a mere distant dispatch, unsigned and unidentifiable, from the New York Evening Mail, which says:

THREE HUNDRED MILLION MORE.

Here is the charming doctrine of put-your-hired-man-in-the-parlor-and-sit-on-the-stoop-yourself finely stated by our contemporary, the New York Times:

There are some 90,000,000 people in the United States. If 400,000,000 were developing its resources the country would support them more comfortably, more prosperously than it can support the 90,000,000. Labor in this land grows by what it feeds on—more men.

More men, and more men, and more men. Never mind the quality of the men—all we want is quantity. More men to keep up the processions of the unemployed. More men for the bread lines. More women and children for the sweatshops. More thousands to populate "lung blocks." More dark-visaged gentlemen of the Mafia, the Camorra, and the Black Hand. More prosperity for the stiletto trade. More and more ignorance of and want of sympathy with original American ideas of the sacredness of individual right and initiative, and more and more encouragement for the intrusive police methods of Europe.

We need men in this country, oh yes; but not so much great numbers of any kind of men as a fair chance for the right sort of men. We are not particularly anxious to have a worse attack of ethnological indigestion than the one we are suffering from at present. Let us give a fair chance to the 100,000,000 to become full-sized, full-brained, sound-hearted Americans before we bring in 300,000,000 more.

In protesting against the proposed turning of the Government departments at Washington into official employment agencies, chiefly for the benefit of new European immigrants, the officials of the American Federation of Labor have done exactly right. Immigration should be restricted, not magnified.

And here is a clipping from the Evening Telegram, of New York City, under date of August 5, on which the ink is scarcely dry, and it says:

Ten thousand arrivals in port aboard 6 steamships, swamping Ellis Island, in one day.

Let the St. Louis railroads go there, since they can no longer import Chinese coolies, and get them if they want them, or get a few of the 150,000 good American farmers that cross each year into Canada, owing to the fact that Canada simply will not admit the indiscriminate immigration we do and which is unquestionably driving and crowding our own good people out of employment. Let me give a good authority. John Mitchell, ex-president of the Mine Workers of America, is one of our best citizens and can be depended upon to state the truth. When questioned at a labor conference in the Department of Commerce and Labor two years ago with regard to whether the present enormous alien influx and efflux pushed those here up in the scale, he said:

No; not at all. If it was, then I would say that there ought to be about 15,000 John Mitchells who were ex-presidents of the United Mine Workers of America, and who are now prominently before the people of the United States. Probably of the thousands of men who, like myself, were pushed up, I was the one who rose where the rest fell. Mr. Secretary, I know what it is to fight against influences that push a man down. The only thing in my experience that I could not do was to beg for something to eat. I always asked a chance to work for my something to eat. But I do know hundreds of men, Mr. Secretary—I have seen them in my life and talked with them, because I have been interested in these problems—I have found hundreds of men who were not quite so sensitive as I was, but whose hardships had hardened them so that they forgot their desire to rise in the world, and, as a result of unemployment, had got into a state of mind and into a condition where they did not want work.

A man who starts out for employment is at first a respectable, high-class man, but he has no place to work and no money to buy food, and just as surely as mingling with depravity lowers a man step by step until he no longer wants to associate with honorable men, so it is that unemployment and beating your way from place to place and associating only with those who will associate with you lowers you down until you forget the condition in which you used to be or until it only comes to you like a lingering memory. Sometimes like a dream these men look back to the pinnacle on which they once were, when they were wage earners, but they have been driven down and have become of the type that has been described. They are tramps, bums, and finally hoboes—men who no longer want work because they have got away from it, just as we find men in other classes of society who go down, down, down, until the better part of their manhood is submerged and they can not rise again. So, instead of these immigrants pushing men up to better planes of society, they push them out. Of course, I know—I have read the books that have been written about one class being supplanted by another in whole communities. I suppose you are familiar with the Slav invasion of the anthracite coal fields; how the English, Irish, and Scotch employees were there first, and then came along the Slavs, and slowly but surely drove them from place to place, and drove them up the valley. Mr. Powderly knows more about it than I do—how the English-speaking men made their last stand right up at Mr. Powderly's home, and now they are going from there. True, some of them have entered the railway service; we have lots of them who are railroad men now, and others have become policemen—strong, big, fine men. But there are hundreds of them, you will find, wandering up and down in America.

In further answer to the gentleman, I want to say that I have the official figures from the Bureau of Immigration in the Department of Commerce and Labor, which show that——

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. In just a minute. These official figures show that the total number of "immigrant aliens" for the last fiscal year, ending June 30, 1912, was 842,000, and that there were also about 200,000 "nonimmigrant aliens," but aliens, just the same, making a total alien influx of over a million. The total emigration was about 500,000. So we got about 500,000 more aliens than left. During the past 10 years 10,000,000 aliens have entered the country, and, according to the steamships, about 4,000,000 have left. But in view of the fact that our foreign-born population increased only a little over 3,000,000, more must have returned than were reported. I have a table here which I will insert in the RECORD that will shed much light on this phase, and which will suggest the way in which not only our working people but we and our institutions and country are being exploited.

The table referred to is as follows:

Table showing immigration, emigration, debarred, etc., for the last 11 years.

[1] Official Government statistics. (Annual report of Commissioner General of Immigration.)

[2] Statistics furnished to the Government by steamship companies. (Required by act of Feb. 20, 1907.)

[3] Not given after 1909.

[4] Since 1900, or for last 11 years.

NOTE 1.—The distinction "immigrant alien" and "nonimmigrant alien" is fanciful, the only difference being as to whether the alien comes for the first time or comes intending to remain. A "nonimmigrant alien" is so classified if the alien says he expects to return to the native land.

NOTE 2.—Although 9,787,239 aliens entered this country during the last census decade (1900 to 1910), the Census Bureau reports that our foreign-born population increased only 3,129,766, which tends to show that the number of alien departures reported by the steamship companies falls short of the number that actually leave the country. The Immigration Commission reports that "at least 40 per cent of those coming return," taking a minimum of $250,000,000 annually out of the country.

As I said, we received 500,000 more last year than went back. Let St. Louis get some of those 500,000 whom the New York Herald and New York State and city officials report as out of employment in Gotham if she is short of labor, and if Teddy can spare some of the negroes from his newborn campaign, maybe you can engage some of them. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has read a newspaper article of dubious authenticity in a western paper stating that the railroads want 80,000 laborers for "summer track work," and that one "Tony Blaisi" had come West from Illinois to look for them. I have not the slightest doubt about the article appearing in a St. Louis newspaper or about there always being a demand for more labor at low wage. Every little while some such article appears out West or down East, apparently for congressional consumption. Why did not Tony Blaisi go to New York or Boston? The article would not bear investigation, in my judgment. At least, other similar articles have not, and to show up precisely the sort of evidence the gentleman offers, I want to read a newspaper article which is to be found in the printed hearings of the House Committee on Immigration for February of this year. It is entitled: "Says western jobs are myths—Bowery Mission makes a test of a demand from Nebraska for 1,000 men—Told all places are filled—The bread line diminishing, but Secretary Earl estimates there are still 150,000 idle men in the city."

The article, from the New York Times, is as follows:

"In an effort just made to place a number of the unemployed men in the Bowery Mission bread lines on farms in Nebraska and the West I find that there is a vast difference of opinion between the newspapers, State officials, and farmers of the West as to the need of more help from the East," said John C. Earl, financial secretary of the Bowery Mission, who is also in charge of the work of the free labor bureau conducted by the mission, to a Times reporter yesterday.

"On February 10 there appeared in two papers published in Omaha, Nebr., stories with flaring headlines telling of the crying need of farmers for help," continued Mr. Earl. "These stories were based on an interview with Deputy Commissioner of Agriculture W. M. Maupin, of Nebraska, in which he said he knew of cases enough to give employment to 1,000 men from the East if they could be obtained. In the course of his interview Mr. Maupin gave the names of 25 farmers, who, he said, he knew to need from 5 to 20 men each.

"A few days after this story appeared in the papers I received a communication from A. W. Frick, of Fentonville, Nebr., in which he inclosed the clippings from both of the papers, and said that if the people of New York who were running the Bowery Mission bread line wanted to they could place a number of men on these Nebraska farms, where help was so badly needed. Mr. Frick intimated, as has been done by lecturers and certain newspaper writers, that the Bowery Mission bread line was composed of a lot of drunken loafers who did not want to work, but were satisfied to remain in New York for the bread and coffee daily.

"I immediately wrote Mr. Frick and asked him to send me the addresses of any farmers who wanted help. I wrote the two newspapers, asking for the same information, and sent a similar letter to Deputy Commissioner Maupin. Then I wrote to each of the farmers whose names and addresses Mr. Maupin had given. In reply the newspapers say they have no addresses; Mr. Frick says that since writing all of the farmers have been supplied with the help they need, and Mr. Maupin replies that there was all the help needed in the State just now. This he says despite the fact that he asserted two weeks ago that the farmers were in need of help and that 1,000 men could be placed. The farmers said they were supplied.

"This is a trouble we are constantly having. Newspapers print stories that help is badly needed in certain sections of the country. We offer to furnish honest, industrious, sober men who are willing to take any kind of work, since they have been out of employment for months, and then we find that the work is not there.

"During the past 12 months the free labor bureau of the Bowery Mission has sent out 3,500 men to farmers, and from reports we have received less than one-half of 1 per cent of the men failed to arrive at their destination and the greater part of them have given satisfaction. Of course there have been some complaints of the men sent, but these complaints are based entirely on the inability of the men to do certain technical parts of the farm work, such as milking a cow or operating a mowing machine, immediately upon their arrival.

"In addition to this a very large proportion of these men have of their own accord written us of their safe arrival and of their satisfaction at the place we found for them. This we regard as very gratifying, for the temptation to the men if they were not honest in their purpose would prove very great. We require the farmers to send the price of transportation. Then we give the men a ticket to their destination and money with which to buy their meals en route."

Mr. Earl said that there were now in this city 150,000 men out of work and that a large number of these are being assisted by their families or friends. He said that the Bowery Mission bread line had fallen off considerably and that it now averages about 2,000 men per night.

"Most of these men are willing to go to work if we can find places for them, and they are being sent out of the city to farms in the near-by States as fast as applications are made for them," said Mr. Earl. "Of course, we have applications for help that we can not fill," he continued. "Some farmers write us for practical farm hands who must be able to do any kind of farm work. Now, on the bread line there are mechanics of all kinds, some clerks, some drug clerks, others who have never been outside of a city to work. Of course they can not do the work offered them, so we are called down for offering help and then not furnishing it. The only thing we offer to do is to furnish help to farmers in the shape of men who are willing to make a try at any work given them. We have thousands of letters from farmers to whom we have sent help thanking us for having done so, but the continued 'knocking' of the bread line by certain charity workers on the lecture platform is hurting our work, for the farmers think we can only send them a lot of drunken, worthless bums, which is not the case.

"During 1908 I wrote the governor of every State in the Union, offering to supply help if he would send the addresses of farmers who wanted hands. From these letters I did not get a single reply showing that there was any great demand for farm hands."

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I gladly yield to my colleague.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Would the gentleman have any objection to informing me what percentage of foreign-born there is in his congressional district?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes, sir. I will say that in the gentleman's city——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am speaking of the gentleman's district; not my city.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am going to answer the gentleman's question. I will say that in the gentleman's district far more than 50 per cent of them are aliens and not one in twenty votes. I will say that in the State of Georgia about 2 per cent only are aliens and about one white in every five or six votes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What is the percentage of aliens in the second congressional district of Georgia that the gentleman represents?

Mr. RODDENBERY. There is no official statement——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What does the gentleman suppose it is?

Mr. RODDENBERY (continuing). But I can give you something like the number. I think it is about 1,000.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What is the rate of illiteracy in the gentleman's district?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Nearly all my folks can read and write; and if there are those that can not, they know just as much about affairs and are just about as educated in that sense as those who can.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. You have 42 per cent illiterate——

Mr. RODDENBERY. I said "my folks." They are citizens, and I represent citizens and not 100,000 aliens. Of course, there are those there who ought never have been brought by Gotham's slave ships—who for 40 years have had their liberty, who for 40 years have been the beneficiaries of taxation imposed on the Caucasians of the South and have had schoolbooks at their command. The illiteracy is with the Africans and not with the Caucasians. Anyway, we have enough illiteracy already. Why import more?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman will concede, I think, that the average rate of illiteracy in his district is 42 per cent and a fraction?

Mr. RODDENBERY. By no means.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The census so shows.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The percentage of literacy in my district is three times as high as that of the Caucasians in the gentleman's district.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Then, why do you not begin to educate those poor negroes in your district—begin right at home the work of education?

Mr. RODDENBERY. They have free schools. We give them absolutely seven months' free schooling every year. At any rate, we have all the illiterates that we care to go to the tremendous expense of trying to enlighten—and the American people have.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The schools do not seem to educate them. You do not seem able to decrease the 42 per cent of illiterates in your district.

Mr. RODDENBERY. We can not endow the negroes with the high instincts for a better life and uplift any more than you can inspire those people of your "Gyp the Blood" assassin type to be good citizens. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It is not the negroes that show the greatest illiteracy down there. The census shows illiteracy of both races, white and colored.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The white illiteracy is very insignificant, and their learning is more accurate than the statistics of the census folks.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am sorry for the census folks.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Lest I misstated the condition of illiteracy in New York—and I will say to my good friend GOLDFOGLE that I think I have not—I will read from Mayor Gaynor, of New York, where he says in a letter written last week to Police Commissioner Waldo:

> You have the hardest police situation in the world to deal with. We have in this city the largest foreign population of any city, and a large number of them are degenerates and criminals. The gambling of the city is almost all in their hands. The published names of every one connected nearly or remotely with Rosenthal and his murder show them to be of the same class of lawless foreigners to which he belonged.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman understand Mayor Gaynor to favor the illiteracy test?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do not understand Mayor Gaynor's position on that—Charlie Murphy, boss of Tammany, is about the only man who can actually tell you that. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, that is a very unfair statement, I want to say, and a very unjust statement.

Mr. MURRAY. Yes, it is; but it is not the first unfair statement the gentleman has made to-day.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes; he has made a number.

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman from Georgia has given some thought to this situation. Does not the gentleman know that Mayor Gaynor is on record as being opposed to this illiteracy test?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I am going to answer that. You take Tammany's political rounders-up, her ward heelers, and go into the slums and dives of the great city and corral this degenerate, corrupting, illiterate mass that extends like a pall over this whole great country, and give them the ballot, and you can make almost any Tammany mayor tremble and be in favor of anything. I do not doubt that Mayor Gaynor stands with southern Europe and southern Italy and all that country against his own country. I do not doubt it.

Mr. MURRAY. Now, may I ask the gentleman what reason he has to believe that Mayor Gaynor has ever been Tammany's mayor of New York City?

Mr. RODDENBERY. For this reason: That whenever a close time comes the Republicans carry the State and Tammany carries the city, and Tammany is just as happy over seeing a victory for the Republican State ticket in New York as the State Republican Party seems to be to see Tammany carry the city for the Democrats. Between the two they divide the spoils. It is an odious shame as broad as human intelligence spreads.

Mr. MURRAY. My last question is: Does the gentleman understand that Mayor Gaynor was Tammany's mayor when he appointed Rhinelander Waldo to the head of the New York police department?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I could not tell the gentleman what I understand about that, because I am not very well posted on those appointments, but no one will contend for a single minute before an intelligent assembly that Gotham is not run by Tammany Hall.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman is not very well posted on New York, either.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I may not be; but if Mayor Gaynor made as bad a job in appointing Waldo as he did in selecting Becker, who went in collusion with the assassins and thieves, he is a hell of a poor mayor. [Laughter.]

But he seems to be an authority and a good witness on the present point. Or, at any rate, his testimony is corroborated by that of the former police commissioner, Col. Theodore Bingham, who, when commissioner, was aroused by the wave of crimes against women and children and made a special investigation, after which he stated to the press:

> There is another very important thing about this crime business. I don't want to say anything that would be indiscreet, but unquestionably the hordes of immigrants that are coming here have a good deal to do with crimes against women and children.
> You will notice that these particular crimes are done by fellows who can't talk the English language. It is this wave of immigration that brings to New York the hundreds of thousands of criminals who don't know what liberty means, and don't care; don't know our customs; can not speak the English language; and are in general the scum of Europe.
>
> The solution of the problem is to prohibit immigration. For when we come to executing present immigration laws it is found to be practically impossible to deport.

And it was Dr. Thomas Darlington, president of the board of health, who observed, after a careful investigation of the pushcart nuisance:

> I have heard the assertion that immigration is necessary to carry on our public works, to build railroads, to dig canals, and the like. But the present immigrants now coming over do not come for that purpose and will not do that sort of work. No; they prefer to become pushcart peddlers and to live in our cities in poverty, breeding crime and disease. They occupy our streets, the streets for which our taxpayers have paid heavily. They interfere with traffic and break the laws of sanitation which we have decided are necessary for the preservation of public health.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me to see if we can fix a time for closing general debate on this bill?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I shall be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Not to interfere with the gentleman's time.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on the pending bill close at a quarter before 5 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate on this measure close at a quarter before 5 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Do not charge me with overstating the corruption of joint rule by Republican grafters aided by Tammany's conspirators or of making sweeping denunciation of the patriotic and law-abiding foreigner. I could not say anything more derogatory of local conditions there than the mayor and these city officials have themselves said.

I had not intended to engage in this line of discussion. Interruptions by gentlemen have forced the digression. We have had pending on the calendar of this House for months immigration bills reported by the Democratic Immigration Committee of this House. I have already, on a former day, shown you by the utterances of our distinguished Speaker and of the distinguished floor leader [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that they stood for legislation restricting undesirable immigration. We have a Rules Committee, for whose members I have the highest regard, and what I read now is in no way to be taken as a reflection upon them. A resolution offered by myself and by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], chairman of the committee, was referred to the Rules Committee two months ago. The chairman of the Committee on Rules addressed a letter to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], chairman of the Immigration Committee, stating that in December they would bring out a special rule for the consideration of this immigration bill. I will insert the letter in the RECORD. It is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON RULES,
Washington, D. C., July 25, 1912.

Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT,
Chairman Committee on Immigration and Naturalization,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. BURNETT: Permit me to acknowledge receipt of your letter of July 16 and to say that the same has had most careful consideration. Your request that the Committee on Rules take favorable action so as to bring before the House the Dillingham bill has been thoroughly considered.

On behalf of the Committee on Rules I will say, as chairman, that early in December of the next session of this Congress the bill will be brought by rule before the House of Representatives in order that it may be duly considered. Just at this time the condition of business before the Committee on Rules and in the House of Representatives is such as to render it impracticable to report a rule and give the bill consideration during the present session.

Thanking you for your letter, I am,
Very truly, yours,

R. L. HENRY,
Chairman Committee on Rules.

On February 28, 1910, the same gentleman, the chairman of the Rules Committee now, wrote a letter to Mr. Barrett, of the Farmers' Union, in which he said, among other things:

Every reasonable effort to secure legislation properly restricting foreign immigration shall receive my support.

Now, in 1912, the gentleman is on the Rules Committee. He is even the chairman of it. Our House committee has acted. Is he "supporting every reasonable effort" when he now speaks of deferring it until next December? Or would "every reasonable effort" be to "support" it now, when the American Federation of Labor pleads for it, when the Brotherhood of Railroad Engineers, Firemen, Trainmen, and other labor associations of the country plead for it, when the Patriotic Order Sons of America pleads for it, sending in thousands of petitions to you, my colleagues; when the Junior Order of American Mechanics and other patriotic organizations petition you to just consider the bill, when farmers, through their National Grange, the Farmers' National Congress, and the Farmers' Union, with its 3,000,000 members, ask and have been asking for months that immigration legislation be considered? Is it giving every favorable support to this legislation to defer it until December? And there is some word around that when it comes up in December they will pass it through the House only to tie it up in conference, in a twist with the Senate and through a quirk of some kind with the House, and that the short session of the Sixty-second Congress will adjourn, and these pleading, patriotic people will again have their birthright of a free country bartered away to alien criminals. I put you on guard now.

There is another member of the Rules Committee who wrote a letter on March 3, 1910. Some criticism was had of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the other day that while he was Speaker and while the Republican Rules Committee were in power they would not consider this legislation two years ago on the eve of the congressional campaigns.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman speaks of "alien criminals." Who are the people to whom he refers by this collective term?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The 500,000 in the United States to-day who are idle, half of whom will not work and the other half of whom do not want to.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I thought the gentleman was referring to the gamblers in New York. I will venture to say that every one of those gamblers is a native American.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Native Americans are a mighty small part of that crowd. Mayor Gaynor says they are "lawless foreigners."

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It may happen that their names sound foreign, because there are some people——

Mr. RODDENBERY. Either BARTHOLDT or RODDENBERY sound a little foreign, to be sure. I do not care what a man's name is nor what country he comes from. If he is of that type of foreigner who will elevate and not degrade our country, I am for him; but if he is the type of a person that can not be assimilated into our country, adapted to our institutions, and become a part and parcel of this great Republic, I am against him, regardless of his birthplace, his country, or his nativity.

Mr. MURRAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY. May I ask the gentleman if he believes he can determine by the reading and writing test which type of immigrant the man coming into the country may belong to?

Mr. RODDENBERY. You can not, absolutely. No statute that can be written on any legislative subject is absolutely perfect, but the congressional Immigration Commission, after a most thorough four years' investigation, recommended it as the "most feasible single method of excluding undesirable immigration."

Mr. MURRAY. The gentleman is arguing in favor of a bill having the reading and writing test.

Mr. RODDENBERY. If the gentleman has time and will examine he will find where I have pending a bill making the head tax $25 instead of $4, subjecting and requiring that every foreigner before he is admitted shall stand the same physical test that is required of American boys for enlistment in the service of the United States Army. If we compel our own native born to go to school to better fit them for the struggle for existence and to participate in our enlightened democracy, why should we not expect as much of foreigners, in addition requiring that each shall bring with him a certificate under seal, duly certifying that he has never been a criminal in his own country and is of good moral character?

I recognize that you can not go that far now, but if we can take the advance step and confine it to those who can read and write and yet not shut out the religiously oppressed, as is provided in the Burnett bill, and not bar out any moral citizen, fleeing from persecution, on account of illiteracy, it is generous to the foreigner and is but a small concession to the Americans who are demanding some legislation at the hands of the Congress of the United States. The 24,000,000 native-born eligible voters in this country are entitled to some consideration. Something can be said for them as well as for the less than 3,000,000 foreign born, for whom the gentleman seems to speak.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes.

Mr. CURLEY. The gentleman says that he is entirely satisfied with the illiteracy test.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Absolutely satisfied, as far as it goes. I prefer citizens of this country, actual as well as prospective, to be able to read, write, and cipher. I am a firm believer in our public-school system.

Mr. CURLEY. Is the gentleman aware that 90 per cent of the persons serving sentences in the jails are able to both read and write?

Mr. RODDENBERY. A very large percentage are able to both read and write; that is correct; but over one-fifth, or over 20 per cent of the aliens can not. These—and what is more important, their offspring, and such a family as the Czolgosz—would have been kept out by it.

Mr. CURLEY. One more question. Does the gentleman feel that his sweeping denunciation of both the Jews and the Italians, based on the newspaper article supposed to have been given out by Mayor Gaynor, of New York, is justified in view of the fact that every indication points to the fact that these men who committed the crime were hired to commit it by a person or persons born in this country?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes; he might have been an American, a Caucasian, and going back to the Teutons, and all the rest. But it is the illiterates that are his fertile field and constitute the conditions that make him and the corrupt boss all the more possible and powerful.

Mr. CURLEY. Does not the gentleman feel that instead of condemning the Italians and the Jews as races because of the crime committed that the real instigator of the crime, the person who paid the money for the commission of the crime, is the one who should be condemned—the native-born American?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes; and if Tammany Hall does its duty, she will put him in a felon's stripes and hang him by the neck or electrocute him. No one condemns the Italian or Jew as a race. I am far from it.

Mr. CALDER. I want to say to the gentleman that we have a Republican district attorney in the city of New York who, thank God, will take good care to put him and all of his associates in jail.

Mr. RODDENBERY. "Catching" comes before "putting." There is a murder every day in New York and a robbery in its parks, but not one in a hundred is convicted. If your Republican district attorney is as slow in putting him in jail and convicting him as your Republican Party has been to pass the immigration legislation, Becker will live a free man and die a natural death. [Laughter.]

Mr. CURLEY. I do not think the gentleman from Georgia was sincere when he said that every immigrant should present a certificate of good moral character from the Government under which he had lived.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Well, by some constituted authority which the United States would recognize. The nine distinguished members of the Immigration Commission in their 42-volume report recommended something of the kind.

Mr. CURLEY. Because, as the gentleman realizes, it would be absolutely impossible for an immigrant Jew to secure a certificate from Russia.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Well, I am a sort of a son of Abraham myself, and we would squeeze up and let the good ones in anyhow. [Laughter.] No one is proposing the impossible.

Mr. CURLEY. Does not the gentleman realize that that is true of nearly every other country?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Oh, my good friend from Massachusetts wants to ask too many questions, and I decline to yield further. Now, gentlemen will remember, before I was interrupted I had adverted to the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and his Committee on Rules, for stifling immigration legislation. On the 4th of April a year ago the Democrats assumed charge of the affairs in this House. Since then we have had a Democratic Speaker and a Democratic Committee on Rules. I do not seek to give any comfort to the Republicans, but I seek to do them, as I do all men, justice, as little as the Republicans perhaps deserve in this particular. In 1910–11, when immigration bills were pending before the House or Republican Rules Committee my distinguished colleague, Mr. POU, of North Carolina, now a member of the Democratic Rules Committee, wrote to Mr. Barrett, president of the Farmers' Union, as follows, touching "immigration legislation without delay":

I shall be very glad to aid in securing the enactment of this legislation, but the outcome will depend almost entirely on the attitude of the Speaker and his Committee on Rules.

Who were we Democrats dodging behind in 1910? We laid it to the Republican Committee on Rules.

Now, the author of this letter, for whom I have the highest regard, and in whom I have the utmost confidence—I call his attention to his own accusation and his own statement, and while he is now a member of the Committee on Rules would it be proper for me to say, in writing to one of my constituents, that a Democratic House would vote to pass this legislation, but an autocratic Committee on Rules would not permit it? Is not that the precise fact, however?

There is no use to undertake to deceive the people of this country about it. We have a Committee on Rules composed of Democrats who, with two possible exceptions, are, in writings now before me, committed to this type of legislation. Why does it not get out of the Committee on Rules? Do you say you will impair the prospects of the Democratic Party by injecting this question into it before the national election? The great dominant party in the House of Representatives actually declining to consider wholesome legislation when its highest officer, its controlling genius on the floor, its powerful Rules Committee, its faithful Committee on Immigration under the leadership of the gentleman from Alabama, and the rank and file of the Democratic membership of this House is in favor of this legislation?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Not now.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, this is the third time that I have requested the gentleman to yield.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I decline to yield now. I will in a moment. With this condition existing, gentlemen, I ask you in the light of day, as a Member of the House, what influence, what power, what political legerdemain, what intrigue, what patriotism, what lofty class of our citizenship is standing in the way of this legislation? Does it lower the standard of American citizenship? Will it impair our institutions to pass it? Will it degrade our morals to enact it? Will it estrange us from countries who want to see America fail, to pass it? Ah, the voice of sordid interest, the foreign flags on ships from alien lands, formed as they are in a combination of great shipping combine, wish to prevent it in order that they may continue to gather from the foreign herd who come here millions for their ungodly coffers, that they may dump them on the shores of America to build a cesspool of crime, of violence, of turbulence, and death, that will literally strike down the mighty ægis of America's prowess in the constellation of civilized lands. [Applause.]

As you sit here now as the representatives of American manhood, of American citizenship, of American religious institutions, of American homes, of American womanhood, of American virtue, of pure-State government, of pure-municipal government, will you not rise up and demand of the leaders of this House that they enact this wholesome legislation in response to the appeals of millions? Fail to do it, if you will, but in your presence, without fearing and without counting the consequences, I now assert that the people of this country who love our land, its glory, its past, and its future will curse you and scourge you at the ballot box. Are we cowards, are we driveling slaves of a foreign sentiment, crouching and cringing under the tyrannical hand of the Shipping Trust? Does the Liberal Immigration League, inspired by corruption and born in a putrid desire to flood our land with vice, control us, or will we answer a hundred thousand separate petitions containing millions of names asking for this legislation? It will not do for gentlemen to say I make a wholesale tirade against the Jew, the Italian, the Greek, and all the races that give us so many good citizens. I am familiar with the foreign names that now stand in our public places as honorable marks to their service in the formative period of our country's history, and the loyalty of thousands of good citizens that habitat here now. I cast no aspersion upon them. I close the door to no good man seeking a land of liberty and freedom, where he may become a part of it and share in its glories and help add to its greatness. His name may be Pestrowski or Ostrowsinski, Dropinski, or Dropoutski. That has nothing to do with the case. Mine is somewhat peculiar itself; but can we not place some curtailment around our great country? Canada has laws and an administrative policy that make ours look ridiculous according to the Immigration Commission. Australia and other new countries have had for years an illiteracy test requiring the alien to read 50 words in an European language. We exclude the Chinese. Why not restrict a little more? The evils are established by an official congressional investigation that suggests the remedies. I appeal to my colleagues on the Rules Committee. Will you obey the voice of the people or the commands of the foreign Shipping Trust? I call on the Democratic Rules Committee to hear the voice of the true American in America, whether native or naturalized, who is bound by every tie of patriotism and of blood to this country, and not to yield themselves to him who speaks not our tongue, who knows not our flag, and who loves not our land.

I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois for a question.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in his excited state has made several statements which I hardly think he intended to make——

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield for the gentleman to make any apologies for me. He will have plenty of them to make at home before the November catastrophe in the neighborhood of his district. I will look out for my own.

Mr. SABATH. I desire to ask this question, because I desire to set the gentleman right.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield to be set right by the gentleman. Let him go to Chicago, into her slums, her dens of vice, her cesspools of corruption, where they buy and sell United States Senators like a Southern cracker buys or sells a cow, and set them right.

Mr. SABATH. That is unqualifiedly false. The city of Chicago is as clean a city as any city in the United States.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

Mr. SABATH. And I deny that statement.

Mr. RODDENBERY. It does not make any difference. The record of a court at the other end of this Capitol shows a judgment by sedate Senators and incomparable statesmen, who have put upon the name of Chicago and her politics the most accursed blight for barter and sale of high office and of citizenship with which any country has ever been defamed.

Also I have seen the book of 400 pages, entitled "The Social Evil in Chicago," that constitutes the report of that city's vice commission, a municipal body appointed by the mayor and city council to study the conditions, and I want to say that I am not surprised at its being excluded from the mails, or at the Immigration Commission's report that "many women are being regularly imported for immoral purposes under conditions that amount to absolute slavery," that "There is an apparently growing criminal element in this country due to foreign immigration," and that our existing laws are so "weak and inadequate" that "many undeniably undesirable persons are admitted to this country every year."

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RODDENBERY. For a question.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What, in the name of heaven, has that to do with the question of literacy?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman fails to see the point. No one was discussing literacy. I am not even discussing the immigration bill, but I want to get it discussed, and then I will tell the gentleman if he still does not know. I undertook to get the leaders to set aside to-night for that purpose. At some future time, in this session or at the next session, I shall discuss this pending bill. I will then be glad to enlighten the gentleman. All I am trying to do now is to get Members the chance to show and vote what it has "to do." I am making an appeal to the democracy of the country through the Democrats of the House not to follow in the path of Cannonism and Republicanism, which we have so stoutly criticized, by stifling this legislation, and to rise to the heights of Democratic duty and do what the Republicans did not do, pass it—and pass it now.

I read from the Manufacturers' Record:

We are laying up physical, mental, and moral trouble for our people. Who is to blame? The blame rests primarily upon politicians, big and little, truckling to alien elements among the voters.

That is from one of the great trade, industrial, and commercial papers of the country. I see now that the New York papers—the Herald, the Times, the World, the Press, the Sun—and if I have the time to read them I will do so—in glaring headlines are saying almost every day that the city is swamped with alien problems; that even the alien insane are crowding their hospitals to overflowing and costing the taxpayers millions of dollars annually. Every great metropolitan paper in

New York State is filled, not once a week but well-nigh every day, with declamations showing to the country how the influx of this class of people, unguarded, unrestricted, and unsifted, is coming into the greatest metropolis of our country, is destroying the city whose power, whose growth, whose magic, and the wonder of whose marvelous developments are admired by every country in the world.

But I desire the gentleman to understand that in the observations made upon the corruption of his city and its government I have nothing but praise for the magnificent splendor of that great city, which, planted on an island of the Atlantic, overmatches and outclasses any metropolis in all the universe; a great people, wonders of genius, matchless for progress and growth, but at the very rock and very root, at the very vitals of the political institutions of that municipal government stands the black and obnoxious alien which poisons and destroys. Preserve the good in it if it is not too late. Boston has lost its local self-government and is now in reality ruled by two commissions appointed by the governor of the Commonwealth and not elected by the people of the city. Year by year those cities present problems of greater magnitude as a result of our inadequate immigration laws, and I recognize that gentlemen on the Democratic side from cities and districts where the alien vote is potential are moved by human motives, as we all are moved. I recognize and share with considerate feeling the sentiments that move such Members upon this question, because it involves misunderstanding, it involves misjudgment, difficulty of explaining the merits of the bill, and possibly political defeat, but I know there is no Democrat here who, in order to write upon the statute books of our Government a law further restricting immigration that this country, its institutions, and ideals might be preserved, would not surrender his seat any day if need be. I have no unkindness for any Member, but it seems to me that the time has been reached and the day has come, that the hour has arrived when inaction and silence should not be the answer to the millions of our constituents who demand this legislation. Gentlemen, we all of us who have been telling the folks at home we want it and want it now—I speak to you in family council—what have you done to pass this law and give effect to the will of the people who sent you here? Where is the Member on the Democratic side from Florida, from Mississippi, from Indiana, from Illinois, from Iowa, from Ohio, from Kansas, from Massachusetts, from Pennsylvania, from New York, and other States—where, gentlemen, will you find in the record that you have fought your way through to an opportunity to demand this legislation? I ask it in absolute candor. I can do injustice to no man, because the record will speak the truth.

Shall we sit supine? Shall we let a few powerful leaders who carry us one way one month and turn and seek to lead us another the next month absolutely dominate our independence? By the everlasting gods I will not, in all humility and respect. I will surrender the seat I hold here before in suppliance I will yield the judgment I have for the good of the country and my obligations to my immediate constituency in deference to the will or leadership or power or influence of any mortal man. [Applause.] He who will should have no place in the council of American legislators. Here it is before us. Can we do nothing? Will we put it off until December to try to catch the foreign votes? Let Congressmen A and Congressman B go back home and say to the foreigner, "Boys, you remember the Republican Senate passed the Dillingham bill over there and we had the Burnett bill on the calendar and we got together and we agreed to smash it?" To perdition with such endeavors to gain political favor anywhere! No party should be intrusted with power in this Government which would obtain it by any fraud, deception, or subterfuge. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? The gentleman referred to the Dillingham bill, and I want to tell him now that the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, by a unanimous vote, struck out of the Dillingham bill everything contained in the Dillingham bill following the enacting clause to the last section of that bill, and then substituted, by a majority vote of the committee, the Burnett bill, providing only for a literacy test, so when the gentleman speaks of the Dillingham bill the committee killed that from A to Z.

Mr. RODDENBERY. But I would say to the gentleman the bill we considered and failed to pass last Monday in regard to insane aliens landing in New York is word for word, line for line, letter for letter, comma for comma, section 9 of the Dillingham bill, and the gentleman will not deny it. The House committee killed nothing. It reported the whole Dillingham bill from A to Z June 7, with a killing recommendation, to be sure, but the House does not have to and will not on a yea-and-nay vote adopt in toto the committee's recommendation, in my judgment. And now that the insane aliens, imbeciles, lunatics, and idiots are overcrowding New York you want to stop legislation for the country and pass that bill, because the insane, imbeciles, and idiots can not vote.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That is separate from the Dillingham bill; that has nothing to do with the Dillingham bill.

Mr. RODDENBERY. It is a copy, letter for letter, of the most of section 9.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And we reported it from the committee unanimously and recommended its adoption.

Mr. RODDENBERY. After the Dillingham bill passed the Senate, and you reported a number of other bills that contain a number of sections of the Dillingham bill, word for word, too. The Dillingham bill was being considered week after week, and it was a foregone conclusion that it would pass the Senate.

Mr. SABATH. I desire to enlighten the gentleman—

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do not care to be enlightened by the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. No; the gentleman does not desire to have any information.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I yield for a question, but I decline to yield for a speech.

Mr. SABATH. Then I will make it a question. The gentleman stated that the Dillingham bill passed before this bill. which was under consideration here a few days ago. Now, I want to inquire the day when the Dillingham bill passed?

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do not remember the date; I have it here on my desk.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman stated it passed before the Kindred bill passed or was reported. I desire to correct the gentleman.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The Dillingham bill, so called, was reported from a Democratic-Republican committee of the Senate weeks and weeks before you reported the Kindred bill to the House, and even before the Kindred bill was introduced into the House.

Mr. SABATH. I desire to state this bill has been reported—if I am not mistaken, in the month of February——

Mr. RODDENBERY. Well, that makes no difference.

Mr. SABATH. And if it had not been for the gentleman it would have been passed before.

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman is twice mistaken, and I make the statement that the Kindred bill is line for line and sentence for sentence that of section 9 of the Dillingham bill, and, if it will accommodate the gentleman, the so-called Dillingham bill, containing the legislation recommended by the Immigration Commission, and also introduced in the House and referred to the gentleman's committee early in January, was reported to the Senate and considered there and great progress made on it two months before the Kindred bill was reported to the House.

If it will accommodate the gentleman, although I do not know it is so, I will say that the House bill was reported two months before the Dillingham bill passed the Senate. I am willing to say that, if it will accommodate the gentleman, although I do not concede the fact. And in turn I want the gentleman to concede the indisputable fact that the bill he calls the Kindred bill was not introduced in the House until long after the Dillingham bill was reported to the Senate and favorable action on it was practically assured, and that it appears on its face to be simply a slice of section 9 of the Dillingham bill, which is 39 sections long. Not only that, but that practically every other one of the several bills reported by the House Committee on Immigration are a section or sections of the Dillingham bill word for word.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is correct, I think, in the statement that the Kindred bill was reported some time before the passage of the Dillingham bill; and in justice to the Committee on Immigration of the House I desire to say to my friend that there were many features of the Dillingham bill that perhaps every Member of the House committee did not favor. There was the last section of the Dillingham bill, for example, which it was believed would absolutely repeal the Chinese exclusion law. That is just one of the features.

Those of us who are in favor of this restrictive legislation believe that, in the interest of success in securing the passage of some legislation, all after the enacting clause should be stricken out, and that the Burnett bill should be substituted in lieu of that. There were many features—I desire to say to my friend and colleague from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY]—that were worthy and should be enacted into law, but there were so many things which we thought would cause confusion and debate and difference of opinion that every member of the committee who favored restriction of immigration—every member of it—was in favor of the substitution and in favor of the reporting of that bill as a substitute.

The gentlemen who oppose the illiteracy test, I desire to say, favored the striking out of all after the enacting clause of the Dillingham bill and substituting in lieu of it the Burnett bill; but they voted against the reporting of the bill after that substitution was made.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Giving notice that we were opposed to the Burnett bill, and voting against it?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; exactly.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have given five minutes to my colleague from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], to explain the Burnett bill and the Dillingham bill, and I will say to him, sir, that that five minutes is more than the Democratic Committee on Rules has accorded him or his committee to discuss this bill. [Applause.] I am glad to have been able to give the gentleman that much time for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have undertaken to yield as liberally and as fairly as possible.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Not now. I want to say to gentlemen that I have not been by design discourteous to any Member, but gentlemen must understand that in a discussion which comes up as unexpectedly and takes on the range that this has taken, necessarily with numerous interruptions, we may not have been fully regardful of some of our colleagues. But we have been glad to present our humble views to the House of Representatives, touching not the merits of this bill—for we have not undertaken, except incidentally, to discuss it—touching not the provisions of the Dillingham bill or of the Burnett bill, because we have not undertaken to do that, though I shall perhaps do so at a future time. I have only purposed to present to the House and the country in a general way the status of the immigration legislative situation in a House of Representatives where the Democrats have 63 majority, and where they have had 16 months of control, with an Immigration Commission's report of 42 volumes that cost about a million dollars, before it, and whose nine distinguished members—the entire commission of nine, composed of three Senators, three Congressmen, two Federal officials, and an educator of international reputation—came to a unanimous finding that the welfare of this country, the integrity of our institutions, the safety of our Government, the purity of our civilization, and the sanctity of our homes, urgently needed to be protected and fostered by the passage of restrictive immigration legislation. To a man, all nine, even though at least six of them were of a different opinion at the beginning of the five years' searching investigation at home and abroad, concurred in their report to Congress that "substantial restriction is demanded by economic, social, and moral considerations," and eight of the nine—the ninth being a Republican, and failing to be returned to this House—urge the illiteracy test as the "most feasible" method of excluding undesirables.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman inform me where I will find that in that report?

Mr. RODDENBERY. The gentleman will find it in one of the 42 volumes of the Immigration Commission's report that has just been published by the Federal Government and a set of which is to the gentleman's credit in the House document room. The gentleman will find it in the "Brief statement of conclusions and legislative recommendations," submitted by the commission a little over a year ago and printed as Senate Document No. 680. The gentleman will find it in this year's printed hearings of the Immigration Committee, which reported the Burnett bill and of which the gentleman is a member, I beg to inform him. He will find it there and also in a number of other public records that have been placed on file in the last six months in the House of Representatives, and with which as a Member he ought to be familiar.

Finally, gentlemen, without your help we can not get consideration of this legislation now; with it, we can. I am loyal in my Democracy. It may be that the Bull Moose, after he has staggered and terrified New England, after he has made an onslaught in the far West, sweeping the regulars into the sea and bringing the insurgents within his fold, will turn to the southward and there, with all his animal ferocity, make a charge upon southern strongholds. But I apprehend, gentlemen, that even then in my feeble way I shall be holding allegiance to the cause of true Democracy, and be taking my fortunes and my faith with her when many of you will be seeking other party pastures in which to graze and other homes in which to house your political fortunes.

It may be so. But however that be, let us rise now, leaving the trails of stand-pat Republicanism, held under the dominance of sectionalism no longer, listening no more to the wiles and wails of shipping interests, clasping hands with the American farmer, with the American laborer, with the American wage earner, with the American fireman, with the American mechanic, with the American conductor, with the American engineer, with the American ministry, with American womanhood and American manhood, let us turn and clasp them by the hand in solemn troth and say, "Out of regard for you we will pass this legislation and write it into law. Proclaim to them that we will not play politics with it. We will not tide it over the present national campaign. We will not attempt to deceive by not passing it now and promising to take it up later. We will not put it in the power of its enemies to tie it up in the closing days of the short session next winter and finally kill it. But now, in the first regular session of a Democratic House for 15 years, we will stand for the integrity of American citizenship, we will stand to make permanent and abiding her civil manhood. As Democratic Representatives we will proclaim with out ballots continued guaranty that the sacred hearthstone of the American home and its pure womanhood shall not have poured out upon it the vile criminal dregs of Europe, day by day and year by year, to blight and curse and shatter and destroy the great country that our forefathers transmitted to us, that our immediate fathers have preserved, and that a trusting constituency of 90,000,000 people have placed in our hands, to legislate for in honor, in good faith, with intelligence, with wisdom, and with patriotism." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CURLEY] is recognized for the remaining time, until a quarter to 5, when general debate closes under order of the committee.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to participate in the debate here this afternoon, and were it not for an answer made by the gentleman from Georgia to a question asked of him, I believe I would hesitate to discuss this subject. The question asked was as to the number of foreign-born people in the gentleman's district. He said it was somewhere in the vicinity of 1,500. Listening to his tirade here this afternoon against the Jew, the Italian, and every other race, it suggested to my mind the old story that was told by Abraham Lincoln in one of his campaigns, of the farmer who was seated at his kitchen table, the gun reposing over the fireplace. This farmer had very bushy eyebrows. He suddenly said to his son, "Hand down that gun, son; there is a squirrel climbing the tree." And he took the gun and fired three times. The son said, "What are you shooting at, Pop?" The father said, "The squirrel on that tree." The son said, "There isn't any squirrel on the tree, Pop. That is an ant on your eyebrow." [Laughter.]

When the gentleman proclaims against immigration, and there is no immigration to his district, he is in relatively the same position as the old farmer was who was firing at the squirrel when, in fact, it was only the ant that was browsing on his eyebrow.

Now, Mr. Chairman, listening to the discussion relative to the application of the illiteracy test, one would labor under the impression that the average person of prominence in the history of this country was born with a college education. However, the contrary is the case. The Century Magazine of May, 1912, published an interesting list showing the manner in which the ancestors of leading Americans of to-day were accustomed to sign their names. The list is exceedingly illuminating. The first name is that of Andrew Harrison, who signed his name by making half of a cross and a triangle. Yet Andrew Harrison made it possible for this country to have two Harrisons as Presidents of the United States. [Applause.]

Charles Gresham, ancestor of the man for whom we to-day name our leading revenue cutter, signed his name by making two circles connected. That was the limit of his education. Ephriam Maguffey, whose descendant was one of our learned men and whose reader is the standard textbook in our public schools to-day, made his signature by one straight line and three lines leading off it; in other words, the letter E was the way Ephriam Maguffey signed his entire name. Cassandrey Goulding, ancestor of one of the leading men of this country, made his signature by a half circle.

The name of Parker is one of the most famous names in the history of this country, a name that is associated with Lexington Green, where was struck perhaps the first blow in the cause of human liberty that made possible this Republic. Elinor Parker signed his name in the same fashion as we make the abbreviation & at the present time.

Arthur Hodges, who has added to the wealth and fame of this country through the brilliancy of his descendants and their inventive genius, signed his name by crossing six lines in different directions. Edward Coffey, another illustrious character, made his signature by one straight line and three lines leading from it. The name of Pearson is illustrious in the history of this country. George Pearson made his signature like the ear of a human being. That was as near as he could come to the alphabet. The descendants of William Taylor have been famous in the history of this country. He made his signature with a cross, and a period at each end of the cross. Henry Powell made his signature with two straight lines and one curve. John Henderson, famous in the history of the country, had a capital H for his signature.

The fact remains, Mr. Chairman, that it is not education after all that is necessary in the immigrant coming to this country. The need of the hour is an honesty of purpose, a clear conscience, and a sturdy frame. [Applause.]

I have here a few clippings from recent publications calling attention to the necessity for help in various lines. New York needs 100,000 servants:

WOMEN WHO ARE WILLING TO ENTER SERVICE GROWING SCARCE, LICENSE COMMISSIONER SAYS.

An exhaustive report on New York employment agencies, which Commissioner of Licenses Herman Robinson has prepared, was turned in to Mayor Gaynor yesterday by the commissioner. The servant problem, which is dealt with in detail, shows that there is a great scarcity of servants. More than 100,000 of them could find employment if they were here.

The report covers the license year ended May 1, and deals with the problems of the distribution of labor, failure of the "back to the farm" movement, congestion of aliens in cities, and objections to establishing free State employment agencies, and it also suggests remedies for abuses in the labor camps. Employment bureaus regulated by the commissioner of licenses include domestic servants' agencies, or so-called intelligence offices, theatrical, shipping, stenographic, and labor agencies. Most of the difficulties of supervision have to do with intelligence offices. The report says:

"The difficulties of the servant problem are increasing, due to the dearth of servants. In New York City more than 100,000 servants could find work, in addition to those already employed. Scarceness of number naturally makes the servant independent, and permits her to dictate her terms. The fact that employment agents in the east side of Manhattan and Brownsville section of Brooklyn never take a fee from a girl for getting her a place, but make the employer pay the fee for both, plainly proves the difference between supply and demand."

The labor shortage in Pennsylvania is alarming. Twelve hundred coke ovens in the Connellsville region have been blown out for lack of men. One hundred thousand men could be used there, and the same demand is heard in every section of the country.

PITTSBURGH, PA., May 19, 1912.

Pittsburgh is experiencing a labor famine so serious that many big industries are advertising far and wide to get men. Last week the shortage in the Connellsville coke region necessitated the blowing out of 1,200 ovens at a time when record prices are being charged for foundry and furnace sizes. Contractors having big jobs are offering higher wages than have been paid since the boom years preceding the panic of 1907.

Some concerns in the Pittsburgh district sent agents to accost men walking in the streets who appeared to be idle. The employing agent of one corporation said he could give work to 7,000 laborers.

The Pittsburgh Army and Navy recruiting stations are complaining that it is impossible to get men for enlistment. The Army station has started an advertising campaign, literally plastering the Pittsburgh district with colored posters, on which are set forth the inducements the Government offers for able-bodied men. It has brought no results. Employers are asking what has become of the laborers. Since 1907 more than 100,000 laborers have left the Pittsburgh district. Many returned to their native lands, where in recent years wages have advanced considerably without any appreciable increase in the cost of living. The McCormick Steamship Agency here reports that hundreds of foreigners have gone from Pittsburgh to the Argentine and other South American countries. This is corroborated by R. S. Abezinski, a large employer of workingmen, who said:

"There is just now a great boom in Argentina and Brazil. Steamship companies are unable to furnish enough transportation for the Americans and Europeans who want to go to these countries. Not only are opportunities better in South America, but things have improved in Europe. In Italy great public works are in progress and wages have risen remarkably. Five or six years ago laborers could be hired for 2 lire a day. Now they get 4 or more. In Poland wages have quadrupled in 10 years. The cost of living has not advanced in these countries as it has here. Emigration from Germany has practically ceased. It is coming to be the same in all parts of Europe, even in Italy and Austria.

"Added to these causes is the disposition of Congress to place greater restrictions upon immigration. The laws are strict enough, and if our labor market is not to be depleted Congress must stop adding difficulties to the immigrant seeking to make a home here."

Upon the subject of illiteracy in the United States, and more particularly as to New York, much has been said that is neither just or true.

The following statements are taken from Bulletin 26 of the Bureau of the Census entitled "Illiterary in the United States." It was published in December, 1905, and contains the latest available material, as far as I can determine, on this subject:

The proportion of illiterates in the native white population at least 10 years of age is 46.4 per 1,000, or approximately 5 per cent; in the foreign-born white population the proportion is 128.5 per 1,000, or more than 12.5 per cent. The contrast is less marked among the children in these classes of population, the illiteracy for native white children being 33.6 per 1,000 and for foreign-born white children 55.8 per 1,000.

In continental United States the native white children of native parentage are more illiterate than the native white children of foreign parentage, the proportion for the former being 44.1 per 1,000 and for the latter 8.8 per 1,000.

The following table shows the proportionate illiteracy in foreign countries on the most recent dates available. This table is taken from the Report of the United States Commissioner of Education, 1899–1900 (vol. 1, p. 785):

Country or State.	Per 1,000 illiterate.	Year.
German Empire	1.1	1893
Sweden and Norway	1.1	1893
Switzerland	3.0	1897
Denmark	5.4	1891
Finland	16.0	1892
Scotland	35.7	1893
Netherlands	40.0	1897
England	58.0	1893
France	49.0	1897
Belgium	128.0	1897
Ireland	170.0	1893
Austria	238.0	1895
Hungary	281.0	1894
Greece	300.0	1897
Italy	383.0	1895
Spain	681.0	1889
Portugal	790.0	1890
Russia	617.0	1894
Servia	860.0	1890
Roumania	890.0	1892

These figures are taken from census reports in only four instances, as no complete census had been made to determine the total number of persons unable to write in the countries given. In the case of Scotland, England, and Ireland the number given is the number of persons in every thousand applying for marriage certificates who are not able to sign the certificate. In the case of the 13 other countries mentioned the number given is the number in every thousand army recruits unable to read or write. In comparing these figures for illiteracy in foreign countries with illiteracy in the United States the number of persons in the United States between 21 and 24 years of age should be taken. In 1900, 50.3 persons in every thousand between these ages were illiterate. The number of such persons in the North Atlantic division, which includes the New England States, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, was 50.4 per thousand. The total illiteracy in the United States was 106.6 per thousand of the population at least 10 years of age. This means that over one-tenth of the population of the United States 10 years of age or over can not read or can not write. However, there are in the country 955,843 persons who are able to read, but not write. These partial illiterates are included, however, in all statistics given by the Census Bureau as "illiterates." The following figures give the number of illiterates in each thousand of population at least 10 years of age, classified by race and nativity:

The total for the United States, 106.6 per 1,000.
Native white of native parents, 57.2 per 1,000.
Native white of foreign parents, 16.4 per 1,000.
Foreign-born white, 128.5 per 1,000.
Negro, 444.7 per 1,000.
Indian, 561.6 per 1,000.
Chinese, 289.6 per 1,000.
Japanese, 182.1 per 1,000.

These figures are significant for several reasons. First, the class of people among whom the greatest amount of illiteracy exists are no longer a factor in the immigration laws, as Negroes and Indians are already in the country—and practically no persons of these races are immigrants to-day—while the Chinese are excluded by the laws of the country. Second, while the foreign-born white is a little more than twice as illiterate as the native white, the native white of foreign parentage is only 28 per cent as illiterate as the native white of native parents; that is, there are 16.4 native white of foreign parentage illiterate in a thousand to 57.2 in every thousand of native white of native parents. The actual number of native white illiterates of foreign parentage was 139,814, and of native parents, 1,344,093.

CHILD ILLITERACY (CHILDREN 10 TO 14 YEARS OF AGE).

In general, foreign-born white children are much more illiterate than native white children. In 1900, 33.6 native born per thousand were illiterate, while 55.8 per thousand foreign born were illiterate. A comparison of the illiteracy statistics for native white children, classified by nativity of parents, reveals the fact that in continental United States there is greater illiteracy among the children of native whites than among the children of foreign-born whites—44.1 per thousand for the former and 8.8 for the latter. "This fact might be taken to indicate that immigrants are more anxious than natives to secure for their children the advantages of elementary education." The total number of native white children of native parents was 4,660,390, of which number 205,735 were illiterate. The total number of native white children of foreign parents was 1,987,283, with 17,473 illiterate.

ILLITERACY IN THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

Hon. A. S. Draper, State commissioner of education, has made a careful study of illiteracy in the State of New York, which has been published in a bulletin of the New York State Education Department in 1906. The figures given are taken from the census of 1900. As New York State receives by far the greatest number of immigrants to the United States, the problem of handling this class is more acute there than in any other section of the country. A study of conditions in that State, therefore, is of particular value. The following quotations are taken from his bulletin:

New York has more to meet in the way of new immigrants in her population than any other State. Between 1870 and 1880 her population increased 700,112; between 1880 and 1890 it increased 914,982, and between 1890 and 1900 it was enlarged by 1,270,159. A very large part of this was foreign born. The percentage of foreign-born white illiterates has not changed very much, however, either in the State or in the country in 40 years.

The population of New York State in 1900 was 5,871,102, of which number 318,100 were illiterate. The number of illiterate per 1,000 population was 54. In a table giving the rank of each State in percentage of illiteracy in 1900 New York stands nineteenth, with 5.5 per cent illiterate. Iowa stands first, with 2.3 per cent. Twenty-four States have less than 6 per cent. Ten States have more than 20 per cent, with Louisiana last, with 38.5 per cent. Among the voters of New York State 59 in every 1,000 are illiterate. The total number of illiterate voters is 130,000. The total sum of voters is 2,184,965.

The number of illiterates per 1,000 of population above 10 years of age and the number of illiterate voters per 1,000 are very similar in the two tables; quite as much so as could be expected.

As such a large number of immigrants entering New York remain in New York City and in other large cities in the State, illiteracy might be expected to be more predominant in these cities. Mr. Draper says:

We would probably expect to find a larger proportion of illiterates in the cities, particularly in the city of New York, than in the farming districts. But it is not so. Taking the counties together which comprise the city of New York, and figuring from either table, we find that in that city there are about 66 illiterates in 1,000 people. There are a dozen strictly rural counties in which the number is larger. There are 25 rural counties in which the number of illiterates per 1,000 of population is larger than in Brooklyn or Buffalo. The better and more convenient school accommodations in the cities are breaking down illiteracy more satisfactorily than is being done in the country districts.

A study of the statistics relative to native white illiterate children of native parents and the same of foreign parents and also the number and percentage of illiterates who were foreign born show that in New York State the total number of illiterate native white of native parents was 29,188, or 9.2 per cent; the total number of illiterate native white of foreign parents was 18,162, or 5.7 per cent; the total number of illiterate foreign-born white was 258,423, or 81.1 per cent.

We expect to find the larger percentage of illiteracy among the recent immigrants, and we do so find. The foreign-born illiterates are 81 per cent of the whole number. But we also find that there is a larger percentage of appreciation of school privileges, or some other fortunate factor, among foreign-born than native-born parents. The percentage of illiterates born in this country of foreign-born parents (5.7 per cent) is much lower than the percentage (9.2 per cent) of illiterate children of native-born parents.

In 1900 there were 565,000 illiterate white voters in the United States who were foreign born, but there were 688,000 illiterate white voters who were native born. The percentage of illiterate voters among the native-born sons of native parents is nearly three times as great as among the native-born sons of foreign parents.

In New York in 1900 there were 15 201 illiterate white voters who were the sons of native-born parents and only 8,240 illiterate white voters who were the sons of foreign-born parents. There were 19 illiterate voters per 1,000 who were the sons of native parents and but 15 per 1,000 who were the sons of foreign-born parents.

Our schools are doing more for the children of immigrants in proportion to numbers than for those of our native families. The disagreeable truth is that on the average the newcomers do not have such irrational notions and are more eager to learn. Very likely they are helped because they live so largely in the cities rather than in the country.

* * * * * * *

It will be seen that notwithstanding our great port of entry and our widely exposed and attractive northern frontier, the percentage of illiteracy in the State of New York is less than in 18 other States, including every one of the New England States except Maine, which stands next above New York. But that is not of so much moment when we have reason to know that it is really ten times greater in all of the States than it ought to be.

I have here a little brief that I should like to submit relative to the position of the steamship companies. We have heard a general condemnation of the steamship companies here this afternoon because they induce and implore and bribe people to ride on their steamers.

[1] Compiled from the Annual Report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, 1910, Table X. The total number is obtained by subtracting from the total admitted those without occupation (including women and children).

Notwithstanding all that is said and written about the scarcity of farm labor, the fact is that labor is in demand on the farms only during a part of the summer, and this at the rates the farmer is able to pay, which are presumably lower than the wages of the common laborer in the cities. The assertion that the foreigners crowd into the cities through ignorance of the opportunities in the farming section certainly does not apply to the native-born country youth, who, though fully aware of the opportunities at the home farm, prefer nevertheless employment in the cities. If it were true that the oversupply of cheap alien labor in the cities has reduced the rate of wages below the standard that a native-born American workman is willing to accept, while there is a scarcity of labor in the farming sections, the farmer boy, failing to find employment at living wages in the city, would in the long run be forced by economic necessity to return home, where work is assured him on his father's farm. The fact that he stays in the city despite "back to the soil" harangues is the best evidence that the same tendency among recent immigrants is due to the relation of supply and demand in the American labor market and not to the racial characteristics of the immigrants. It is the phenomenal industrial development of the United States that stimulates immigration from the rural districts of the old and the new world to the great American cities.

The primitive method of reasoning which postulates a personal agent for every phenomenon has sought to account for the movement of population from Europe to the United States by "the propaganda conducted by steamship ticket agents." The facts brought to light by the investigation of the Immigration Commission in Europe will tend to dissipate this popular delusion. The commission found that in Greece, which, "according to its population, furnishes more immigrants to the United States than any other country, * * * solicitation by steamship companies probably plays relatively a small part even as a contributory cause of the movement." In Austria "government officials and others interested in the emigration situation expressed the belief that the solicitations of agents had little effect on the emigration movement, which was influenced almost entirely by economic conditions."

The immigrant is not as simple-minded and credulous as he is popularly represented to be.

Several American States have attempted to attract immigrants by the distribution in Europe of literature advertising the attractions of such States. A few States have sent commissioners to various countries for the purpose of inducing immigration, but, although some measure of success has attended such efforts, the propaganda has had little effect on the immigration movement as a whole. (Abstract of the Report on Emigration Conditions in Europe, pp. 31–34.)

Certainly there are steamship agents in all parts of Europe, and they compete with one another for the passenger traffic. As a rule, however, they reach only those who have already made up their minds to emigrate to the United States.

The number of immigrants varies with the business situation in the United States. This connection is clearly reflected in Table II, which gives the immigration statistics for the fiscal years 1905–1910. (Annual Reports of the Commissioner General of Immigration, 1908, p. 228, and 1910, p. 14.) The tide of immigration was rising until 1907.

TABLE II.—Immigration and emigration, 1905–1910.

Year ending June 30—	Admitted (thousands).	Departed (thousands).	Net immigration (thousands).
1905	1,060	385	675
1906	1,166	356	810
1907	1,438	431	1,007
1908	925	715	210
1909	944	400	544
1910	1,198	380	818

During the fiscal year 1908 it dropped at once by half a million, while emigration from the United States increased by nearly 300,000. During the next year immigration remained stationary, but emigration fell off. In 1910 immigration and emigration returned to the level of 1906. The same tendencies appear still more clearly if the returns are compared by months, as in Table III.

TABLE III.—Average monthly immigration and emigration, 1907–1909.

Period.	Admitted (thousands).	Departed (thousands).	Net immigration (+) or emigration (−).
July 1–Oct. 31, 1907	116	47	+69
November, 1907	132	94	+38
Dec. 1, 1907–Aug. 31, 1908	45	59	−14
Sept. 1, 1908–June 30, 1909	87	30	+57

From July 1 to October 31, 1907, immigration and emigration went on normally. The latter part of October witnessed the outbreak of the crisis, and the next month emigration doubled. Immigration still remained normal, inasmuch as those who arrived here in November had left their homes before the crisis. But from December immigration dropped to one-third of the number of arrivals in November. During the next nine months emigration exceeded immigration by 14,000 persons monthly. From September 1, 1908, the situation began to improve, and the number of immigrants went up again, while the number of departures went down.

The question arises: How does immigration adjust itself to the business situation in the United States? Precisely as the supply of any commodity adjusts itself to the demand. The net increase of the population of the United States through immigration for the five years from July 1, 1903, to June 30, 1908, is officially estimated at 3,200,000. (Report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, 1908, p. 228.) Allowance must be made for deaths among these immigrants. The annual death rate in the United States during the same period averaged 16 per 1,000. (Mortality Statistics, 1907, p. 94.) The total number of survivors among the newcomers may be estimated at 2,944,000. In order to live they had to work, beg, or steal. If they found work by crowding out others, those who were displaced were confronted with the same alternative. According to an official investigation made by the Bureau of Immigration, the total number of inmates of penal institutions, insane asylums, and almshouses in 1908 was 610,477 (Report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, 1908, p. 96), which included native and naturalized citizens and aliens. The enumeration of the same classes by the Bureau of the Census in 1904 gave their aggregate number as 634,877. (Benevolent institutions, p. 12; Paupers in almshouses, p. 6; Insane and feeble-minded in hospitals and institutions, pp. 6 and 207; Prisoners and juvenile delinquents, pp. 14 and 228.) A comparison of these figures clearly shows that the large immigration of the five year period 1903–1908 was accompanied by an actual decrease of pauperism and crime. It is obvious that if the 3,000,000 new immigrants imposed no new burdens upon the charitable and penal institutions of the country, they must somehow have earned a livelihood. In other words, immigration adjusted itself to the demand for "hands."

The method by which this adjustment is effected is thus described by the Immigration Commission:

"It is entirely safe to assert that letters from persons who have emigrated to friends at home have been the immediate cause of by far the greater part of the remarkable movement from southern and eastern Europe to the United States during the past 25 years. There is hardly a village or community in southern Italy and Sicily that has not contributed a portion of its population to swell the tide of emigration to the United States, and the same is true of large areas of Austria, Hungary, Greece, Turkey, and the Balkan States. * * * It was frequently stated to members of the commission that letters from persons who had emigrated to America were passed from hand to hand until most of the emigrants' friends and neighbors were acquainted with the contents. In periods of industrial activity, as a rule, the letters so circulated contain optimistic references to wages and opportunities for employment in the United States. * * * The reverse is true during seasons of industrial depression in the United States. At such times intending emigrants are quickly informed by their friends in the United States relative to conditions of employment, and a great falling off in the tide of emigration is the immediate result. * * * Emigrants as a rule are practically assured that employment awaits them in America before they leave their homes for ports of embarkation. * * * In fact, it may be said that immigrants, or at least newly arrived immigrants, are substantially the agencies which keep the American labor market supplied with unskilled laborers from Europe. * * * As a rule each immigrant simply informs his nearest friends that employment can be had and advises them to come. It is these personal appeals which, more than all other agencies, promote and regulate the tide of European emigration to America.

In 1905 there was admitted 1,060,000 and departed 385,000. In 1908 there was admitted 925,000 and departed 715,000.

So that, Mr. Chairman, the percentage of those that remain is seldom in excess of 33⅓ per cent. We take up the daily papers and find that the Canadian Northwest needs men more than it needs cars to handle the cereal crops. Here to-day the West needs labor more than it needs cars. We heard, in a recent speech by the Speaker of the House on the floor relative to immigration from farms in the United States to Canada, that the best blood of this country is being sapped to go over the border line into Canada, and that in the year ending June 30, 1912, 150,000 American souls went over the line into Canada, and according to the Commissioner General of Immigration each individual represented a cash capital of $1,000. We are losing the best blood of this country. If men are leaving the farms, we must have immigration to supply the places or we are going to have a shortage of help, a shortage of food, and a further increase in the cost of living. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURLEY. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Those are generally farmers that go across the line?

Mr. CURLEY. Yes; the best blood of the country.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it not true that a small percentage of the immigrants that the illiteracy test would exclude are those that never go to the farm at all? Is it not true that they congest in the city and compete with the American workingman and never go out on the farms; that the farmer does not want them as wage laborers?

Mr. CURLEY. I believe the statistics show that about 12 per cent of the immigrants go on the farm. I do not believe it is in excess of 12 per cent. But the fact remains that if 150,000 are leaving the United States and going into Canada and 300,000 to 500,000 are leaving the farms and going to live in the cities we are going to be confronted with an abnormal condition, and the immigrant who comes here will go to the place where he can secure the greatest amount of revenue in return for his labor.

Mr. BURNETT. The Scandinavians and Germans and the Norwegians are the ones in the majority of those that go on the farms and the ones that would not be excluded by the illiteracy test. That is the class that would replenish the farms, whereas the other class of immigrants do not fill up the places made vacant by those going into Canada.

Mr. CURLEY. I agree with what the gentleman says, but I will say that they do not come here; they are not emigrating from Germany and Ireland to-day; they are not emigrating from England to-day; they are not emigrating from Scotland to-day. There are a few coming from Sweden and a few from Norway. The gentleman knows that himself.

Mr. BURNETT. My recollection is that seventy-odd thousand of Germans came last year. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to say as a member of the Immigration Committee I heard it stated at Hamburg that one of the reasons why more and better Germans were not coming here was because we were receiving such an influx of undesirable emigrants from the Mediterranean.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman will permit, may I inquire where the gentleman heard that statement, and from whom?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not remember now; if I knew who it was I perhaps could not pronounce the name. I heard it stated frequently.

Mr. SABATH. That information was incorrect.

Mr. CURLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is complained that the recent immigrants from southern and eastern Europe have displaced in many occupations the earlier German and Irish immigrants with a higher standard of living. The statistics of occupations compiled by the Immigration Commission from the original returns of the Twelfth Census show, however, that the actual effect of the recent immigration from Italy and Austria has been a readjustment of the foreign-born population on the social scale. The earlier immigrants, the Germans and the Irish, have worked their way upward, leaving common labor to later immigrants from southern and eastern Europe. An abstract of that compilation is presented in Table VII:

TABLE VII.—Distribution of foreign-born male breadwinners according to nationality and occupation, 1900 (percentages).

Occupations.	German.	Irish.	Italian.	Austrian.	Polish.	Hungarian.
Laborers (not on farms)	10.2	22.3	33.2	18.8	29.1	22.3
Miners and quarrymen	1.5	3.2	9.2	18.9	7.7	30.0
Steam-railroad employees	1.5	4.4	6.2	2.1	2.1	1.8
Iron and steel workers	1.7	2.8	0.9	3.8	6.6	5.3
Skilled mechanics	12.0	10.5	8.5	5.6	6.3	5.0
Business and professions	18.8	19.1	15.1	13.1	13.4	10.0
Farmers, planters, and overseers	20.7	9.4	1.6	5.2	5.7	1.6
All others	33.6	28.3	25.3	32.5	29.1	24.0

It will be observed that the natives of Austria-Hungary furnish a strikingly high proportion of miners, compared with the Germans and Irish. The Poles and Italians furnish a proportion of common laborers higher than the Irish and much higher than the Germans. On the other hand, one-fifth of the Germans are farmers, whereas the percentage of farmers among the natives of Poland and Austria is very small, and among the Hungarians and Italians it is negligible. The Germans and the Irish likewise show higher percentages of skilled mechanics and of persons engaged in business and the professions.

Mr. Chairman, as I view this proposition, the immigration question does not touch the section of the country from which the chairman of the Immigration Committee comes and from which the gentleman from Georgia, who sits directly in front of me, comes, and if those who agitate chiefly in favor of restricting immigration here, as the gentleman has stated this afternoon, the Junior Order of American Mechanics, it strikes me that it is the same old organization that at one time desired legislation against the race from which I come. I would not be so severe or harsh as to maintain that it is because of the part that emigrants took in keeping this Union together that those who protest against immigration want to prevent their further admission. [Applause.]

But I want to say this, Mr. Chairman: That the immigrant has been a factor in the economic, social, and political development of this country since the beginning of the country, and when it came time to sign the Declaration of Independence there were no fewer than eight signers of that declaration who were what the gentleman would term of foreign blood, aliens; they were Irish—Matthew Thornton, George Read, Charles Carroll, Thomas McKean, James Smith, George Taylor, Thomas Lynch, and Edward Rutledge.

When it came time to pen that immortal document with its amendments to paper in the Continental Congress, it was an alien, an Irishman, who was the secretary of that Congress, Charles Thompson. [Applause.] When it came time to read the immortal document from Independence Hall, in Philadelphia, it was another one of the despised aliens who read the immortal document from the window of that hall in Philadelphia, John Nixon, while John Dunlap, of Strabane, Ireland, was the official printer, so that it can in truth be said that aliens acted as mother and nurse at the birth of independence.

When at Valley Forge, in the dread winter of 1778, rumors of desertion and disintegration were rife because of lack of food, raiment, and pay, 24 despised aliens collected the princely sum of $420,000 and turned it over to Gen. Washington that the war might continue and the gloom of Valley Forge be dispelled by the radiant sunburst of victory at Yorktown.

They have been a part and parcel in the progress and development of this Republic since the beginning of time, and they will be so long as the Republic continues to exist.

Travel through this magnificent city of Washington, with its beautiful buildings and its pleasant squares, and directly in front of the place where the White House stands, Lafayette Square, there are two of the finest monuments that the city boasts—a monument to Kosciusko and another one to Pulaski; two men of the race that is despised by some to-day and considered as undesirables. [Applause.] Take the story of the White House itself. It is exceedingly illuminating. It was Daniel Carroll of Carrollton, an Irishman, brother of Charles Carroll, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, who, after the war was over, presented the American people with the farm upon which the White House now stands. [Applause.] When it was necessary to select and erect and design the White House, it was an Irishman named James Hoban who designed it after the home seat of the Earl of Leinster, near Dublin.

Take the building in which we are assembled to make the laws. The Statue of Armed Liberty stands forth on the top of this building and was designed by an alien, Tom Crawford, an Irishman. [Applause.] And as the Statue of Armed Liberty looks toward the southeast it gazes on the finest library building that there is in the entire world—a building that stands as a monument to the honesty, to the character, and to the ability of an alien named Casey. [Applause.]

It is the old cry, "Keep out the alien; keep out the undesirable." It is the same cry, Mr. Chairman, that prompted the governor of New York in 1860 to dissolve the Irish brigade, commanded by Michael Corcoran, because they were Irish and might be a menace to the Republic, since they refused to turn out in honor of Prince Albert; but when the first blow was struck at Sumter it was the gallant Corcoran who came to the front and volunteered the services of the Irish brigade in the cause of the Union. [Applause.]

You say compel the immigrant to present from his government a certificate of character, and you know that would be impossible for a liberty-loving Jew from Russia.

Why, Mr. Chairman, that gallant man, Gen. Thomas Francis Meagher, who succeeded Gen. Corcoran as commander of the Irish brigade, which in 1864 captured more flags and standards than the remainder of the entire Union Army and never lost one flag or standard, had as his credentials an order from the Crown of England that he be hung, drawn, and quartered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 21888. Providing for the sale of the United States unused post-office site at Perth Amboy, N. J.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD was granted to Mr. LAFFERTY, Mr. AKIN of New York, Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, Mr. GOLDFOGLE, Mr. REILLY, and Mr. RODDENBERY.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. MANN. There is plenty of time for that.

INVESTIGATION OF THE PATENT OFFICE.

The committee resumed consideration of House joint resolution 337.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to cause the accountants and experts from official and private life now or hereafter employed in the inquiry into methods of transacting the public business of the Government in the several executive departments and other executive Government establishments, known as the Commission on Economy and Efficiency, to investigate fully and carefully the administration of the Patent Office with a view of determining whether or not the present methods, personnel, equipment, and building of said office are adequate for the performance of its functions, taking into consideration the present character and volume of business, and also such increase in complexity or volume as may reasonably be expected in the future, and to ascertain and recommend specifically to Congress, not later than December 10, 1912, what changes in law, what increases in appropriations, and what additional building accommodations may be necessary to enable the Patent Office to discharge its functions in a thoroughly efficient and economical manner, and to what extent any expenditures which may be recommended can be met by increases of Patent Office fees.

All expense incurred in carrying out the purposes of this resolution shall be paid out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, and the sum necessary for said purposes is hereby appropriated: Provided, That the total expense authorized by this resolution shall not exceed the sum of $10,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "establishments," insert "known as the Commission on Economy and Efficiency."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. Chairman, there was another committee amendment to be adopted. The original print of the bill did not have a comma after the word "accommodations," in line 9 on page 2, and the comma should be there.

Mr. MANN. But it is in this print.

Mr. BULKLEY. It does not appear in the original print of the bill.

Mr. MANN. We do not act upon the original print of the bill. We act on the print reported into the House.

Mr. BULKLEY. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution with the amendment to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GRAHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the House joint resolution 337, requesting the President to cause an investigation of the Patent Office and make a report, with recommendations, to Congress, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution as amended.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRAGO (when the Committee on Pensions was called). Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to call up for consideration the bill H. R. 17470, being No. 202 on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17470) to pension widow and minor children of any officer or enlisted man who served in the war with Spain or the Philippine insurrection.

The bill was read.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-nine gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, August 8, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a report by Commercial Agent D. C. SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 8, 1912.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the previous order of the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PREVENTION AND SPREAD OF DISEASE (S. DOC. NO. 900).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, submitting a special estimate of appropriation of $50,000 to enable the commissioners to adopt and enforce protective measures in the District of Columbia against the introduction and spread of the plague, supplementing the activities of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service in the efforts which that service is making to afford protection from without, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MINING IN THE FEDERATED MALAY STATES (H. DOC. NO. 901).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report by Commercial Agent D. C. Alexander, jr., containing the result of his investigations of mining in the Federated Malay States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 129) to provide transportation for American citizens fleeing from threatened danger in the Republic of Mexico, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 337) requesting the President to cause an investigation of the Patent Office and make a report with recommendations to Congress, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign Governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene; and

H. J. Res. 346. Joint resolution to correct an error in an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved June 19, 1912.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES. I present several telegrams in the nature of petitions urging the passage of House bill 23673, known as the seamen's efficiency bill. I ask that the first telegram in the nature of resolutions unanimously adopted by District No. 10, United Mine Workers of America, of Seattle, Wash., in regular convention assembled, be printed in the RECORD, and that the signatures, together with the names of the organizations attached to the other telegrams, also be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram and signatures were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., July 20, 1912.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES, Washington, D. C.:

Resolution 9.

Whereas the navigation laws of the United States are inadequate in so far as they do not provide for efficiency in the crew, thereby in case of accident trusting the lives of passengers to inexperienced men; and

Whereas at present the seamen are denied the privilege granted other workers, that of freedom to quit when vessels are in safe harbors; and

Whereas H. R. 23673 will remedy these evils and be of great help to build up a merchant marine: Therefore be it

Resolved by the United Mine Workers of America, District No. 10, in regular convention assembled, That we indorse said bill and urge upon our Representatives in Congress to do their utmost for its passage at this session.

LEE BULLOCK.
WALTER ROSS.
S. J. WESTON.

Unanimously adopted by the convention.

From Charles R. Case, president of the Washington State Federation of Labor, of Seattle, Wash.; Lee Bullock, Walter Ross, and S. J. Weston, District No. 10, United Mine Workers of America, of Seattle, Wash.; P. B. Gill, agent for the seamen of Washington, of Seattle, Wash.; M. M. and P. J. E. Brinker, president, P. Mullen, secretary, of the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association; D. W. Miller, president, C. S. Follet, secretary, of the International Seamen's Union of America; P. B. Gill, vice president, W. L. Onstott, president, E. B. Ault, secretary, of the Central Labor Council of Seattle, Wash.; D. W. Miller, president, D. C. Follette, secretary, of the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association of Seattle, Wash.; J. E. Brinker, president, P. Mullen, secretary, of Puget Sound Harbor Lodge, No. 16, American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, of Seattle, Wash.; of Leonard Norkgauer, agent Marine Cooks and Stewards' Association of Washington, of Seattle, Wash.; W. L. Onstott, president, E. B. Ault, secretary, of the Central Labor Council of Seattle, of Seattle, Wash.; Dan Landon, of Seattle, Wash.; and of Fred Swanson, agent of the Alaska Fishermen's Union, of Seattle, Wash.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of sundry citizens of Arenzville, Ill., praying for the appointment of a commission to investigate the advisability of a general parcel-post system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the freight traffic committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce, of Illinois, favoring the enactment of legislation granting to shippers the right of appeal from decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of Local Divisions Nos. 241, 260, and 308, Amalgamated Association of Street and Electric Railway Employees, of Chicago, Ill., and the petition of J. F. Morris, secretary-treasurer of the Illinois State Federation of Labor, on behalf of the International Seaman's Union of America, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the better protection of American seamen, which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHIVELY presented a petition of the executive committee of the Indianapolis Freight Bureau, of Indiana, praying for the enactment of legislation to enable shippers to appeal to the courts from orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WETMORE, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9833) to accept and fund the bequest of Gertrude M. Hubbard, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1020) thereon.

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 22199) to extend the limits of the port of entry of Galveston, Tex., to include Port Bolivar, in that State, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1021) thereon.

INDIAN SCHOOL IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. CLAPP. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3258) to acquire a site and erect buildings for a school for the Indians of Robeson County, N. C., and for other purposes. I call the attention of the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the bill. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to inquire concerning that annual appropriation. Is it usual to make an annual appropriation indefinite in the matter of time?

Mr. CLAPP. Of course the annual appropriation part would be so indefinite that it would be nothing more nor less than a suggestion. I have no objection to striking out that part if the Senator cares anything about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think if an appropriation is made it should be for one year.

Mr. CLAPP. It was rather a suggestion that it would be taken care of hereafter.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it had better go out.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objections to striking it out.

Mr. GALLINGER. Manifestly we could not bind a future Congress. I move to strike it out and change it to an appropriation for the then ensuing year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, line 4, before the word "appropriated," strike out the word "annually"; and in line 7, after the words "North Carolina," insert "for the then ensuing year," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire a site at or near the town of Pembroke, Robeson County, N. C., the selection of which to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and cause to be erected thereon suitable buildings, the plans for which shall be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, for a school for the Indians of Robeson County, N. C., now living in Robeson and surrounding counties in North Carolina, and the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated to pay for the site and the erection of the buildings.

SEC. 2. That after the aforesaid buildings are erected the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the conduct and maintenance of said school for the Indians of Robeson County, N. C., for the then ensuing year, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the provisions of law for the conduct and maintenance of schools for the Indians by the United States Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ATLANTA, GA.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 7407) increasing the limit of cost of the post-office building at Atlanta, Ga., and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, but I shall object to any further consideration of bills this morning in the morning hour.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the bill may be put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase the limit of cost for the new post-office building at Atlanta, Ga., from $1,000,000 to $1,020,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CULLOM:

A bill (S. 7429) granting an increase of pension to Orlan A. Hibbs (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 7430) providing for the cancellation of certain overdue personal taxes in the District of Columbia (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama:

By Mr. NEWLANDS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) providing for an American commission for the investigation of rural credits in Europe: ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURTON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $4,000 to pay Emma Morris, widow of Frank H. Morris, late Auditor of the Treasury for the War Department, the same being equivalent to one year's salary of the said Morris, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 25970), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE TARSNEY ACT (S. DOC. NO. 916).

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask that a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying statement regarding the cost of planning and supervising public buildings in the Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, as compared with architects' commissions under the Tarsney Act, be published as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask consent to be excused from further service as chairman of the Committee on Fisheries.

There being no objection, Mr. JONES was excused.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to ask to be relieved from further service as chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

There being no objection, Mr. WORKS was excused.

Mr. GALLINGER. In behalf of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], I ask that he be excused from further service as chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining.

There being no objection, Mr. POINDEXTER was excused.

Mr. GALLINGER. In behalf of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS], I ask that he be excused from further service upon the Committee on Fisheries.

There being no objection, Mr. BRIGGS was excused.

Mr. GALLINGER. In behalf of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], I ask that he be excused from further service upon the Committee on Claims.

There being no objection, Mr. MCLEAN was excused.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That Mr. MASSEY be assigned to service on and to the chairmanship of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and to service on the Committees on Agriculture and Forestry, Claims, Coast Defenses, Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, and Private Lands Claims;

That Mr. POINDEXTER be assigned to the chairmanship of the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico;

That Mr. JONES be assigned to the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands;

That Mr. WORKS be assigned to service on and to the chairmanship of the Committee on Fisheries;

That Mr. OLIVER be assigned to service on the Committee on Appropriations;

That Mr. LA FOLLETTE be assigned to service on the Committee on Interstate Commerce;

That Mr. BRIGGS be assigned to service on the Committee on the District of Columbia;

That Mr. KENYON be assigned to service on the Committee on the Philippines;
That Mr. TOWNSEND be assigned to service on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads;
That Mr. CATRON be assigned to service on the Committee on Military Affairs;
That Mr. FALL be assigned to service on the Committees on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and Mines and Mining; and
That Mr. BURTON and Mr. GRONNA be, respectively, assigned to service on the Committee on National Banks.

AMENDMENT OF COPYRIGHT ACTS.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, if in order, I should like to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 24224) to amend sections 5, 11, and 25 of an act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyrights," approved March 4, 1909.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to proceed as soon as we can with the Panama Canal bill.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no desire to impede that proposed legislation, but this is a matter of very decided importance. The bill has been read to the Senate, and it can provoke no discussion. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. BRISTOW. There are a number of other Senators who want to get up bills, and if we are ever to get through with the Panama Canal bill, we have to put time on it and get through with it. There will then be time for Senators to have miscellaneous bills passed while we are waiting for conference committee reports.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I trust the Senator from Kansas will make no objection. It is a matter of very considerable importance.

Mr. BRISTOW. A Senator sitting by me says that he has a bill which he wants to have passed. There is but one way to stop it, and that is to object to it, and let us get to the consideration of the canal bill. I think the Senator from New Jersey is just as much interested as I am to get this important bill out of the way, and we can then take up miscellaneous legislation and dispose of it while the committees of conference are attempting to agree on the differences between the two Houses. It seems to me that that would be the expeditious way to get through with the business.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no desire to press the matter unduly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. BRISTOW. I hope the Senator will not force me to make an objection. I do not want to do that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I realize and appreciate the situation. I withdraw the request for the present.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution (S. Res. 373) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interoceanic Canals be, and is hereby, authorized to have printed, with accompanying illustrations, for its use 500 copies of the hearings before said committee on the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will say to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the printing clerk informs me he has had it estimated for, and the expense will be $319. There were 500 copies of this evidence printed, and they have been exhausted. The demand for them continues, and I have no way of supplying them. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection, Mr. President.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THE INTERSTATE-COMMERCE ACT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I may do so at this time without being out of order, I wish to state that I have conferred with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], that the resolution (S. Res. 372) submitted by him on the 6th instant, which comes over under the rule, by unanimous consent may not lose its place for consideration. I have told him that as soon as the morning business is concluded I shall move to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business—the Panama Canal bill—and if it would be agreeable to him I would ask that his resolution may go over with some understanding that it shall retain its privileged place for consideration on to-morrow.

Mr. KENYON. I am perfectly content that the resolution shall go over, provided it will not lose its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will first ask if there are further concurrent or other resolutions. If not, the resolution of the Senator from Iowa is in order, and under the statement just made, without objection, the resolution will go over without prejudice, retaining its place.

FORT ASSINNIBOINE MILITARY RESERVATION, MONT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5817) granting to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, the jail building and fixtures now upon the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in the State of Montana, which were:

On page 1, line 3, to strike out "That" and insert "That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell"; on page 1, line 5, to strike out "be, and the same are hereby,"; on page 1, line 6, to strike out "granted"; on page 1, line 6, after "Montana," to insert "at a price to be agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior and the board of county commissioners of said county,"; on page 2, in lines 1 and 2, to strike out "the passage of this act" and insert "such sale has been consummated"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, the jail building and fixtures now upon the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in the State of Montana."

Mr. MYERS. I move that the amendments of the House be concurred in.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Montana to state as briefly as possible what effect the amendments have upon the original bill?

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Utah may not recall the bill. There are some Senators who are familiar with it. The bill as originally introduced in the Senate proposed to donate to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, an old brick guardhouse on the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation. It passed the Senate in that form and went to the House.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember the passage of the bill by the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. The other House refused to give away the guardhouse, and would not agree to that, but insisted that it must be sold and bring something. The amendments simply authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the new county at whatever terms he may consider just and right and proper.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to concurring in the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana moves that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF AMERICAN CITIZENS AT EL PASO, TEX.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 129) to provide transportation for American citizens fleeing from threatened danger in the Republic of Mexico, which was, on page 1, to strike out lines 3 to 9, inclusive, and insert:

That until March 1, 1913, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, he is hereby authorized to furnish transportation, which shall not be negotiable or transferable, from places in the United States on or near the Mexican border to other places in the United States to those American citizens who shall have fled or may hereafter flee from the Republic of Mexico who are now or who may hereafter be unable to pay for their own transportation.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for prior years, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 38) to create a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska, to confer legislative power thereon, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Mr. HOUSTON, and Mr. WEDEMEYER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18900) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 38) to create a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska, to confer legislative power thereon, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the House of Representatives has just adopted the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I introduced on yesterday a concurrent resolution to correct the enrollment of that bill, and it was ordered to lie upon the table. It is necessary, if the concurrent resolution be adopted at all, that it should be adopted at this time, in order that the bill may be corrected before its enrollment. I ask for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be instructed in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, to strike out all of the second paragraph of Senate amendments 511, 512, 513, and 514, as agreed to in conference and concurred in by the two Houses, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"All cases pending and undisposed of in said Commerce Court are hereby transferred to and shall be deemed pending in the district court of any of the judicial districts within which the original cause of action brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission arose, such district to be designated by the complainant; and the venue of all suits and proceedings hereafter brought to enforce, set aside, annul, or modify any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be in any of the judicial districts within which the original cause of action brought before the commission arose."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. What is this proposition?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill—the matter was discussed yesterday—the jurisdiction now possessed by the Commerce Court is attempted to be conferred upon the district courts of the United States. The language is, as we thought, faulty to accomplish that purpose. The object of having the enrollment of the bill corrected is to make the language accomplish what it was desired by the conferees to accomplish, namely, to transfer the cases now pending in the Commerce Court to the district courts of the United States and to allow cases hereafter arising against the Interstate Commerce Commission to be brought in the district courts. We must provide for that jurisdiction.

Mr. CULBERSON. It is simply, then, to correct the enrollment of the bill?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is a correction of the enrollment of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then I have no objection to the consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. R. 25970. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

H. J. Res. 337. Joint resolution requesting the President to cause an investigation of the Patent Office and make a report, with recommendations, to Congress, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Patents.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter just received from Prof. Emory R. Johnson, the expert on the Panama Canal, suggesting an amendment in the section under consideration, which I will ask the Secretary to please read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION,
Washington Office, August 8, 1912.

Senator FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BRANDEGEE: If practicable, I hope the Senate will amend the pending canal bill by omitting the following provision contained in lines 14 to 19, page 7:

"That under regulations prescribed by the President a vessel paying toll going through the canal in ballast shall, on its return trip through the canal laden with cargo, be entitled to receive a rebate of 50 per cent of the tolls just previously paid going through in the opposite direction without cargo."

In place of that provision it is hoped that the following provision may be inserted after the word "commerce," line 17, page 6:

"The rate of tolls may be lower upon vessels in ballast than upon vessels carrying passengers or cargo."

There are three reasons why this change is desirable:

1. The bill in its present form provides for a greater reduction in the rate of tolls upon vessels without passengers or cargo than is granted by the Suez Canal Co.

2. To charge vessels in ballast the full standard rate of tolls and to make a reduction in favor of such vessels only upon the condition of the return of the vessel through the canal with passengers or cargo may discourage the use of the canal by vessels in ballast, because such vessels are seeking cargo, and often do not know while making the trip in ballast what cargo will be obtained or what route the cargo obtained will take. Vessels without cargo will, if the full rate of tolls is required, tend to avoid using the canal.

3. It will be more difficult to collect the tolls and to account for them—the administrative problems will be more complicated—by requiring ships in ballast to pay full tolls with the promise of returning at a later date a part of the charges that have been collected.

Very sincerely, yours,

EMORY R. JOHNSON.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will say for the information of the Senate——

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask the Senator from Connecticut to yield to me to see if we can not get a unanimous-consent agreement in reference to voting on the pending bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read a request which I make for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed with the consideration of the Panama Canal bill and all amendments thereto until final action thereon without recess or adjournment; and further that no Senator shall speak more than five minutes upon both the bill and any amendments thereto; and further that no Senator who has already spoken one hour on this bill shall speak again, the Senate having now sufficient information to vote intelligently upon this bill, without further information from those who have already occupied so much of its time and attention.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope very much that will be agreed to, although I think most of the Senate would, by its adoption, be debarred from further proceedings in the measure.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. That is what I intend.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if I caught the reading of the unanimous-consent proposition, it provides that we are to proceed, without adjournment, until we have voted upon this bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, in order to avoid taking up time discussing this matter——

Mr. SIMMONS. It seems to me that is a very remarkable proposition.

Mr. BRISTOW. I make the objection now, so that we may proceed with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, although I assume that the request for unanimous consent of the Senator from Alabama, which has just been objected to, was offered in perhaps more or less of a humorous sense, still I am glad it was offered, because it brings up the question of whether it is not possible for us now to agree upon some time at which the vote upon this bill and all amendments to its final passage may be had.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I want to say to the Senator from Connecticut that there is no humor about that proposed agreement at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know it was rather grim humor, if there was any.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. It was intended to expedite public business and a vote upon a question that has been debated here for three or four weeks. A majority of Senators are worn out with it, and it is time that we should vote and act and quit talking about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as a substitute for the request for unanimous consent presented by the Senator from Alabama I ask unanimous consent that the vote upon this bill and all amendments thereto be taken during the present calendar day.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I second the request.

Mr. BRISTOW. I can not consent to voting upon this bill until we reach section 11. There will be some amendments injected here in regard to the construction of a treaty which will take all the time up to midnight to-day in order to discuss what words mean. What we want to get at is the legislative features of this bill that benefit the commerce of the country, and I for one am not going to consent to a vote on the bill until we get up to the vital measures of the bill and can get consideration of them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, Mr. President, if that is the Senator's attitude there is no use of proposing any request for unanimous consent until we have passed all the portions of the bill which precede section 11. Then we can take up for consideration the time for voting finally upon the bill.

With relation to the communication from Prof. Johnson, just read by the Secretary, I will state that I had that amendment substantially noted in the bill. The reasons that he gives for it are perfectly plain, it seems to me, if Senators have the bill before them.

The bill at present provides, on page 7, line 14:

That under regulations prescribed by the President a vessel paying toll going through the canal in ballast shall, on its return trip through the canal laden with cargo, be entitled to receive a rebate of 50 per cent of the tolls just previously paid going through in the opposite direction without cargo.

As Prof. Johnson says, that is a much greater reduction than is allowed in the Suez Canal for vessels in ballast. Furthermore, if a vessel under that provision should go through the canal in ballast, it would be because it was seeking a cargo. If it succeeded in finding a cargo it might never come back through the canal; its cargo might be consigned to Hongkong, and, therefore, it would be paying the full dues and would get no rebate whatever, or it would get more than it was entitled to. Prof. Johnson suggests that on page 6, in the line of the provision which I have just read from the bill, there be inserted the language which I will ask the Secretary to read from Prof. Johnson's letter. It is a little different from the language I have here, although substantially the same.

Mr. ROOT. Where is that—on page 6?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On page 6, in line 17, after the word "commerce" I move to insert the language to which I refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut offer that as an amendment now?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is an amendment pending, offered last night by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on behalf of his colleague [Mr. PERCY]. The Senate adjourned pending that amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not want this amendment to be taken up out of its order. Did the Senator from Mississippi ask to have the amendment to which the Chair refers inserted in this place or before it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Just before it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing to let this rest until action is taken upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment before the Senate is the amendment offered last night by the Senator from Mississippi on behalf of his colleague, which the Secretary will again state to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 14, after the words "United States," it is proposed to insert:

Vessels owned exclusively by American citizens and not built within the United States shall be entitled to registry and the benefits thereof, and to the protection of and be subject to the navigation laws of the United States as long as such vessels are engaged in the transportation of merchandise and passengers through the canal, and such vessels so engaged in such transportation shall be entitled to engage in the coastwise trade while en route to or from the canal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the Senator from Mississippi in what respect that amendment differs from the one that was acted upon last night?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not differ at all; but the one that was acted upon last night was offered as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and this is offered as an amendment to the text of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment just read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it would perhaps be interesting for us to know just how often the same amendment can be offered as in Committee of the Whole. This amendment was offered and voted down last evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be glad to hear from the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Chair with pleasure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not wish to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I have said all I care to say. Of course, if this amendment should be voted down, I suppose, having voted twice upon the same amendment, it can be offered to some other section of the bill again as in Committee of the Whole, and again, and I do not know where we would end if we entered upon that form of legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think it goes without saying that an amendment offered to an amendment is not in effect the same as an amendment offered to the text of the bill. I will say, somewhat in explanation, that I intended last night that this should be offered then as an amendment to the text of the bill, but, the Chair misunderstanding me and I not hearing the Chair, it was offered as an amendment to the amendment. Learning that later, I did not call for the yeas and nays. It would not have accomplished the purpose I had in view if it had been adopted as an amendment to the amendment; and I now offer it as an amendment to the text of the bill at the place indicated, on page 6, line 14.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment offered last evening really had no relevancy to the amendment that was under consideration, as I look at it; perhaps I am mistaken, but what is troubling me is to know just how often the same amendment can be offered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It depends upon what it is offered as an amendment to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am willing to submit the question to the Chair, and, of course, the Chair will decide wisely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I merely want everybody to understand what the amendment is. In substance, it is an amendment admitting to our coastwise trade——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Mississippi will pardon the Chair a moment, does the Chair understand the Senator from New Hampshire to make a point of order?

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President; I will not make a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In substance, it is an amendment admitting to our coastwise trade en route to and from the canal——

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will allow me to finish the sentence first—vessels owned exclusively by Americans, although not built in America. That, in substance, is the main point about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. One reason, Mr. President, why I would not make the point of order on the amendment would be that it could be offered in the Senate at any rate. So we may as well vote upon it now as at any other time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I shall not delay the Senate more than a few moments on this amendment. It opens a very large question, and it seems to me rather too large a question to be settled by an amendment to this bill. It is a question which ought to receive the careful consideration of the committees of the Senate and be treated as a separate measure.

We have given a great deal of attention in the past to the question of admitting foreign-built ships to the foreign trade, but this proposition is different. It is to admit foreign-built ships to the coastwise trade. The result of that would be to close our shipyards, because the whole of their business is in building for the coastwise trade. Of course there is Government business—the building of battleships and other naval vessels—but that is not enough to support two shipyards, if as many, and if it were concentrated in two yards it would not be a good thing for the Government at all. It would still, I think, be difficult for the shipyards to live on the uncertain business that comes from the Government. The backbone of the business of our shipyards, great and small, is, of course, the building of vessels for the coastwise trade. The steamers and other vessels which we hope to have built for the Panama Canal traffic between the east and the west coasts will, if this amendment should be adopted, be built on the Clyde. That it will yield any benefit to the shipper and the passenger is not possible, because the owner of ships in the coastwise traffic remains protected as before. It will simply enable him to buy his ships cheaper and to make a larger profit. There are many small shipyards on the coast which exist entirely by building the steamships and other vessels that are employed in the coastwise traffic and employed in local service about the different great ports. Of course, if that work is taken from them, they will have to close.

I think suddenly, without warning, to take the product of a single industry and put it on the free list is a very severe measure. I can not regard with any feelings but those of real distress the prospect of seeing the many thousand employees in those shipyards suddenly thrown out of work, as they would be in a very short time if this amendment were adopted.

There are many States which have a larger shipbuilding business than my own, but we have one yard in Massachusetts that employs 5,000 men, and we have some small yards, which never build anything for the Government, employing many hundred men, which would, of course, absolutely have to cease operations in a very short time, because it is hopeless to suppose that our yards, with their rates of wages and expenses, can compete with the building of vessels on the Clyde or in Germany.

I wish very much that this matter, which is so far-reaching, might be reserved to be dealt with as a separate proposition. It really has no connection with the canal, and when I think of the distress and misfortune that such sudden action on the part of the Senate will cause to a large industry I can not but hope that the Senate will be willing to allow this subject to be dealt with as a separate measure, after full consideration, which it is impossible to give now, both by committees and by the Senate, of the conditions of the shipbuilding industry.

To leave this country without shipyards, it seems to me, would be a great misfortune; and it is the coastwise traffic which has maintained our shipyards not only on the Lakes but on the Pacific, Atlantic, and Gulf coasts. I see no escape from the destruction of those yards if the coastwise traffic is thrown open to foreign-built ships. I want to repeat that it will have no effect on the cost of transportation, because the monopoly of the coastwise traffic will still remain to the American shipowner. It will only enable him to buy his ships somewhat cheaper and make a larger profit.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts one question in connection with the statement he has made. I will ask the Senator if the work of our shipyards now is not practically confined solely to the construction of vessels to engage in the coastwise trade?

Mr. LODGE. They have no other business.

Mr. SIMMONS. They are not now building any vessels engaged in the over-seas trade?

Mr. LODGE. Practically none.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would the Senator have any objection to granting this permission to the owners of vessels engaged in the over-seas trade?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course, as a practical question, I should much prefer to have it confined to vessels engaged in the foreign trade, because it would have no practical effect, although I do not believe in the principle; but, as between the two, I should infinitely prefer to have an amendment which would confine it to foreign-built ships in the foreign trade, because the coastwise trade as it is to-day is the only business that the American shipyards have. They are building no ships for the foreign trade; and if this amendment should pass as proposed, in a very short time there would be nothing left of the shipyards, except those small and inconsiderable ones, perhaps, which build fishing schooners, of which we build a better type than any other country, and it would not be worth while for foreign competition to enter into it; but practically every shipyard would be closed for all other business in the coastwise traffic.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if this amendment be noted more accurately, it will be seen that it does not cover all the coastwise traffic. It applies to vessels en route to and from the canal, where their routes are that way. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] takes it for granted that all of our shipyards would be closed and everybody thrown out of employment if our shipbuilders were brought to the point of competing, even to this guarded and limited extent, with the shipbuilders abroad. He seems to differ in some respects with others in that regard. There is a very great divergence between the comparative cost of shipbuilding here and abroad. I am inclined to think that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is right when he says that the advantage that the foreign shipbuilder has over us is in the cheapness per diem of his labor. Whether that be compensated by the superior efficiency of American labor in the shipyards I do not know, but I am afraid that it is not; because we have given these people a monopoly so long that they can afford to be careless in their methods and backward in their methods as well. But whether that be the case or not, in every other respect, such as material and all that, we are upon grounds of equality at any rate, and in many respects upon grounds of superiority. There is no doubt, I take it, in the mind of any well-informed man to-day that America can produce steel cheaper than can any other country in the world.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me at that point, he is quite right as to the material, because, under the present tariff act as under previous tariff acts, material to be used in shipbuilding for the foreign trade can be imported free.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. LODGE. But, as the Senator knows, if he will allow me——

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I recollect correctly, it is with a rebate of 99 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Except that the red tape makes the whole thing unworkable.

Mr. LODGE. And yet with the ability to buy all our material, practically, and bring in all material free from foreign countries, we have never been able to compete in building a ship for the foreign trade, because it costs so much more for labor. I believe the efficiency of our labor in the shipyards is high, but the efficiency in English shipyards is, of course, practically the highest in the world, and their expenses for labor are very much lower.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he would be willing to substitute for the amendment which he has just offered, a bill which he introduced, which limits the effect of this provision to vessels engaged in the foreign trade?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I would prefer to hold that in abeyance for the present. I want to test the sense of the Senate upon this particular amendment. It seems to me if the principle involved in the bill which I introduced would be indorsed by the Senate, the principle involved in this amendment would also be. So I shall hold that matter in abeyance until I see the result of the vote upon this amendment.

Mr. President, here is an industry to which we have granted an absolute monopoly, a monopoly not only to our navigators but to our shipbuilders—the coastwise trade. Both parties—or I will say now, since the travail is over, the three parties—are loud in their denunciation of monopoly of every description. We have built up one by law, and we have talked for it until a lot of people imagine that it is a matter of patriotism to maintain at least one monopoly upon the statute books for the benefit of two classes of industries. My own opinion is that if these people were subjected to some degree of competition they would have better business methods in the shipyards and on shipboard; they would be compelled, instead of leaving themselves an immense law-given margin of monopoly, to do business upon a business scale; and, doing it in that way, their methods would become more efficient and their production would become cheaper.

I do not desire, however, to take up the time of the Senate now, especially at the heels of the session, when everybody is tired; I do not want to go into a general discussion of this subject. I rose merely to explain it, so that everybody might understand the character of the amendment, and, unless it is desired further to discuss it by some Senator, I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to say one word only. I regard this subject as one which touches not merely the economic question of the survival and prosperity of an industry or of two industries, but as very vital because of its bearing upon the independence of the United States from foreign countries in a matter that may be of supreme importance. I should like to see a full consideration given to the question of whether we may not revive our foreign merchant marine by taking down the bars and permitting ships to be acquired abroad; but that we should, with slight consideration, enact a provision which every wise and intelligent man believes will result in destruction of the American shipbuilding industry, so that we can not get ships made in our own country, I think would be a very serious act.

One of the important considerations in determining the application of the protective principle is the independence of a people who can themselves produce all that is necessary to their support and prosperity. There is nothing as to which independence is more important than this independence of ours in the ability to build up a navy and to maintain a carrying trade. Shorn of the power ourselves to build ships, we are crippled in our relations to the rest of the world, and we would stand to suffer seriously for it in time of stress and danger.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I opposed the Percy amendment in the committee for the reason that it contemplated a grave departure from the existing registration and navigation laws of the United States. I thought for that reason it should not be engrafted on the Panama Canal toll legislation. I do not say that the principle embodied in the amendment is not without merit, but it opens up a very grave and serious proposition. It proposes to change our navigation laws, and connected with that is the possible result of the sudden destruction of all private American shipyards. I think that is too great a question to be considered at this time in this connection, but that it should be given a separate occasion, with ample time for the discussion of it.

For that reason I was then opposed and I am now opposed to the amendment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the prohibition of the use of foreign ships in our coastwise trade is a part of the protective policy of the Republican Party and stands with the tariff as a part of that protective policy. I am entirely willing to take up that question in any bill that properly presents it, but I do not think that we should discuss or act upon so far reaching a question upon a bill relating to the opening up and the use of the Panama Canal.

We have already the intimation that the President will veto any tariff bill which, after full discussion and consideration, passes Congress unless it is based upon the consideration which prompted the organization of the Tariff Board and doubtless he will veto this bill if it contains any ill-considered legislation relating to the protective policy so far as coastwise navigation is concerned.

We are all exceedingly interested in the immediate passage of the pending bill. It is a matter of great concern to the Nation. It is a matter of great concern to the Pacific coast. The session is drawing to a close and it would be a great misfortune if we should adjourn without acting upon it.

I hope in the near future we will take up in an adequate way not only the policy of protection as represented by the tariff but the policy of protection as represented in our laws relating to navigation, and that after full consideration by the proper committees and after full debate in Congress we will take such action as will lessen or destroy monopoly and at the same time promote our merchant marine, whether engaged in coastwise or oversea traffic. But I do not think that this is the time or the place, and I hardly think it fair to those of us who are in sympathy with the general purpose of the Senator from Mississippi, to put us on record on this bill regarding so important a matter, when our vote may result in the veto of the bill or may result in such a protraction of legislation as would cause the measure to go over to the next session. I think that we should address ourselves to the immediate question before us as presented by the committee.

For these reasons I shall vote against the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I never had much sympathy with that sort of mental procedure which professes adherence to a principle but always, when it is proposed to put the principle in practice, meets the attempt with the phrase, "Not now, not here, afterwards, in some other place." So much in answer to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Now, the reply to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], it seems to me, is a very plain one. He seemed to take for granted—and I deny that anybody has warrant for it—that we will find ourselves "shorn of the power to build ships" if this amendment passes. The amendment could not, in my opinion, justify any such conclusion as that even if it went further than it does.

I should like, if I had time, to enter into the history of the decay of the American shipbuilding industry and the reason for it, but that would take too much time. I will be pardoned, however, for saying that the sails of American ships before the War between the States whitened the Indian Ocean and the Mediterranean as well as the Atlantic and the Pacific—ships built in American shipyards; that the difference between the cost of European labor and the cost of American labor at that time was fully as great as it is now; and that the mere difference in the cost of labor never prevented the Baltimore clippers and the schooners from Maine from traveling all over the world and carrying the American flag with them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that was in the days of wooden ships, and we had a great advantage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That obliges me to go a little further along in the history, which I had hoped to escape. I was merely making the point that the difference in labor alone did not prevent our success in shipbuilding.

Now, what difference does it make, as a matter of logic, whether the thing upon which labor operated was wood or steel, unless the cost of the material should be greater in America than abroad?

To follow the history down a little, the beginning of the decadence of American shipping was its destruction and expulsion by the Confederate cruisers that destroyed it. Then there happened to come in just about that time the great change of material in the industry. People began to build iron ships instead of wooden ships, and at that time the cost of producing iron and steel in Great Britain was 50 per cent of what it was in America. Then we could not reinstate ourselves. Later on we developed our iron and steel industries until we reduced the cost here to a level with, or perhaps below a level with, the cost abroad of these materials.

But the answer to the Senator from New York consists in these two propositions. He forgets in his reply that the ownership of these ships contemplated by my amendment to be admitted to the coastwise trade en route to and from the Panama Canal and passing through the canal must be exclusively American.

Then the Senator says that it might destroy our independence to have foreign ships in the American coastwise trade. The reply is that they would not be foreign ships at all, but would be owned and officered and manned under our navigation laws by Americans. Therefore that argument falls to the ground.

The argument would have fallen to the ground by a different reply if necessary, to wit, the fact that for I do not know how long Great Britain has admitted to her coastwise trade ships flying any flag, from anywhere, not under any mere limitation of this sort, subject, of course, to coastwise commerce regulations at the ports, and all that.

Now, Mr. President, it does seem to me that to subject these people to a little competition will not only be good for the American people but healthful to them. It would be good for them in making them do a more careful business, in stimulating their energies and inventiveness.

But the Senator from Massachusetts says that it could not work any reduction in freight rates, and therefore it would not better the shipper or the consignee. It is a new doctrine to me, if the proposition be true, if the foreign ship would continue to be bought at less money, that the cost of the plant has nothing to do with the charge made by the owners of the plant. When a man comes into competition with other people, then if the other people operated ships that cost more, the man trying to get the part of the business and trying to carry it at as low a profit as would render a reasonable return for the money invested in the plant would thereby, as far as others, reduce charges to meet competition, to a certain extent, at any rate. I understand that he would not come any lower than he thought he ought in order to get the lion's share of the trade and a full cargo, but rather than risk not having a full cargo he certainly would reduce the prices to that extent, at any rate.

I shall not further consume the time of the Senate now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, I had not intended to protract this debate, which has grown perhaps somewhat wearisome to the Senate, involving as it does most important matters in connection with the use of the stupendous project which is about to be consummated for the benefit of America and the world, but, knowing that the State which I have the honor in part to represent is vitally interested in the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Mississippi, I feel that I would not have discharged the duty which I owe to the people of my State if I sat silent at this time, content to learn from others and listen to those who have wider experience in framing laws, and particularly upon a matter which is of such vital interest, not only to the people of America, but to the people of the world.

I come from that section of the country where I have been schooled in a political thought which has been taught to regard the duty of a public servant as to extend not only to that particular section of the country where he happens to have been born and where he has lived, but who has been taught that his patriotism should broaden and widen until it took in the Nation. I have belonged to that section of political thought which has deprecated sectionalism in politics and in government and has felt that the greatest good could be accomplished in that broader patriotism of which I have spoken by deliberating for the benefit of all.

In that spirit to-day, without seeking to ask any special favors for that bit of the rocky New England coast which we have been glad to call and proud to call the State of Maine, distinguishing it from the time when it was the Province of Maine and a part of the older Commonwealth of Massachusetts, I speak for it and for this industry, which used to be one of its grandest and in which it took its greatest pride. I wish I could take the Senator from Mississippi to that coast of Maine, to some of those seaside villages, to talk with those old sea captains, who in their prime sailed every sea and cast their anchors in every port of the world, and showed their love for America, their broad patriotism, and their love of their whole country and their love of their calling in that most perilous of avocations. Now, seeing their shipyards deserted, he would witness a pathetic scene along that 2,700 miles of coast, where were heard formerly the sound of the adz, the hammer, and the ax, but which are now silent and growing up to weeds.

I am not wise enough, I have not had experience enough to solve the great problems as to the decadence of American shipping. I know it to be a pathetic fact which we have felt in our State. We have now but few shipyards left of all that great number, which are now engaged in building vessels for the coastwise trade, perhaps under favors granted by the Government, I do not know.

The question is broad enough, as stated by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, to receive just and exclusive consideration in some one measure when we come to consider the revision of the navigation laws of the country and the great work of building up a merchant marine. It has no place, as it seems to me, as an amendment upon this bill.

When we come to consider it independently, as one Senator speaking for myself alone, I am willing to approach the consideration of that question with no desire to ask any special favors for that rocky coast of Maine or those independent people who have always been able to carve out their own fortunes and have sent their sons out over this Union contributing to the best of your citizenship. They sent to the State of Mississippi a Prentiss in the earlier days, who, with his matchless oratory, his patriotism, and his statesmanship, did much for that grand Commonwealth. There is hardly a State in the Union to which Maine has not contributed. Now, left alone with her hillside farms and her harbor villages, we see few shipyards. The only thing I ask is that this subject shall receive full consideration, fair consideration, not for her alone, but for the interest of the whole country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when John Paul Jones sailed out of the harbor of Portsmouth in command of the Ranger, we built ships in New Hampshire. We do not build any ships there now, and for that reason I have no interest connected with our State that would cause me to take a position for or against any proposition of this kind.

But, Mr. President, I have the same feeling that the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has expressed. We have something left of the shipbuilding industry along the New England coast, and I do not want—as an American, not as a citizen of New Hampshire—to see it sacrificed in this way.

The Merchant Marine Commission, which was composed of both Democrats and Republicans, went very thoroughly into this matter of free ships and reached certain conclusions which will be found in our report, and our Democratic members did not make any minority report. I think they were pretty well satisfied then that it was a question which required very careful consideration and that might well engage the attention of Congress when they had time and opportunity to discuss it very fully.

I am very apprehensive that this amendment if agreed to will bring about precisely what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] pictured. It does not include all our seacoast traffic, it is true, but it is a beginning, and no one is wise enough to prophesy where, if we enter upon the movement, it will end.

I am not going to detain the Senate. I am going to repeat what I in an off-hand way said last evening. It occupies only a few lines of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and it embraces the views I then held without giving the matter much consideration, and which I hold to-day. I said this, Mr. President:

> When we have shipyards in the United States employing labor at a high price, which shipyards are fully equipped to manufacture the ships for our coastwise trade, we do not want to go out into the markets of the world and buy the tramp steamships, all the half-worn-out steamships of England, France, Germany, Sweden, and Norway, and put them in competition with our ships which are built in our own shipyards.

It is well to keep in mind the fact that if this amendment prevails, not only will our people who choose to buy foreign ships buy new ships, but they can go out and gather up all the tramp steamships on the ocean, which they can purchase at a very small price, and put them in competition with the ships that are being built in American shipyards.

This whole matter of free ships is a big question. I have no doubt that in connection with our navigation laws, perhaps in the near future, it will be thrashed out in the Congress of the United States. Possibly there may be radical changes in our laws in that regard, but I feel sure that the Senate will conclude that this is not the proper time to do it, and that it ought no to be done on this bill, which relates simply to the Panama Canal.

For those reasons, Mr. President, and without detaining the Senate a moment longer, I really hope, as I believe, that the Senate will in its wisdom conclude that this amendment would better not be put on the bill that is now under consideration.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the proposed amendment seems to contemplate a very radical change in the navigation laws of this country. It is a subject of vast importance. I have certain views in respect to the merits of the proposition, but I am sure from what has already transpired that if the subject is to receive the consideration its importance demands we will unduly take the time of this body, which is now concentrated upon an enactment vitally necessary for the operation and management of the Panama Canal. In my judgment the subject of the proposed amendment should not be considered at this time, and for that reason I shall oppose it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am in hearty accord with the remark just made by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I believe the navigation laws should be revised. I do not think we will have an American merchant marine until they are, and I doubt whether they can be so revised as to give our merchant marine what I should like to have. But to put this amendment into the bill opens up one of the most important subjects of legislation which Congress can consider, and it seems to me inadvisable. I shall vote against it because I believe that it would close a number of shipyards in the United States and throw out of employment thousands of men.

I come to that conclusion from testimony that was given before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals by representatives of these shipyards, who had not the slightest idea that such an amendment would ever be incorporated in the bill, and the information was drawn out simply by incidental inquiries.

I voted against Canadian reciprocity because I did not think it was fair to put the wheat growers of the Dakotas in direct competition with those of Canada when the conditions under which the wheat was grown were different, and I shall vote against this amendment, being animated by the same principle and the same doctrine.

I know the wages paid in the Norfolk shipyards are from 40 to 65 per cent higher than those paid in England, and I know ships which would be operated in this commerce can be bought in England very much cheaper than they can in America, because the wages that are paid in the construction of the ships are very much lower there than they are here.

I regret very much that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has seen fit to bring up this subject at this time, because I am just as desirous as he is for a revision of our navigation laws in order to aid our merchant marine.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that for about 48 years we have been trying the present plan of protecting the American shipbuilder, and as a result we are now face to face with the fact that the American flag on the merchant marine has disappeared from the ocean. In spite of our protection of the material that enters into the building of the ships, in spite of the plea for higher wages for the carpenter and the workmen and the employees around our shipyards, we are seriously asked to grant a subsidy in addition to the protection in order to promote a merchant marine.

I should like to state one point further. Do the Senators who are opposing this proposition seriously take into consideration that in order to promote a system of shipbuilding it is proposed that the whole shipping interests of the American commerce shall be jeopardized and the flag shall disappear from the sea in order that the coterie of our navy yards may find employment at a wage said to be higher than those in foreign countries? Even the American producers and the American shippers have some rights that should be taken into consideration with the so-called laborers who build these ships.

Now, we have tried this thing for 48 years and it is a disastrous, miserable failure. Why, then, can we not experiment with something that promises some degree of relief, in view of the fact that the Panama Canal is soon to be opened and there will be a change of all the great transoceanic lines?

Every time a proposition comes up in the Senate looking to the solution of the great problems that confront our people, there is interposed between the relief and the people the idea that some little bunch of employees may lose their employment, no matter how much the American people may suffer by that process. I for one am ready to go on record as saying that we will allow the American people to buy their ships wherever they can buy them, and that we will modify our registry laws to such an extent that they can load them with American goods and send them across the seas, and not impoverish our people to build up a few shipyards.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will permit me, he must admit that this is a very important question that would lead to a very wide discussion and which should have very serious and thorough consideration.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I recognize that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator think that this amendment has any more place on a bill relating to the Panama Canal operations than would a revision of the tariff or any other kind of a legislative measure?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It has just as much place on this bill, and more in view of the necessity of the American people for adequate shipping facilities, as the repeal of the reciprocity treaty had on every tariff bill we had brought up here.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the American people are not suffering so far as shipping in our coastwise trade is concerned. There is an abundant supply of that. Our distress relates to the foreign trade.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am not confining myself to the coastwise shipping, nor am I confining myself to the foreign shipping. I am including both.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; this amendment relates only to the coastwise shipping.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; but I think that would be admitting the principle; and once we admit the principle we can apply it wherever we see fit.

I merely wanted to make these remarks, Mr. President, but I will make one further observation and then close; that is this: The Secretary of the Navy and the Naval Committee refused the navy yard at Charleston—perhaps one of the most available harbors on the South Atlantic seaboard, the nearest to the Panama Canal—they refused $300,000 to develop that magnificent American port. I understand that the Secretary of the Navy has practically closed up the port of New Orleans. He is going through a system of revision, shutting up navy yards along the Atlantic coast, while there is a great cry to build more ships. If he is consistent, why not allow these navy yards to take commercial business at a time when the Government business is slack? My colleague [Mr. TILLMAN] made a fight in the Naval Committee for $300,000 to improve the shipbuilding at the nearest American port on the South Atlantic seaboard to the Panama Canal; and that was turned down and refused. Then they come with the argument that we need more facilities.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I made a fight for the appropriation for the Portsmouth Navy Yard, and I, too, was turned down. I was turned down by the Democratic House of Representatives. Who turned down Charleston? The Senate put those amendments on the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I understand that when it got into conference it was voted down. I am not saying who did it or who did not do it; but I say it was done.

Mr. GALLINGER. The House conferees resisted it; they were the ones.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to make this suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire: Just take our seaboard and see where our navy yards now are and what are the appropriations for those navy yards. I do not care to inject a sectional discussion into this debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. But you did.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I did it inadvertently, because it is apparent that in a question like this it is better to leave that out, but I still insist that we have tried this plan for 48 years. It is a miserable, disastrous failure, as every special privilege in a democratic country is bound ultimately to work out.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, this proposition is an exceedingly important and far-reaching one. One thing, to my mind, is perfectly clear, that if the Senate votes on it to-day it will vote on it without proper investigation, without careful deliberation, and without a knowledge as to the consequences that may ensue either of detriment or of benefit. If we are to sacrifice the shipyards, if we are to throw out of employment the thousands and tens of thousands of mechanics and laboring men employed in those yards, if we are to practically destroy the millions and tens of millions of capital invested in the shipbuilding industry, ought we not to investigate carefully and ascertain what benefits are to be conferred commensurate with the sacrifices which we are called upon to make? Ought we not to have this complicated, important, and far-reaching proposition investigated by a standing committee of the Senate? Ought we not to give hearings to those who are interested in this plan? This is not, Mr. President, solely a question of protecting shipyards. Shipyards are as important to the national defense as are battleships. If we are to take away this important feature of the national defense, ought we not to know what compensation is to accrue to the country?

It is true, Mr. President, that we have in my State a great shipyard, whose pay roll is about $75,000 a week, about $3,000,000 a year. The very existence of a city of 40,000 population depends on the prosperity of that shipyard. Seven thousand skilled mechanics depend upon the work given in that shipyard for their daily bread; but, Mr. President, I do not stand here and ask that special privilege or that special advantage or that opportunity be given to them if it is inconsistent with the public welfare. I have hesitated very much as to what course I ought to take in respect to this matter.

I am perfectly willing to see that shipyard go out of use; I am perfectly willing to see the 7,000 skilled mechanics there compelled to go elsewhere to make their living; I am perfectly willing to see the beautiful and prosperous city of Newport News go into a state of deterioration, to put it mildly, provided the public welfare requires it. I am willing to stand here in my place and vote that all those evils to that particular place may come, if they be necessary for the public welfare of this entire country.

I say, I have hesitated very much as to what I ought to do in connection with this matter, and I have reached the conclusion that I have not the information; that I have not the knowledge; that I have not had the opportunity to give that thought, that investigation, and that consideration to this subject which it requires; and I think it is entirely improper to take such action now.

I am prepared to vote for the revision of our navigation laws; I am prepared to do whatever is necessary and wise and just to rehabilitate our merchant marine, but I am not willing to act hastily, without deliberation, without investigation, and without due consideration; and I think the other Members of the Senate are as fully ready to meet this responsibility as am I. It is not a question of that character which would justify us in rushing in without knowledge and without deliberation and without consideration. It is too important a question; it involves too much; we know too little about the consequences of good or of evil that may ensue if we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

I sincerely hope that this matter may go over until it can have proper consideration. I am ready to take it up and to treat it with radical and decisive legislation if it seems, on investigation, that by striking down or withdrawing from these industries the protection which they are now receiving the general welfare will be promoted.

But, Mr. President, what does this amendment propose? It withdraws the protection from the shipyards; it strikes a blow at all the employees of the shipyards; it brings desolation to thousands of homes, perhaps, but it continues the protection to the shipowners. It does not withdraw from the shipping the protection which the shipping now enjoys; that is continued; the monopoly of the coastwise trade is continued; it simply strikes down the shipbuilder while it preserves the monopoly and the protection for the shipowner.

Mr. President, let us devise some plan that will operate in an equitable and in a comprehensive way, and do justice to all the people and all the industries of the country. Do not proceed too hastily; do not act too radically; but proceed with wisdom, caution, and justice; deal with this question as it ought to be dealt with; do not take it up and dispose of it in a reckless, harum-scarum, careless manner, which I consider would be the case if we should vote this afternoon. I know I am not prepared to dispose of it as it ought to be disposed of, and I do not believe other Senators are any better prepared than I am.

Entertaining those views, Mr. President, but not feeling unwilling to deal with this subject at a proper time and in a proper manner, and not meaning to indicate that I am in favor of continuing present conditions—for I am not—I want the whole navigation system revised and perfected in the interest of increasing our merchant marine on the high seas; but I say, desiring to do that in good faith, I am unwilling to proceed recklessly; and I can not and will not support the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I come from a part of the country which has no direct interest in American shipping in the sense that any of its people have investments either in the coastwise trade or the over-seas trade, but it is a matter of common observation everywhere and a matter of regret everywhere that the American flag is not floating in the over-seas trade. Wherever you go that regret is expressed, and, in common with everyone else, I am in sympathy with it. But, Mr. President, there is a very large trade and commerce conducted by ships that do float the American flag, and that is in the coastwise trade. There is a commerce that apparently is prosperous and in splendid condition, the commerce on our Great Lakes and between American cities on the seacoast. I want to ask this question: Are we going to float the flag in the over-seas trade by striking a serious blow at the only trade we have upon which the American flag does float—the coastwise trade?

It seems to me that this amendment affects only that part of our trade by sea which now floats the American flag, and does not in any way directly or indirectly solve the serious question in which there is so extensive an interest everywhere—that the American flag is not floating in the over-seas trade. If we close our American shipyards and invite into the coastwise commerce all the elements that are destructive of it instead of extending our commerce under the American flag, it seems to me we will still further help to destroy it.

As a member of the Committee on Commerce and as a member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, while I do not pretend to have investigated the subject thoroughly, I have observed more than once that, so far as the over-seas trade is concerned, our navigation laws have practically been self-destructive. I believe the whole system as to the over-seas trade will have to be liberalized, and liberalized extensively, if the flag ever floats in the over-seas trade. We have gone so far in undertaking to protect American shipyards that we have squeezed out of it all the life there was in the business; but our policy as to the coastwise trade has been successful, and, if there be monopoly in it, there is a way to deal with monopoly without destroying the industry. Let us proceed in that way to remove the evils that may exist in it in the form of monopolies; but I want to see the American coastwise trade maintained in its integrity; I want to see it absolutely unshackled and divorced from the railways and thus make it a powerful competitive force through the Panama Canal. I think, as has been expressed here over and over again, that it would be imprudent and it would be dangerous to place this amendment in the pending bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the world is full of people who are afraid of freedom, who are afraid of competition, and who, whenever competition is threatened with anything in their localities, begin to talk about devastation and suffering; but I hardly expected to hear a radical protectionist speech from the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, it is not of very great consequence that I should answer that statement, but it is so absolutely inconsistent with the facts and so absolutely in violation of any proper interpretation of what I said, that I can not do less than rise to say that I feel that it is grossly unjust and entirely unjustified by a single word I uttered. I made no protection speech, and the Senator from Mississippi must be the only man within the hearing of my voice who put such an interpretation on what I said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the words of the Senator from Virginia speak for themselves. He referred to the withdrawal of "protection" from the shipyard at Newport News as spelling "devastation" and destruction; he traveled along the line of well-known argument that every protectionist orator has traveled along who has ever made a speech against tariff for revenue or a speech in favor of protectionism since the debate has been going on; since I have been in public life.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I should like to ask the Senator to state where there is any revenue in this proposition?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say there was; I said the Senator traveled along the line of argument pursued by men who are arguing that side of the question. A 14-year-old schoolboy who can read what the Senator from Virginia said will justify what I have said about it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The superior comprehension of the Senator, and his arrogance and violence in characterizing what other Senators say, which is so very apparent day after day whenever he has anything to say about any Senator, is reflected again to-day in his remarks in respect to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not losing my temper.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I confess, Mr. President, I am losing mine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have said nothing except that the utterances of the Senator from Virginia, in my opinion, were what I have said. His utterances stand in the RECORD—they speak for themselves; and if my opinion concerning them is not correct, the very reading of what he has said will correct that opinion. It is not necessary that he and I should say anything about one another's "arrogance," or anything else. Whether I am arrogant or not—and I hope I am not—I think personally I am a peculiarly amiable, patient, good-natured man, and everybody will bear me out in that, I have a right to express surprise and astonishment that the idea is broached by a Democrat that the depriving of any man of a special privilege granted by law is to be resisted upon the ground that it will hurt a special industry.

The Senator from Virginia says that he "has not information enough" to act upon this question; that he is "not ready." If he is not ready now, I do not know when he can become ready. He wants "investigation." He wants "information." He wants "knowledge." He wants "discussion, and other Senators want all those things." For 20 years, to my knowledge, this question has been discussed in books and upon the floors of both Houses. Committee after committee and commission after commission have investigated the question and have reported to the public upon it. During those 20 years while I have been in the public service several of the gentlemen who "want further light" have been here, whether they have been in the public service or not, and others have been studying political and economic questions, and, studying political and economic questions, this mass of information has been before them.

Mr. President, Gen. Hancock said, when he was running for the Presidency, that protection was a local issue. As for myself, I stand upon the broad ground that no man, no industry, no class has a right to anything at the hands of the Government except fair play and a free field and equal opportunity. If I understand Democracy—that is, Democracy from the days of Thomas Jefferson down to now—every special privilege granted by law which inures to the private benefit of any man or any industry is an undemocratic privilege. I am ready to act upon this matter.

One word now in answer to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. He says, and says, I think, very properly, that this privilege ought not to be confined to the coastwise trade alone. After this amendment which I have offered shall have been voted up or voted down, I shall then offer another amendment to obviate that objection. I shall move, if it is voted down, that, on page 6, line 14, after the word "States," the following words shall be inserted:

That all legal prohibitions upon the American registration of foreign-built ships for the foreign trade are hereby repealed wherever said ships are exclusively owned by Americans.

We will then see whether that amendment will be adopted. It can not be urged in reference to that amendment that a single shipyard in the United States is building any ships for the foreign trade. The old Republican cry, to which we have become accustomed, and repeated to-day by the Senator from Virginia, that it will put labor out of employment and make capital inoperative can not be made against that amendment, because, by universal admission upon this floor, no American shipyards are building any ships for the foreign trade. If you want the American flag to fly from the masts of ships that shall go to the Indian Ocean, to the Mediterranean, to the South Seas, and all over the world, exchanging our products for the products of other nations, in a condition where you will not, in securing this great benefit, put out of employment a single American laborer or make a dividend upon a single American investment any the less, then you will vote for the other amendment when you get to it.

In expressing my views on the question of policy, I am expressing my views of what is Democratic policy. Every Senator understands that I am actuated by no sort of personal feeling of any description, and when I say that a given position is not Democratic I mean by it that, in my judgment, it is not; and I buttress myself upon the history of the party and its utterances for years and years in justification of the statement. I have no more personal feeling in connection with characterizing an utterance of the Senator from Virginia than I have when I answer a like protective argument made by the Senator from Massachusetts or a like protective argument made by the Senator from Utah; and to be arraigned personally because I do it is not the way of arguing public questions to which I am accustomed.

I call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the fact that after this amendment is voted up or voted down I shall then offer the other one whose significance I have indicated.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, my objection to that is that, to my mind, the two questions are entirely distinct and separate from each other. In a proper bill I would be glad to advocate the permission of American citizens to acquire foreign vessels, so that we may have them floating upon the seas under the American flag in the foreign trade; but I do not want that question to in any way jeopardize this bill nor the present conditions that exist in the coastwise trade, which does float the American flag.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, to me this discussion has been illuminating, instructive, and entertaining, coming, as it does, from both sides of the Chamber. I can see how dear protection is to the American people, but we have not heard a single word in the interest of the producer or shipper, except what was said by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. We have given a monopoly to those who are engaged in the coastwise trade. They are the only ones who can engage in that commerce. Yesterday we subsidized those who are engaged in that commerce.

I have on every occasion opposed a ship subsidy, such as has been presented during the time I have been a Member of either this or the other body, for the reason that it has been a discrimination even against the shipping industry. There has never been a bill that I know, presented either in this body or the other body while I have been a Member of either, that has given an equal opportunity to all the shippers, but it has been a distinctive and an absolute discrimination.

I am rather surprised that Senators have been silent and that scarcely nothing has been said for the benefit of the producer and the shipper, that their interest needs to be protected. We take it for granted, I suppose, that as to the men who are engaged in this great shipping industry, an industry that is now a monopoly, we can depend upon their generosity and patriotism for justice. Is that the way we are trying to regulate these great combinations of wealth? Is it not the great question in which the American people are interested to-day how to regulate these great combinations of wealth? We have with our votes granted special privileges to special privileged corporations. We on yesterday granted a subsidy to those who are engaged in the coastwise trade, and we did it just as much as though we had taken the money out of the Treasury of the United States. It is simply a difference in bookkeeping, and that is all.

I do not want to do an injustice to a single industry in this country, but I do want to see even-handed justice done to all. It has been amusing to me to hear Senators on the other side, who made such patriotic speeches a year ago in the interests of the consumer when it affected an industry that never had and in which there will never be a monopoly. It was said then that it was in the interest of the consumer. Are you giving the consumer a special benefit now by granting special privileges to an aggregation of capital? Are you doing even-handed justice to the American consumer by granting a subsidy to these corporate interests? I have seen Senators on this side refuse to support measures that would give to millions of our people protection to their industry, but when it comes to an industry that is owned and controlled by a few men who are worth millions, their industry is generally protected.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi for the reason that I believe every American citizen should have the right to buy his ships wherever he pleases. We often hear that the reason why we must give a subsidy to the shipping industry is because our ships cost more. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi will do away with that. It will permit Americans who have capital to go where they please and buy their ships where they can buy them to the best advantage.

Mr. President, I voted against free tolls to ships engaged in the coastwise trade for the reason that I do not believe in giving special privileges to anyone. I know, Mr. President, that we who live in the interior will pay for it. There is not a Senator on this floor who will deny that this is a discrimination against the people in the interior of our country for those who live on the coasts and where shipping is done from one port to another the rate might be made a little cheaper by giving a special privilege to the coastwise shipping trade. But they also know that it is the practice to-day where railroad companies are charging a low rate from one coast to another, as from New York to Seattle, those who live in the interior are charged the full rate plus the local rate back to the interior point. You are saddling this burden, I say, upon the people who live in the interior of this country.

Mr. President, I want to protect all the industries of this country, but I want to see equal opportunity and equal protection to them all. When I see Senators on the other side who are so afraid of protection rise in their seats and with great eloquence and force remind us of the fact that we will do away with a great industry if the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi prevails, it is certainly amusing to me. It simply goes to show that we are all anxious to protect the industries in our own States. I challenge no man's sincerity of purpose. I believe that we are all patriotic enough to do what in our judgment we believe is for the best of the entire country; but we are only human, and we try at least to protect the interest and the industry that is nearest and dearest to us.

Fault has been found with my attitude for trying to place an amendment on certain bills to repeal a law that was an absolute injustice to a great number of the American people. The Senator from Mississippi said in substance that he stands for those things which will give equal opportunity to all. I believe that he is generally willing to do that. But he did not do so by voting for the reciprocity agreement that was passed in the Senate a year ago, because that agreement compelled the producer of natural products to dispose of his products in an open market and absolutely prohibited him from buying what he needed in the open market. It compelled him, I say, to buy his necessaries, to buy his machinery and what he needs on the farm in a protected market.

Mr. President, I probably ought to apologize to the Senate for taking so much time. I intended on yesterday to say a word or two about the amendment then pending, but other Senators said it much better than I could hope to do. I believe to-day, as I did on yesterday, that it is a mistake to grant special privileges to any industry that is controlled by a few men, and that is all that the question then before the Senate meant. The amendment that was offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] proposed that all nations should receive the same consideration. Not only that, but if that amendment had been adopted, no one could have questioned our good faith to live up to the full measure of the provisions of the treaty that we have entered into with foreign nations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, this is a bill to provide for the operation of the Panama Canal and the government of the Canal Zone. There were introduced into the bill in committee certain features which I regretted to see interjected into it, because I thought they had a remote relation, if any, to the object of the bill. There are many measures that Senators and Representatives would like to get passed by Congress. There are many measures of an academic character which they have introduced and which have been referred to the committees, on which no serious discussion has been had, that might be added on the bill. I had hoped that this bill would not be made an omnium gatherum for all the measures of varying degree of merit and demerit. I had hoped that the bill would go through on its merits and provide for the operation of a great national constructive work.

I agree with the Senator from Virginia that whatever may be the merit of this particular amendment and the proposition embraced therein, there has been no systematic, scientific investigation of the subject, at least at the present session of Congress. I would not want to vote on the subject in all its bearings without knowing a good deal more about it than I do now.

I agree with the Senator from South Dakota that this bill should not be made the vehicle of floating through Congress propositions; not upon an expressed threat by anybody in particular but with the effect of loading it down so that the bill has either got to be defeated or a lot of controverted and contested measures will go along with it.

I sincerely hope that this amendment will not prevail. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I was very much impressed with the truth of the statements on this side of the Chamber to the effect that this is a far-reaching question. I could not but note how quickly and how forcibly it reached the coast of Maine and the shipyards of Virginia.

But, Mr. President, taking the matter of locality out of consideration, I wish to call attention to our great generosity toward our coastwise shippers. Under our navigation laws we created them the only great monopoly in the country. Under our navigation laws no one can compete with them. We follow this up and we build at enormous expense, requiring an enormous taxation upon the American people, a canal and turn it over to them for their free use and benefit.

Following on this line of our generous inclinations, we yesterday declared that they should pay no tolls, and in the same bill we made that declaration we also provided that the Government should pay them if in our handling of their boats through the Isthmus we should scratch them or shake them up in any way. We have certainly run to the limit of generosity in dealing with the only law-created monopoly in the United States.

Mr. President, I agree with my colleague [Mr. GRONNA] entirely that what we did yesterday was a gross injustice to our section of the country. If I could see my way clear to connect the shipper with the shipbuilder, I certainly would support this amendment. But so far as I can see they are distinct entities. Whatever is gained by the shipper does not inure, that I can see, to the benefit of the shipbuilder.

Therefore, feeling as I do, that the shipbuilder can not compete in the open market with the shipyards of the Old World, and that the effect of this legislation would be to practically close those yards, I can scarcely see my way clear as a protectionist to punish the shipbuilder because I think the shipper has gained an undue advantage, and which advantage has been greatly increased by our action yesterday.

For that reason, Mr. President, I do not feel that I can support the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, this amendment proposes to amend section 5 of the bill by inserting a provision affecting the navigation laws of the country. I make the point of order against it that it is not germane to the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut makes the point of order that the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi is not germane. Under the rule of the Senate that is required to be submitted to the Senate, and is not to be decided by the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, one word upon the point of order only. It seems to me that it is germane, because the bill provides that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade shall be exempt from tolls. It therefore is true that anything defining what vessels shall be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade is germane to the provision that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade shall be exempt from tolls.

This seems to me to be a sufficient answer to the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair repeats that under the rule of the Senate the point of order when made must be submitted to the Senate for decision. The question is on the point of order made by the Senator from Connecticut to the effect that the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi is not germane to the bill. Senators who favor the point of order will say "aye"; those opposed will say "no." [Putting the question.] The noes appears to have it. The noes have it, and the point of order is not sustained. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the vote upon the amendment be taken by a rising and a standing vote.

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 10, noes 38.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 14, after the words "United States," insert the following:

That all legal prohibitions upon the American registration of foreign-built ships for foreign trade are hereby repealed: Provided, The ships are exclusively of American ownership.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just offered. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask to have the amendment read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Before the vote is taken I should like to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi as to the effect of this amendment. It has not been debated, but as near as I could gather from hearing it read it would not have the effect of in any way invading the present monopoly of American-built ships for the coastwise trade.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; and, furthermore, because of that fact it would have no effect upon the shipbuilding yards in America, it being admitted that they do not build any ships for the foreign trade, or if they do that the amount of shipbuilding for the foreign trade in infinitesimal and negligible. So the usual and customary argument made against every proposition to admit new competition into any industry can not apply here. There is no American capital actually engaged in building foreign ships, and no American labor engaged in yards which are building foreign ships. The sole effect would be to enable American citizens to buy for purposes of navigation in the foreign trade alone ships upon which they could place the American flag.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, Mr. President, it would forever prohibit any American shipyard from building a ship for the foreign trade.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the American shipyard admittedly builds none for the foreign trade.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But they hope to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not prevent them from building, if they can do it in competition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They can not do it in competition; that is the point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I say it is admitted that, as a matter of fact, they do not. Now, if they shall ever be placed in a condition where they can or will do it, there is nothing in this amendment to prevent the ship from being built in an American shipyard. It merely provides that, although it may have been built in a foreign shipyard, it may yet be entitled to American registry and to fly the American flag, provided its ownership is exclusively our own.

Mr. POINDEXTER. My judgment would be, so far as its effect upon the building in American shipyards of ships engaged in foreign trade, that if the amendment had any effect at all, it would tend to develop such an industry and result in the building of ships engaged in the foreign trade by American shipyards, which industry they are not engaged in now. The result would be to interest Americans and American capital and American seamen in the navigation of ships flying the American flag in the foreign trade. It would tend to develop national interest in it. It would tend to create what some great railroad man has said was essential for the development of an American merchant marine, namely, a desire on the part of the American people to have a merchant marine, and an interest in that business, and from that interest there ought to grow, in the American shipyards, the construction of ships for that trade.

Some Senator has just said we could not compete with foreign shipyards in building ships for the foreign trade. We do not whether we could or not. We have not made any effort to do it in recent years. At one time we did successfully compete. But now the merchant marine is so shackled and is so bound hand and foot by obsolete shipping laws that there has been no opportunity for them to test their ability or to test the resources of American shipbuilding and the competitive conditions in an American shipyard in that industry. If it would have any effect at all, the effect would be to encourage the industry, because under the present conditions it has been absolutely stifled. It undoubtedly would result, whether the ships were built in American shipyards or not, in removing the anomalous stuation which we see now. By going to New Orleans anyone can see a line of great vessels plying in the trade between that city and Central American ports, a great American commerce owned by Americans, financed by Americans, doing exclusively an American business at American ports, but flying the British flag.

Certainly that is not creditable to our navigation laws; and when an effort has been made for 45 years to build up an industry by excluding from registry foreign-built ships, with the result that it has driven American shipping from the high seas, it seems to me that it would at least be wise to experiment a little bit in another direction.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to have the amendment read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 14, after the words "United States," insert:

That all legal prohibitions upon the American registration of foreign-built ships for foreign trade are hereby repealed: Provided, The ships are exclusively of American ownership.

Mr. BRISTOW. That would remove all restrictions and permit the American-owned ships that are bought abroad to sail without any legal restraints or restrictions whatever as to the seamen, employment, sanitation, or anything else. It seems to me that on a bill like this at this time of the session it is a very grave proposition to offer an amendment so sweeping that nobody knows what it means or what effect it will have upon the laws of the country or the industries of the country that are affected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not want to discuss this question. I think the Senator from Kansas is quite right on the phrasing of the amendment. It will repeal all legal restrictions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, the language is plain. It removes only the legal restriction upon American registration; that is all. The other navigation laws, management, officering, manning, and all the balance are not disturbed or touched by it. The language is that it repeals "all legal prohibitions upon the American registration of foreign-built ships." The Senator from Kansas misunderstood it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, there is a provision in the bill soon to be reached, or some time to be be reached, at least is close at hand so far as space in the bill is concerned, providing for the free passage of American boats through the canal engaged in foreign commerce. It would make some difference with me, if I was in sympathy with this proposition, as to whether that provision passes or not. If it shall be the opinion of the Senate that our American boats engaged in the foreign trade shall not be permitted to go through that canal free, then I am not very particular as to where the boats shall be built, but if we can adopt that provision—as we ought to adopt it—then there would be some inducement for building boats in American shipyards, American boats that would engage in our foreign commerce. Unless that is settled I am inclined to vote against this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What the Senator meant to say was that that provision will permit our ships in the foreign trade to go through the canal free.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He said come through.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I meant to go through free.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It seems to me that in either event it would put that many more flags upon American-owned and American-navigated ships.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am in favor of building these boats at home, if we can build them, and if giving them free tolls is going to offer some inducement for the building of American ships in American shipyards, I want to support it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question about the amendment? It refers to foreign ships built for the purposes of foreign trade. That is descriptive of the ships, but after they have been admitted to American registry, does it prohibit them from then entering into the coastwise trade?

Mr. WILLIAMS. My judgment is that it would not admit them to enter into the coastwise trade.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not think it is at all clear that that is to be the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it does not make it plain, I will make it plain.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am in agreement with the Senator from Mississippi so far as liberalizing our navigation laws as to ships engaged in the foreign trade or oversea trade. We do not build any. Our system has absolutely failed in that respect, and I am willing to try a more liberal policy for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is not possible to float the American flag on the seas. But I do not want to inject that proposition into the existing conditions prevailing in the coastwise trade. It ought not to be placed in this bill unless it is so drawn that its terms are clear and specific and not of doubtful meaning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The amendment as drawn is not, I think, obnoxious to the objection which the Senator from South Dakota has just made. It does not say built for the foreign trade, as the Senator seems to think. It says foreign-built ships for the American trade. But to remove all sorts of doubt I shall ask to strike out the word "for" after the words "foreign built" and insert "to engage only in the foreign trade." Then there can be no manner of doubt in regard to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single word. It is a most extraordinary procedure, Mr. President, to engage in the amendment or repeal of our navigation laws upon a bill of this kind. I am surprised that any Senator feels like advocating an amendment which accomplishes that result. Our navigation laws have stood the test of time fairly well. In some respects very likely they ought to be changed and liberalized, but it ought to be done after very careful investigation and consideration and not on the spur of the moment upon a bill to which the amendment is not in any wise germane, and which, in my judgment, ought not to be offered.

Mr. President, it is true that we are not building many foreign ships now. I think I was in an American shipyard a little while ago where the keel for at least one ship to be used in the foreign trade was being laid, but it is a fact that the industry is languishing almost to the point of extinction. However, the American people always indulge the pleasures of hope, and those who are engaged in shipbuilding as well as the rest of us have been hoping, perhaps against hope, that there would be legislation of some kind that would rehabilitate this industry.

A great many people believe it can be done through reestablishing the time-honored principle of differential duties. As I remarked last evening, unfortunately we have commercial agreements with the foreign nations which prevent us from doing that unless we denounce those agreements, which I think we ought to do because, as I remarked last evening, when these nations entered into that reciprocal arrangement with us they immediately proceeded to subsidize their ships and nullified the effect of the agreement so far as our country was concerned.

I should like very much to let this matter rest a while longer. Our Democratic friends say they are coming into power after the 4th of March. I do not know whether they are or not. If they are, it will be "up to them," to use a phrase of the street, to do what they can for the merchant marine of the United States, which they all agree, with all Republicans, is something that really merits our serious consideration.

There is one other point, Mr. President. Perhaps it is not worth much consideration, but when the Merchant Marine Commission, of which I chanced to be chairman, composed of Members of both Houses of both parties, engaged in that exhaustive investigation we took testimony on this very point in all the great commercial centers of the country. We called Kidder, Peabody & Co., in Boston, and put the matter directly up to them, if we should recommend free ships, and Congress passed a law of that kind, would you advance any capital and put it in the purchase of foreign ships to be run under the laws of the United States, and they said, "Not a dollar," their answer being that it cost so much more under our laws in the victualing of the ship and the high salaries of the officers of the ship—twice that of any other nation, I think—that they would consider it a losing proposition. We put the same thing up to some capitalists in New York City—I have forgotten who they were, now—and we received the same answer. The same question was asked of certain well-known capitalists in Chicago, and they gave us the same answer. So that I really believe—and that is not an argument against it—that even if this amendment should be adopted it would be nugatory. We would get very few, if any, foreign ships under the American flag for the reason that American capitalists would not put up the money to buy them and run them in competition with the ships of nations which navigate their ships for so much less than we do.

Mr. President, I want to vote on this, of course, as speedily as possible; I have no earthly interest in the matter, but I sincerely wish that all these questions relating to free ships and to the amendment of our navigation laws may not be forced upon this bill in a provision of that kind, but that it may go over, and at the next session of Congress, or the next Congress, if we can not do it at the next session, this matter should be taken up seriously and given careful consideration by the proper committee, and the Senate would then be in a position to debate the matter and to act much more intelligently and, as I think, much more wisely than we can do to-day.

Mr. SHIVELY. The issue on this amendment, even from the standpoint of those who declare themselves opposed to both amendments, is sharply distinguishable from the issue on the amendment just voted down. On the latter it was contended that much American capital is invested and American labor employed, the interests of which would be menaced, if not sacrificed, should the amendment become law. Whatever force this contention may have as to that amendment, it can have none as to that now before the Senate. No American capital in American shipyards can be displaced, for the reason that not a dollar of capital is now employed in ship construction for the deep-sea trade. No American laborer can be disfranchised of employment, as not one is employed in construction for this trade.

The fact is, the question of shipbuilding is not the primary question at all. There is no scarcity of ships in the foreign trade. There is no lack of ships to carry our products to the world's markets. There never was a keener struggle than at this hour for commercial business in the over-seas carrying trade. The harbors of the world are crowded with idle ships, waiting in vain for cargoes. The point is to amend the present law so that ships may be secured for use in the foreign trade by an American citizen on the best terms possible, and that the citizen may then have his ships registered and fly the American flag over his property. To do this is to offer an opportunity for the restoration of our foreign merchant marine, without prejudice to any American interest. The United States is the only nation on the face of the earth to-day whose Government withholds registry from a foreign-built ship when owned by one of its citizens or subjects. Not another nation is left to cling to this barbarism in our navigation laws. The amendment proposes no novelty.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator is not quite accurate in that statement. When the two great Cunarders—the Mauretania and the Lusitania—were to be built, it was specifically provided in the contract that they should be built in British yards. Germany has made the same provision in reference to some of her ships. It is not a general provision.

Mr. SHIVELY. Certainly, it is not general. The instances are so exceptional as to emphasize the rule. They relate alone to cases where the Governments enter into contract with the owners of the ship to secure some special end such as the right to call the ship into the transport service in time of war. In such case particular construction is necessary to answer the purpose in view The general rule among all nations, except our own, is that the citizen or subject may go where he will, procure a ship at such price as he can, take it home, register it under the law, and put it in the merchant marine of his country.

When Bismarck set about the task of building up the German ocean-carrying trade, he proposed to go out and procure ships where they could be had on the best terms. At once a sullen growl came up from the German shipyards. Bismarck persisted in his purpose. Iron hulls of the latest and most approved type were ordered in the shipyards of Armstrong, brought to Germany, and put in her merchant marine under the German flag. Within a very brief time the German shipbuilders found that the new policy was not only not prejudicial to them, but to their decided advantage.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHIVELY. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not only did that wise Government of Germany give subventions to her ships, but she gave rebates on all the material that was carried over the railroads and the waterways of Germany entering into the construction of ships; and she is doing so to-day.

Mr. SHIVELY. May it please the Senator, it was not my purpose in addressing the Senate to go into the general question of government aid or subsidy as a stimulant to merchant marine. Nor shall I now. But never, in my judgment, has the influence of subsidy as a help to merchant marine been so outrageously exaggerated in the Senate as on yesterday and this afternoon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not mean to open the subject of subsidy; I meant simply to show how wise Germany has been in making these rebates for material carried on her railroads that is used in German ships. The same is true of everything they export for that purpose; and to-day Germany is building her ships in her own shipyards.

Mr. SHIVELY. Indeed, sir; and for the very reason that I have stated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no——

Mr. SHIVELY. The German shipyards fought the policy. They protested against permitting Germans to have ships built at the Armstrong yards, or permitting them to procure them in other foreign markets. But the policy was steadily adhered to and pursued. The ships were brought home to Germany and put under the German flag. Repairing vessels is the most profitable part of shipyard operations. In repair work on the new style and type of ships the Germans improved on the shipbuilding art. They prospered as never before. Under this policy they reached that degree of proficiency and economy in shipbuilding that Germany is to-day building battleships for many other nations against the competition of the whole outside world. The policy of free ships contributed far more decisively than all other influences combined to give to modern Germany her merchant marine, and at the same time to give to German shipbuilding a degree of prosperity it never enjoyed before.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit just a brief interruption, I wish to say that the Senator a moment ago said the shipyards of the world were full of unemployed ships. If that be so, what good will it do to build any more ships for the trade of any country?

Mr. SHIVELY. It is not primarily a question of another ship upon the ocean. It is a question of putting ships already on the ocean, carrying American commerce, and many of which are now owned by American citizens under the American flag. I am not neglecting the shipbuilder, but am speaking in view of an obvious situation. Does the Senator doubt that in the great seaports of the world there are numerous well-built but idle and decaying ships waiting in vain for cargoes? Does not the Senator know that the struggle by shipowners for the ocean trade was never more fierce than to-day?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. Mr. President, I presume there are some idle ships; but I do not know how this amendment is going to remedy that condition.

Mr. SHIVELY. The end desired is the restoration of our deep-sea merchant marine. We hope to see our products and the commerce of other lands carried under the American flag in ships owned by American citizens.

Mr. GALLINGER. But built by foreigners.

Mr. SHIVELY. Our foreign commerce, except a very slender per cent, is now carried under foreign flags in ships built by foreigners. Not a ship is being built for our foreign trade by an American shipyard. What can the amendment lose us? The Senator admits there is not a dollar of labor or capital now employed in construction of ships for this trade.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SHIVELY. I do.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will allow me, I do not know exactly what number of ships built in this country are engaged in the foreign trade, but there are certainly some.

Mr. GALLINGER. About 10 at the present time.

Mr. LIPPITT. There must be more than that. There is a line going out of Boston with a very considerable number of vessels.

Mr. GALLINGER. Were those built in American shipyards?

Mr. LIPPITT. I think they must have been. They are vessels engaged in the West Indies trade; there is also a line of ships running to South America; and there is a line of ships running to Porto Rico that go to Jamaica. I know some of them are wooden ships.

Mr. GALLINGER. Porto Rico is not in the foreign trade.

Mr. LIPPITT. They go on to Jamaica and stop incidentally at Porto Rico. I do not know enough about the subject to argue it thoroughly, but I simply want to call the Senator's attention to the point that when he says there are none that that is certainly an exaggeration. How many are going to be displaced is worthy of consideration.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator must have misunderstood me. I have not contended that there are no American ships in the deep-sea trade. A slight per cent of our deep-sea tonnage is carried in American ships. I am impressed that the Senator from New Hampshire has rather underestimated the actual number engaged in that trade

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be so. I know that there are four that cross the North Atlantic, and I believe that there are three on the Pacific Ocean to-day. They are in commission, and I believe New Zealand is helping to put up the cost of running them; our Government would not do it. There may be some shorter lines, such as the Red D Line to Venezuela, with two or three inconsequential ships. I do not know whether or not they were built in American shipyards. I think we have taken first and last by special legislation quite a number of foreign-built ships that we have now in commission.

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes. Congress has now and then by special act admitted a foreign-built ship to American registry. To this extent the principle has been recognized in our legislation. With these exceptions, our policy has utterly excluded vessels not built in the United States from registry. At the end of 40 years of expedients American shipbuilding for the over-sea trade has vanished and our merchant marine has each succeeding year approached nearer the vanishing point. Why cling to a provision of the navigation code that leaves us neither shipbuilding for the foreign trade nor merchant marine in that trade?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHIVELY. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Indiana if this is not, in brief, the present situation: The cost of building a ship for the foreign trade in an American shipyard is so high that no shipowner can afford to pay the price, and none will pay the price, and the present law is such that it will not permit an American shipowner to have a ship for the purpose of the foreign trade built where he can get it built at a reasonable cost. Is not that the present situation?

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, to answer fully the question submitted by the Senator from North Carolina would require a review of the history of shipbuilding for the last century, and much attention to the changes in the art and the manner in which these changes affected the industry in different countries. It is too long a story for me now to go into at length. But certain it is that the time was when the shipbuilders of the United States built better and cheaper ships than were produced in any other country. Not only were the Americans proving their superiority in shipbuilding, but also in navigation. Between 1845 and 1855 this country became not only a formidable rival but was on the point of surpassing Great Britain both in tonnage of ships constructed and in tonnage of ships in the ocean-carrying trade. We had about one-third of the carrying trade of the world, England one-third, and the other nations of the world the remaining third. That was the day of the wooden ship.

The material for shipbuilding was abundant and convenient. The transition from sail to steam still left the wooden ship, and the superiority remained with the American builder. England was losing in this rivalry on the ocean, and, in 1849, met the crisis by liberalizing her navigation code. Foreign-built ships were admitted to British registry. Englishmen came to the United States, bought our superior ships, took them home, admitted them to British registry, replenished British merchant marine with the best tools of the trade the world was producing, and thus saved at once her menaced ocean-carrying trade, and by the growth and activities of that merchant marine saved her shipyards. Disraeli vehemently opposed the modification of the navigation code as being a death stroke to British shipbuilding. Remonstrances signed by 40,000 workmen in British shipyards were filed with Parliament against the measure. But the spirit of liberal trade laws had risen strong in England and the bill became law. Within a very brief time thereafter the act had so completely vindicated the wisdom back of it that it was approved on all sides and by all classes, and by none more cordially than the shipbuilders themselves.

Then came the iron ship. It wrought a revolution in ship construction and in navigation. England had a convenient abundance of material for the new construction. Her shipbuilders at once reconstructed their plants and adapted them to the new developments in the art. The iron ship with the screw propeller became at once the superior tool in merchant marine. The shipbuilders of the United States clung to the wooden ship and the paddle wheel, and commenced even in 1856 to fall back in the struggle for supremacy in the ocean foreign trade. So long as we were building a cheaper and better ship than our rivals the provision of our navigation laws that denies registry to a foreign-built ship had no serious effect. But when the shift came from the wooden ship to the iron ship, this provision of the code became an absolute bar against replenishing our merchant marine with the best tools of the trade, and we lost in the race.

England repealed the code, purchased superior ships from our shipyards, replenished and saved her merchant marine, and with it her shipbuilding industry. We clung to the code, denied American seamen the best tools of their trade, lost our position in deep-sea commerce and our deep-sea shipbuilding industry disappeared with it. The laws of this country offered such prizes to the iron and steel industry to exploit the American people that there was little temptation for many years after the change from the wooden to the iron ship to meet foreign competition in iron or steel shipbuilding.

Now, as to the question of the relative cost of modern construction. There is nothing insurmountable in this matter of cost. One difficulty in this country that has existed ever since the advent of the iron and steel ship is that construction for the deep-sea trade, as a rule, has been only retail; that is, one ship at a time. In the foreign shipyard shipbuilding is standardized, so that a dozen ships of the same size, type, and tonnage are built at the same time. By this building at wholesale a vast economy is realized, just as the contractor can build a dozen houses of the same design at the same time much more cheaply than he can build the same number of houses, but each of them at a different time and each without reference to the other in procuring and handling the material that goes into them. But it must not be forgotten that two battleships have been built within the last couple of years in the shipyards of this country for the Argentine Republic.

Mr. LODGE. They are building; they have not yet been turned out.

Mr. SHIVELY. In any event, the contract was let in 1910. I was under the impression that they had been completed. They are in process of construction. The American builders took the contract for these two ships in open competition with all the other shipyards of the world. They, of course, are steel ships. A ton of pig iron can be made at no place in this world cheaper than in Alabama. That this country in its marvelous development of iron and steel will be able to build ships, not only for our own deep-sea trade, but for that of foreign nations, I have no doubt.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SHIVELY. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. In connection with the ships of the Argentine Republic, which are being built in our yards, does not the precise law to which the Senator has referred in regard to building ships wholesale and standardizing them apply in this case, for those yards have been built up because of the work given them by our own Government?

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes; with a view to the construction of its necessary battleships.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; and we are enabled to standardize the ships.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIVELY. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I want to interrupt the Senator, because it is directly in point at this time in the remarks he is making to call attention to an article in the New York Herald of Sunday, June 2, under a Washington date line. I shall not read all of it, but part of it reads as follows:

> De Courcey May, erstwhile president and now chairman of the board of directors of the New York Shipbuilding Co., in a statement made public to-day, attacks the action of the House of Representatives in reducing the appropriation for the State Department.
> Mr. May's company is now at work on some $13,000,000 worth of battleships under contracts secured from the Governments of the Argentine Republic and China, which, he says, he procured directly through the efforts of the State Department.
>
> "We are scattering more than $10,000,000 of South American gold in this country," he said, "in the construction of battleships for the Argentine Republic.
>
> "We fought for a whole year for this contract in competition with the shipbuilders of France, England, Germany, and other countries. I confess, frankly, that had it not been for the assistance given to us by the State Department we never would have obtained the contract.
> "It takes more than two years to build a ship of this size. Think of the work that means for the eight thousand and odd men employed in the two shipyards in which these Argentine battleships are building. Think of the work it gives to the men in the steel mills and other factories where we buy the materials for these ships."

I simply call attention to that because of the statement of Mr. May directly showing that they did secure the contract in competition with the world, and are now building the ships.

Mr. SHIVELY. Yes; and of course the assistance rendered by the State Department was not pecuniary.

Mr. REED. Oh, certainly not; but moral, probably.

Mr. SHIVELY. Entirely moral. I do not believe, Mr. President, that I care to discuss the matter further.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I want to say, in justification of the suggestion I have made two or three times, that there were about 10 American ships engaged in the foreign trade that I meant—of course, the over-seas trade, crossing the great oceans.

Mr. SHIVELY. That is what you understand by "the foreign trade"?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that is the foreign trade. I think we have about 10 ships engaged in that kind of trade; but, of course, we have short lines to Cuba and other near-by points which operate, I presume, some American-built ships. I imagine we have probably several hundred American-built ships, perhaps a thousand—I am not sure of that—in connection with these short lines; but in the great over-seas trade, the trade across the Atlantic and the Pacific, we have this very small number of ships. I wanted to make that statement to qualify what I have heretofore said on the same subject.

Mr. SHIVELY. All of which is a terrific commentary on the expedients resorted to in the last 40 years to restore our merchant marine.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIVELY. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. SHIVELY. I have.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate, but there were some statements made before the committee by Capt. Dollar upon this question that I want, in brief form, to go into the RECORD. Capt. Dollar, for instance, has four ships engaged in the over-seas trade. He has four ships engaged in the American coastwise trade. Upon his ships engaged in the coastwise trade he is able to have the American flag float, because of the privileges extended to coastwise ships, but upon his ships engaged in the over-seas trade he is compelled to float a foreign flag. I have no doubt that the situation which requires this American citizen to float a foreign flag over the four ships owned by him engaged in the foreign trade covers the situation with respect to a large number of American citizens engaged in this business. He was explaining the disadvantages that compelled him to float his ships engaged in the foreign trade under a foreign flag. For instance, he says here—I quote from page 569—

> I built a ship and got it delivered in Glasgow, Scotland, last October. That ship was under 9,000 tons, and when it sailed from Greenock we computed the cost to us at $248,260.80. I just let a contract two weeks ago to get a ship built at Long Beach, near Los Angeles, for $200,000, and that ship we could put into the hold of this ship from Scotland. She is 216 feet long, while the Scottish ship is 423 feet long.

He was able to use this American ship in the coastwise trade, but he could not use the same ship in the foreign trade on account of the difference in cost.

Mr. Baker, of Baltimore, I think, gave an instance, which is found on page 578, in relation to two of these ships. He said:

In 1901, when I was president of the Atlantic Transport Co., just before inauguration of the International Mercantile Marine, it was determined to build two identical ships. One was built by the New York Shipbuilding Co. and the other at Harlan & Wolff's, Belfast.

We intended to keep a very accurate record of the comparative cost of these two ships for 10 years, so that we could settle for all time this question of the difference in cost of American and British ships. I have the figures here, and they are very interesting.

The Michigan was built abroad and the Maine in America, and the actual difference during the 10 years was about 56 per cent. The actual measure was 8,001 tons built in England and 7,914 tons built in America. Now, the cost in England was $647,640, and the cost in the United States was $1,010,135, making a difference in cost of $362,495.

These are the conditions that keep the American flag off of ships in the over-sea trade, and I am in sympathy with the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, because I think if an American citizen has invested all he possess in these ships, it is American money, it is an American citizen, it is an American enterprise, and because he is unable to overcome these wide differences to which I have called attention here, he must conduct this foreign business under a foreign flag, and I do not believe that we should continue conditions that make that situation necessary.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from South Dakota a question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Assuming that this amendment should pass—an amendment with which I am in sympathy—I will ask the Senator whether he thinks it would be an obstacle to the final passage or the final signing of the bill?

I will say in that connection that I regard this as an emergency measure, and for that reason, as we are drawing toward the close of this session, I favor keeping all amendments strictly to the general purpose of the bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let me say to the Senator from Nevada that I realize that we are all worn out and the session and its business are now on our nerves, and I certainly do not want to prolong the discussion or jeopardize an important and necessary bill; and if this amendment should jeopardize the bill itself or unduly delay it, I woud not advise pressing it at this time. But I am glad to have an opportunity to express my view in relation to the general subject without taking up any undue time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator has not completely answered my question. Perhaps is is not a fair question. But I will repeat it. Does the Senator regard the adoption of this amendment as embarrassing in any way the signing of this bill?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have nothing upon which to base an opinion on that question. I have no knowledge as to the view taken of the matter by the Executive.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator realizes that doubtless, if this question is to be seriously considered, it would provoke a debate of many hours, and so far as I am concerned I am so impressed with the importance of passing this bill at this session that I would gladly forego the chance of putting upon the statute many reforms of which I stand in favor. I realize the great obstacles that for years have been thrown in the way of canal transportation by the great transcontinental lines—obstacles which impeded all the negotiations relating to the canal; obstacles which impeded the passage of final legislation regarding it. I have not the slightest doubt that the transcontinental lines would gladly see canal traffic sandbagged, and we all know how fruitful in delays is the introduction of new matter in bills. And this, it seems to me, is a thing we ought seriously to consider. I really hope that the bill will not be embarrassed by the presentation of too many measures looking to reform.

There is a legislative program which I have been urging for years. I would be very glad to see every item in that program put upon this bill, for every one of those items calls for substantial reform in existing conditions. But I would not think of endeavoring to saddle those reforms upon this bill, simply because it is of the highest importance that this bill should pass now, and I can see how we can get into a wrangle among ourselves and get into a wrangle with the President, possibly, regarding this bill that may obstruct and delay it and throw it over to the next session.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I do not think the pending bill is an appropriate place for this provision, and I am not very sanguine about the provision accomplishing substantial results, as I think the real difficulty in the way of a foreign merchant marine for the United States is the cost of operation rather than the cost of construction. Nevertheless, I am going to vote for this amendment, because I think it is a step in the right direction, and I want to show my desire to promote the rebuilding of the American merchant marine. I do not think it will amount to much, but, so far as it goes, I think it is in the right direction. I can not see that it is going to injure any existing American industry or any probable American industry.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] has said much better than I can say what I had in mind to say, and I desire simply to say a word, more in explanation of the vote I expect to cast rather than to discuss the merits of this proposition.

I voted against the preceding amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, and for reasons which I will not take the time of the Senate to give. But this is an entirely different proposition, I think. I remember about two years ago we had before the Senate a measure to which an amendment of this kind was germane. This amendment, or something similar to it, was presented, considered, and discussed at great length, and finally came to a vote. I became convinced in the consideration of the amendment at that time that it was a proper amendment and voted for it.

While I would not do anything to embarrass this bill or its passage and its signing by the President, I do not believe the adoption of this amendment would embarrass or delay its passage, and being of the same opinion that I was at the close of the consideration of the measure to which I have referred, I shall vote for this amendment.

In line with the suggestion of the Senator from New York, I am satisfied that it may not do very much good. As he says, it is not because of the difference in the cost of building the boats here and abroad that would prevent the floating of the American flag, but it is because of the difference in the cost of operation of the ships. But I have here the testimony of Capt. Dollar, bearing on this very point, giving the comparative cost of the operation of a ship under the American flag and under a foreign flag, which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD. I refer merely to the part I have marked in the testimony.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). Without objection, the matter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senator PERKINS. Those ships engaged in the Orient trade are under foreign flag, are they not?

Capt. DOLLAR. Yes, sir; all of our vessels that are engaged in the oriental trade are under British flag.

Senator TOWNSEND. Your boats?

Capt. DOLLAR. Yes, sir; British ships owned by American capital but flying the British flag.

Senator TOWNSEND. Are they manned by Americans?

Capt. DOLLAR. No, sir; by Chinese.

Senator TOWNSEND. Do you have any Americans on the boats at all?

Capt. DOLLAR. All the officers are Americans, the engineers and deck officers.

Senator PERKINS. How much less does it cost you to operate those ships than if they were under the American flag?

Capt. DOLLAR. Offhand, I could not answer the question, Senator, but it is very great. I could give you some figures——

Senator PERKINS. Approximately—one-half, say?

Capt. DOLLAR. I think so. You see, in the coastwise trade, we have got to pay our sailors $50 a month and our firemen $55 a month.

Senator TOWNSEND. Are you engaged in the coastwise trade with those British boats?

Capt. DOLLAR. No, sir; with American boats.

Senator TOWNSEND. Oh, you have American boats also, have you?

Capt. DOLLAR. Yes, sir. You take the smallest American vessel that we have—we have since sold her—the cost of operating that ship was $81.20 per day.

Senator BRISTOW. What is her tonnage?

Capt. DOLLAR. Net tonnage, 289 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. How much cargo will she carry?

Capt. DOLLAR. She will carry about 400 tons—or 450,000 feet of lumber. She is a lumber vessel, and carries that much lumber. Now, here is a British vessel of 3,679 net American tons. That vessel costs us $79.52 a day to operate. That is the difference, between $81.20 on the American vessel and $79.52 on the British vessel. Neither of those charges include insurance, but all other operating charges, including upkeep and repair of the ship, are included.

Senator TOWNSEND. One ship carries over 3,000 tons?

Capt. DOLLAR. This big one carries 7,600 tons.

Senator TOWNSEND. And that costs how much a day?

Capt. DOLLAR. It cost $79.52 a day on the average in 1910.

The CHAIRMAN. How big a crew does that vessel carry?

Capt. DOLLAR. We keep it under 50. The new law governing wireless telegraphy compels us to keep the crew below 50; so we generally run 48 or 49 men.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean to say that you employ 50 men for $79.52 a day?

Capt. DOLLAR. Yes, sir; that was the year before last.

The CHAIRMAN. That includes an engineer and how many firemen?

Capt. DOLLAR. I think we have about 12 firemen.

The CHAIRMAN. Are those Americans?

Capt. DOLLAR. No, sir; they are Chinese. I have not got the numbers here; I have just got the wages.

The CHAIRMAN. Are your engineers and firemen Chinese?

Capt. DOLLAR. The engineers are all American citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. And the firemen—what are they?

Capt. DOLLAR. Chinese.

The CHAIRMAN. What does a fireman get a month?

Capt. DOLLAR. The Chinese?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Capt. DOLLAR. About $12 a month, and board themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. And what does your American engineer get?

Capt. DOLLAR. The first engineer gets $150.

The CHAIRMAN. A month?
Capt. DOLLAR. Yes, sir; a month; and the second engineer, I think, gets $100 a month, and so on down.
The CHAIRMAN. How many assistant engineers have you?
Capt. DOLLAR. On the British ships?
The CHAIRMAN. I mean on this particular ship.
Capt. DOLLAR. Well, on this particular British ship we have four engineers altogether.
The CHAIRMAN. Yes; a chief engineer and three assistants?
Capt. DOLLAR. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How much do you pay the master of that vessel?
Capt. DOLLAR. Two hundred dollars a month.
The CHAIRMAN. Is he an American or an Englishman?
Capt. DOLLAR. An American, having English papers, of course.
The CHAIRMAN. Yes.
Capt. DOLLAR. We insist on their living on the American side, because we find that they stay more with us if this is their home, and we have less difficulty in keeping them if they live here.

Mr. LODGE. I ask permission to print in the RECORD certain figures I have here of the wages paid in the shipyards of Great Britain on the official reports of the board of trade. The figures were all taken on a single day, and they are the average. They are official figures. The other wages are those actually paid in the Fore River establishment in my State at this moment. I will merely say that from these figures, which are worth looking at, 83 per cent of the persons employed in British shipyards receive $10 a week, or less, and 83 per cent of the persons employed at the Fore River works get $10 a week, or more.

I merely desire to have these figures placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they will be placed in the RECORD.

The figures are as follows:

Comparisons of persons working full time.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I want to give the Senate some information from the testimony before the committee as to the cost of shipbuilding in this country and in Europe. I read first from Admiral Bowles's testimony, who was Chief Constructor of the Navy and who is now president of the Fore River Shipbuilding Co. He says:

I should think that to-day the cost of materials in the United States going into a ship might be, on the whole, perhaps 10 to 12 or 15 per cent more than it is in England.

And again later in his testimony he says that at the present time for cargo-carrying vessels, "I think a ship could be built in England for about seven-tenths of the American price."

Then referring to the testimony of Mr. Powell, of the Cramp shipbuilding yards, he says:

In 1907 I spent some time in one of the English yards where our relations were such that I had an opportunity to know what their work was costing them and what they were paying, and at that time their average weekly wage on practically the same number of hours that we were working in our yards was $8 a week, where ours was $12, a difference of 50 per cent. My observations of the effectiveness of their labor led me to believe that their labor was considerably more effective than ours in this country.

So that there is not a very great difference either in the cost of materials or in the cost of labor, because, as Mr. Powell says, their labor is so much more effective, while they are paid a greater wage in American yards.

I want to put in the RECORD this testimony of experts as to difference in cost.

Mr. SHIVELY. If those figures are taken from the report of the commission which took testimony some years ago in various parts of the country on this subject, it should be noted that the estimates submitted by different witnesses vary so widely as to detract much from their value. Many of them were manifestly interested witnesses, for whom some allowance should be made. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] says that it is less a question of the cost of the ship than of the cost of operating the ship. The practical sailors who testified before that commission on the question of wages were a unit in saying that in the deep-sea trade there is, strictly speaking, no such thing as American wages or British wages or German wages or French wages. There are New York wages, Liverpool wages, Hamburg wages, and Hongkong wages; that is, it is all what they call "port wages" or "wages of the port." The master of an American vessel is at liberty to sign up his crew or replenish his crew at any port at which he may be stopping. He may take on the Englishman, the Norwegian, the Japanese and Chinaman, or any other nationality. Whether one or some other of these, the sailor bargains with reference to the fact that he engages to sail in an American ship. Size, style, and tonnage being equal, as an almost universal rule, the American ship sails with a smaller crew than the ship of any other country. With the intimate knowledge around the whole world among sailors of the conditions in different ships, the sailor always insists on higher wages on an American ship, because the crew is smaller and his labor correspondingly heavier. So that, all the facts taken together, it is seen that the actual difference in labor cost of operating a ship may be overestimated.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator must bear in mind that on our American ships we must have a certain proportion of American seamen, and all the officers must be Americans. Capt. Dollar, who is quoted here quite freely, is navigating ships with Chinese crews, but we can not do that, because our laws forbid it.

Mr. President, just one further word. I should judge from utterances made by Senators on this side of the Chamber that there is danger that this amendment will prevail. I hope it will not, but I fear it will. I recall what Jefferson, the patron saint of the Democratic Party, said, that "for a navigating people to purchase its marine afloat would be a strange speculation." In my opinion we are entering upon a strange speculation to-day if we agree to this amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will yield, although I intended to occupy the floor for only a moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I only wanted to ask the Senator if he did not suppose that Jefferson meant, when he said it would be a strange speculation to purchase a vessel abroad, that we should purchase them or build them at home——

Mr. GALLINGER. Jefferson said something else.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In place of buying them abroad, and he did not contemplate a situation where we did not have them at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Jefferson said something else which I think ought to appeal to Americans. It was this:

Placing as a reserve with a foreign nation or in a foreign shipyard the carpenters, blacksmiths, calkers, sailmakers, and the vessels of a nation would be a singular combination. We must, therefore, build them for ourselves.

Those were the views of Jefferson. Of course they are old-fashioned views, but from my viewpoint they were American views and sound views, and I only wish that we could carry them into operation to-day in our country.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator understands of course that that view has no relation to the proposition which is now before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has more relation to it than this proposition has to this bill, a great deal more.

Mr. SHIVELY. The Senator knows full well that the amendment does not involve the displacement of any American labor. The only objection that the Senator or anyone has made is that in the future, at some time or other, in some way or other, conditions may change so that the temptation may otherwise exist to place orders for vessels for the deep-sea trade in American shipyards.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have always believed, and I imagine I shall always believe so long as I am on this mundane sphere, that the American people in some way at some time will find a way to rehabilitate the American merchant marine by building ships at home. That is my judgment. I do not know through what process that will be reached. But that this great Nation of ours, the foremost nation in the world in wealth, agriculture, manufacturing, and mining, should be lagging behind Italy and Norway and Sweden and all the other small maritime nations of the earth in the matter of her merchant marine is, to me, something that I can not believe will always continue.

As I remarked a moment ago, indulging the pleasures of hope, I have been constantly of opinion that this great people, wise in their generation and I hope becoming wiser—and I have no doubt there will be much wiser men in this Chamber after a few of the old men, of whom I am one, have departed from it—I have believed that in the wisdom of the American Congress—and I will use a term that is sometimes sneered at—in the patriotism of the American people a remedy will be found for this condition. But it will not be found if we force the American people to go abroad and buy their ships and so forever close the avenue of hope, so far as our American shipyards are concerned in the construction of ships for the over-sea traffic.

That is my view, and holding that view I simply wish to register my protest against this amendment, and I shall expect to look back upon my vote with satisfaction after I have passed from this great forum, and after some one else shall occupy the place that I am trying to fill. With that statement I am content to have the matter go to a vote, and if our Democratic friends, with some recruits from this side, can muster votes enough to put us on a free-trade basis in the matter of ships, my protest will be unavailing so far as the result is concerned, but it will at least be gratifying to me to reflect that I made it.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, the difficulty is that we are on no basis whatever at present, so far as shipbuilding for ocean foreign commerce is concerned. The Senator and those who agree with him are not and can not be more ambitious than is this side of the Chamber to see our merchant marine again upon all the seas and the flag of our country in every port on the globe. The restoration is not to be accomplished on the lines pursued in the past two score years. All artificial expedients have been tried and have dismally failed. Neither the British nor the Germans sacrificed their shipyards when they went out into the world for ships. On the contrary, they recognized their merchant marine as the superior and commanding interest. That which would best serve this interest will in the end serve most bountifully the more local interest of shipbuilding. Permit American citizens to go out and replenish our deep-sea merchant marine from whatever source offers the best bargains. Give the ships American registry whether they come from our own or foreign yards. This country will be the home of the ship. Here it will be repaired for future voyages. Among the first beneficiaries of the policy will be our own seaboard shipyards. So that while the primary purpose of this amendment is to contribute in no small measure to revive our dying merchant marine, no American shipyard will be otherwise than well served by it should it become law.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am disposed to vote against this amendment, not because of its merits, but because I believe it should not be brought up on this bill. I am exceedingly anxious to see the bill now before the Senate pass and become a law, and for that reason I am sorry to see it incumbered by anything that might jeopardize its final passage. It is for that reason, without going into its merits, that I feel inclined to vote against the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine. Mr. President, I shall vote against this amendment; and in explanation of that vote I wish to say that I will cast the vote without reference to the merits of the amendment, because I think a subject of such great importance should not be made a mere incident as an amendment on this bill, which has now been under consideration so long; that it is of such importance that it should be the subject of exclusive and special legislation and our own navigation laws revised, and revised when the Senate is in condition to give attention to that matter. For that reason I shall vote, as I have said, against the amendment without reference to its merits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have already been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator I withhold my vote. If he were present and I were at liberty to vote I would vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I will transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As I do not see him in the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. PERCY's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. PERCY] is necessarily absent. He is paired. If he were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] is unavoidably absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. On this question I can not say how my colleague would vote if present.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON] and a transfer of my pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER]. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called. I have a general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON].

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER].

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. LIPPITT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. REED. Upon this bill I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I have his instruction in reference to his position upon the bill on various matters, but not with reference to this particular matter. I therefore feel bound by the pair not to vote. I, however, transfer my pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce the pair of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS] with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce the pair of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WATSON] with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. McCUMBER. I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WARREN] is unavoidably absent from the Chamber on account of important business for the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. SHIVELY. I was requested to announce that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] is necessarily absent from the Chamber, but that he is paired with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Ashurst	Johnston, Ala.	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bacon	Jones	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
Bryan	Kenyon	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Kern	Page	Swanson
Crawford	La Follette	Poindexter	Tillman
Cummins	McLean	Reed	Townsend
Fall	Martin, Va.	Root	Williams
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Gronna	Myers	Simmons

NAYS—24.

Bankhead	Catron	Johnson, Me.	Pomerene
Bourne	Crane	Lodge	Sanders
Bradley	Cullom	Massey	Smoot
Brandegee	Dillingham	Oliver	Thornton
Bristow	Gallinger	Penrose	Wetmore
Burton	Heyburn	Perkins	Works

NOT VOTING—36.

Bailey	Culberson	Guggenheim	Rayner
Borah	Curtis	Hitchcock	Richardson
Briggs	Davis	Lea	Smith, Md.
Brown	Dixon	Lippitt	Smith, Mich.
Burnham	du Pont	McCumber	Stephenson
Chilton	Foster	Newlands	Stone
Clapp	Gamble	Owen	Sutherland
Clark, Wyo.	Gardner	Paynter	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Gore	Percy	Watson

So Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit an amendment to follow the amendment just adopted. After it has been read I desire to say a word concerning it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment just agreed to, on page 6 insert the following proviso:

Provided, That foreign-built ships admitted pursuant to this section shall not be entitled to mail contracts under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the danger and the misfortune of enacting legislation in a hurried manner without giving it consideration is so well illustrated by the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi as it possibly could be in any other way. We have voted to purchase ships abroad, to put them in the foreign trade, and unless there is some inhibition they will come under the provisions of the act of 1891, which gives mail contracts to ships engaged in the foreign trade under certain conditions.

In that act it is provided that the ships shall be built on plans approved by the Navy Department with reference to prompt and economical conversion into auxiliary cruisers and transports in time of war, and unless they are so built they can not receive these mail subventions, or whatever you choose to call them. Yet we have adopted an amendment whereby we will go abroad and buy ships constructed not according to the plans of our Navy Department, with no provision for their conversion into auxiliary cruisers in time of war, and put them into the service of the United States. If these auxiliary naval and mail ships were built abroad the confidential plans of the Navy Department as to their gun mounts, magazines, etc., would have to be placed in the hands of foreign shipbuilders for execution, and would undoubtedly come into the possession of foreign Governments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is not this subvention, or whatever it is, dependent upon these ships being built in a certain way upon certain prescribed lines——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the requirement as to our ships, but when we go in——

Mr. WILLIAMS. In order to receive the subvention——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the requirement as to ships built in our American shipyards.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All ships of every description built in American shipyards——

Mr. GALLINGER. Engaged in the foreign trade.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And all are required to enter into this agreement as to naval purposes?

Mr. GALLINGER. They are.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would appear, then, Mr. President, if I understand it, that the subvention is dependent upon the fact that they are built in conformity with certain prescribed plans.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that be the case, then there is nothing in the amendment that would admit these foreign-built ships to those subventions at all. The only thing that the amendment which was adopted by the Senate has done was to repeal the navigation laws in so far as they refuse American registry to ships built for American owners in foreign yards.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not at all sure that the Senator is right. The conditions under which our ships are built apply to ships built in American shipyards. If we are going abroad to buy ships, there is no inhibition on this point concerning ships that we purchase abroad. What I want to accomplish is to put an inhibition in some form or other in the bill that these ships shall not then get a subvention unless they come up to the standard that is required of American-built ships.

I will ask that the amendment be read again. I think the Senator was absent when it was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be again read.

The Secretary again read Mr. GALLINGER's amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is manifest——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a little different, if the Senator will pardon me, from the matter as I understood him to state it. If he would add there "unless they are of the type of ships which being built in American shipyards are entitled to the subvention," there might be no objection to his amendment, but in its present shape it merely emasculates the amendment which was just adopted by the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not quite sure that it does that nor am I sure that the Senator's suggestion is quite a sound one. I imagine there is no nation on the face of the earth that will send its plans for the construction of a ship that can be converted into a cruiser in time of war into the shipyards of another nation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That seems to me to be a very plausible statement; I think it is probably true; but, if that be the case, if the Senator would add to his amendment "unless the ships hereafter built in foreign yards are built along the lines prescribed by this act," then, I think, it would not emasculate the amendment just passed. I understand that to be the Senator's object.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had a further amendment, which I had thought of offering.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is, if our Navy Department did not want to send plans over and these were not so built, then by the very operation of law they would not be entitled to a quid pro quo.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am delighted to know that the Senator and I reach common ground on this matter. I had contemplated and had very hastily written another amendment, in view of the fact that I thought this might not be agreed to. Now they can be combined:

That foreign-built ships admitted pursuant to this section shall not be entitled to mail contracts under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce."

Let us add:

Unless such foreign-built ships shall be constructed according to plans approved by the Navy Department as provided for in this act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is treating both equally. I have no objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will take a little time to rewrite this amendment, and before the bill passes from the Committee of the Whole I will submit it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the Secretary read the proposed amendment as advocated by Prof. Johnson, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 17, after the word "commerce," insert the following:

The rate of tolls may be lower upon vessels in ballast than upon vessels carrying passengers or cargo.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that amendment should be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In connection with that, though it is not immediately following, Prof. Johnson suggested that on page 7, line 13, at the end of the line, after the proviso, down as far as and including the word "cargo," in line 19, should be stricken out. When we reach that I will ask that it may be stricken out. I ask the Secretary to state the next amendment in order.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 20, after the word "less," strike out the comma and the words "other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that is a mistake, and, although it is a committee amendment, the clause should stay in. The language of the House provides that—

When based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce the tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton, nor be less, other than for vessels of the United States and its citizens, than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal, etc.

Now, we have adopted the principle of free tolls for ships engaged in our domestic commerce. That would be directly in conflict with the provision if it was stricken out, it seems to me. I suggest that the amendment be disagreed to and that the House provision stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 6, line 25, after "1903," to insert:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels of American registry engaged in the foreign trade if the owners agree that such vessels may be taken and used by the United States in time of war or other public emergency, in the discretion of the President upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value at the time of the taking; and if there shall be a disagreement as to the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking between the United States and the owners then the same shall be determined by two disinterested appraisers, one to be appointed by each of the said parties, they at the same time selecting a third, who shall act in said appraisement in case the two fail to agree; and the decision of any two of the appraisers shall be final and conclusive.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask in regard to that provision, does it refer to an actual acquisition of the boat so that title vested in the Government or to the use for such time as the Government may need it? The language "the fair actual value" would seem to refer to the value of the boat.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Simply as one member of the committee that was my understanding of it. I did not prepare the amendment, but when it said it may be taken at "the fair actual value at the time of taking" I suppose that it meant the actual value of the ship. I can see from the question of the Senator that it might be claimed that the vessel could be taken and used temporarily and that the fair actual value might be construed to mean the actual value of the use of the vessel for the time it was used; but I had supposed it was a condemnation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think there is any question but that that is the intention.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That was my intention and I had not thought of the other construction. I will say that I think that is the intention of the committee. Does the Senator from Ohio desire to make a suggestion to make it clearer? If he does not care to take the time now I will try to remember it in conference. This provision must go to conference and we will see if the House agrees to the idea, that it shall be plainly indicated in the conference report.

Mr. BURTON. I suggest that the striking out of the words "and used," in line 3, would remove any ambiguity in regard to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If they are taken of course they will be used. I agree to the suggestion that the words "and used" be stricken out.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator mean to say it was the meaning of the committee that the Government may in this contingency appropriate the vessel for a certain time and then restore it to the owner or does he think, as I think, that it meant the Government might condemn the vessel by paying a fair value?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator could not have heard me, for I have already stated that I do think as he thinks that it means the Government can condemn it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not mean you could take it for temporary use and return it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That was not my idea and I did not suppose it was the idea of the committee. I agree to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio that in line 3 the words "and used" may be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 3, of the committee amendment, after the word "taken" strike out the words "and used."

Mr. BURTON. I suppose the committee has considered this carefully, but, as a question of policy, there is certainly a doubt whether it is best for the Government in time of war or emergency, which might be of short duration, to take to itself ships belonging to the merchant marine. That would mean a very large expense, and it would mean that when that war or emergency had ceased the United States would have on its hands a considerable quantity of shipping. In the Spanish-American War the St. Louis and the St. Paul were used temporarily, and the compensation was agreed upon.

I do not think I shall object to the adoption of the amendment; but I suggest, for consideration when the bill shall be in conference, whether it is not best to provide for the mere temporary use of these boats rather than their permanent acquisition.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 14, after the word "however," strike out the words:

That under regulations prescribed by the President a vessel paying toll going through the canal in ballast shall, on its return trip through the canal laden with cargo, be entitled to receive a rebate of 50 per cent of the tolls just previously paid going through in the opposite direction without cargo.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The words at the end of line 13, "Provided, however," should also be stricken out. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. To what amendment does the Senator from Connecticut refer?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 13, after the word "conclusive," it is proposed to strike out the colon and the following:

Provided, however, That under regulations prescribed by the President a vessel paying toll going through the canal in ballast shall, on its return trip through the canal laden with cargo, be entitled to receive a rebate of 50 per cent of the tolls just previously paid going through in the opposite direction without cargo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand this amendment has been agreed to as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been agreed to, as the Chair understands.

Mr. BURTON. Is that the amendment providing for relieving ships engaged in the foreign trade from the payment of tolls?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. BURTON. I think we ought to have a vote on that amendment. As regards any violation of the treaty, it is much more clearly open to objection than the one on which we voted last night. So far as national policy is concerned it is, no doubt, less objectionable, because, while the coastwise trade possesses a monopoly, we are at a very great disadvantage in the foreign trade.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I entirely agree with the Senator from Ohio about that, Mr. President. I do not think any of the ships should go through free; but if we are going to send ships in the domestic trade through free, I think we ought to send those in the foreign trade through free. I think, however, that one is just as much, and no more, a violation of the treaty than the other.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the amendment has been agreed to, and it can only be reopened by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is true. The previous occupant of the chair stated, if I recall his language, "Without objection, agreed to"; and there was no objection. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] evidently did not understand what was going on.

Mr. BURTON. I did not so understand it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator desires to make a motion to reconsider, I shall not oppose it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that under the circumstances, if there was a misunderstanding, the Chair will put the question as a matter of unanimous consent to reconsider the vote. Without objection, it will be so ordered. Does the Senator from Ohio desire to make a motion in regard to the amendment?

Mr. BURTON. I did not desire to be heard upon it. I simply made the statement that I thought from the standpoint of the treaty the amendment is more objectionable than the one on which we voted last night, but from the standpoint of national policy it is less objectionable, and that it ought not to go into the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment to strike out the words which have been stated.

Mr. McCUMBER. What is the motion now, Mr. President—to agree to the Senate committee amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to strike out on page 7, beginning in line 13 at the word "Provided."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is not the amendment which I understand the Senator from Ohio desires to have reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair has just resumed the chair, and that was the information furnished to him.

Mr. BURTON. The amendment to which I refer begins with the words "no tolls," on page 6, in line 25, and extends down to and includes line 13, on page 7, with the amendment adopted on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut. That is a Senate committee amendment; and in order that it may be inserted in the bill it is necessary that it be adopted by an affirmative vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. Clearly, the former occupant of the chair announced that that amendment was agreed to. I am satisfied that the Senator did not understand it in that way, and Senators on this side of the Chamber did not understand it. I did not myself understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the unanimous-consent vote by which the amendment was agreed to was reconsidered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The amendment to which the Senator from Ohio refers commences at the bottom of page 6, with the last words in line 25, and from there on as much as in italics down to the word "Provided," on page 7, line 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote on the adoption of that amendment is the vote which has just been reconsidered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; and the question is now, I suppose, on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks for the yeas and nays upon the question of the adoption of the amendment, beginning with the words "no tolls," in line 25, on page 6, and on page 7 the language of line 1 to line 13, including the word "conclusive," and the semicolon in that line.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it includes the words "Provided, however," Mr. President, which are in italics. We have stricken out from line 14 to line 19.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be considered as being a part of the amendment. Upon that amendment the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if this amendment is adopted every possible difficulty in connection with the treaty will be opened up. With the amendment adopted a few moments ago at the instance of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] any American can buy a vessel anywhere in the world, and the tolls on the canal will possibly be destroyed to a very great extent. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that, if I recall it correctly, upon his motion yesterday there was inserted in the provision——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I refer to the word "exclusively," where the language reads "engaged exclusively."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am referring to that also.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes, I know the Senator is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I say that on line 13, on page 6, on yesterday we interlined the word "exclusively" between the word "engaged" and the word "in." We now say that:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade of the United States.

The Senate amendment which we are now discussing provides that no tolls shall be levied upon vessels of American registry engaged in the foreign trade. Does the Senator from Georgia mean to interline the word "exclusively" there or at some other point?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I am opposed to this amendment altogether.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I added the word "exclusively" with a view of making the provision which we did adopt so perfectly clear that, even after we defeated the Senate amendment, no one could misunderstand the meaning of what we left in the bill. I think the Senate amendment is open to the most serious objection. As I said a few moments ago, I think it opens up every possible question about the treaty, and I think, with the provision which we adopted allowing Americans to buy vessels anywhere in the world, if we adopt the Senate amendment, we open the way to almost destroy tolls in the canal. I very much hope that the Senate amendment will be rejected. It seems to me that when we placed the word "exclusively" in the line sent to us by the other House, we were practically passing against the proposed Senate committee amendment, because we were making the language sent to us by the other House perfectly clear as intending to cover nothing but vessels solely engaged in coastwise commerce. If we intended to broaden it so as to include vessels engaged in foreign trade, of course there was no reason to be particular about the language used with reference to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. My object in the amendment was to make it unmistakable that the free passage would only be conceded to vessels engaged in our domestic commerce.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut, who has charge of the bill and who has undoubtedly in his mind the estimate of tolls, to give the Senate the benefit of his knowledge in reference to what amount of tolls will be collected and what percentage that will be of the amount necessary to pay the running expenses after we have allowed free passage to all American ships, both coastwise and foreign.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I can only give the estimate made by Prof. Johnson, which was put into the RECORD the other day in answer to a similar question by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. That estimate was that in the year 1915, when it is supposed the canal will be opened, ten and a half millions of ship tonnage will go through the canal, of which, if I recall aright, about one-sixth would be American ships. That is my recollection about it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is all I have to say in answer to the question of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BRISTOW. Referring to the remarks of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], I will say that if this amendment which the committee proposes is not inserted in the bill, then I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted yesterday, inserting the word "exclusively" in line 13. Of course I am very anxious that the amendment which the Senate committee suggests here should be adopted, because I think this privilege should be given our American shipping in order to encourage our merchant marine; but if the word "exclusively" remains in the bill and this amendment is defeated, an American ship, if it should leave San Francisco with a partial cargo, could not take on any cargo that it might find at Panama or Colon that might have been brought there from ports of Central America, Mexico, or South America, and left there by vessels that did not go through the canal. If it did take on any of this cargo that was from any Central American port or from any South American port or from Panama itself, then it could not avail itself of the privilege of passing through the canal without tolls; so that this places an embargo upon the American vessel. The foreign vessel leaving, we will say, San Francisco might pick up its cargo, take it through the canal, and leave it at New York, provided it did not unload any coastwise trade. It would be an embargo on any American ship that was engaged in foreign commerce. There might be a ship plying between New York and the Orient, which might have a corgo for San Francisco and an oriental cargo as well, but it could not avail itself of the privilege of an American ship, though it might be engaged in the coastwise trade and have been built in an American shipyard or be under an American registry, because this word "exclusively" would cut it out from either foreign trade or coastwise trade.

It seems to me that it would be a handicap to American shipping. The amendment proposed by the Senate committee will cure the evil of the amendment adopted last night. If that fails, then I shall have to make an effort to have the word "exclusively" stricken out, because I think it is a very unwise provision.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I merely want to utter a seutence or two in explanation of my vote upon this particular amendment. I voted for the amendment to exempt ships engaged in the coastwise trade from paying tolls. I voted for it distinctly upon the ground that that would not be a discrimination; that foreign ships would not by that be discriminated against, because our coastwise trade was a trade from which by our policy they were excluded and would be excluded so long as that policy continues, and that never having had any right to participation in it at all, and not having any now, whatever we chose to do about our coastwise trade was a matter concerning which they had no right to be heard, because they have never had and can not now have any concern in it. But this presents a different question. When we undertake to exempt our ships engaged in the foreign trade it is a clear discrimination. I do not see how anybody could dispute the fact that it is a discrimination. It could be defended only upon one ground, and that would be the ground that the conditions had changed so that the obligations of the treaty were no longer enduring. I do not believe that that argument is sound; therefore I can not vote for exempting our ships engaged in the foreign trade without violating my own idea of what our obligations under the treaty are.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, very briefly last night I referred to the treaty and undertook to show that it would not apply to coastwise vessels; and, with a good deal of doubt even as to the propriety of extending to them the privilege of freedom from tolls, I voted for the House provision. I have no doubt that the treaty extends far enough to require that Americans handling vessels engaged in the foreign trade must receive no more privileges in passing through the canal than are received by the vessels of other countries engaged in the foreign trade. The treaty as finally adopted, while it supersedes the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, expressly carries with it the provisions of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, "the general principles," to use the terms of the present treaty, and that article 8 says in so many words that the United States Government can not extend to the citizens of the United States any privileges in connection with the canal that are not extended to the citizens of England and to those other countries who become parties to the agreement.

I undertook to distinguish between coastwise vessels and those engaged in the foreign trade on the ground that the former were engaged in domestic business, and that our policy, as is the policy of nearly all countries, was to permit none but American vessels to engage in that trade, and that our discrimination was not for American vessels, but for the coastwise trade itself. When we come to the proposition of the foreign trade, I can not escape the conclusion that we have agreed that our citizens shall pay the same, when taking vessels through this canal, that the citizens of Great Britain and other countries pay. If we let our citizens through free, then we must let everybody through free covered by this treaty.

We have a treaty with Great Britain that provides that disputes with reference to treaties shall be submitted to arbitration, and I think, if we vote for this amendment, we ought to do it with the distinct understanding that we are going to return any tolls to be collected from the vessels of other countries. I am not discussing the wisdom of such an agreement, but it has been made. It is the contract that our Government has made.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, the Senator understands that there are a great many of us who disagree with him wholly and totally as to such a contract having been made. I want to put that in the RECORD, because the statement is made with such emphasis by those who hold the view that the Senator does—that this is a binding contract—and it is stated in such a way as to lead one to infer that it is admitted to be a binding contract. For myself, I have not discussed this question; it has been discussed at very great length and very ably by other Senators who are far more able to discuss it than I, but I do not believe that any such agreement was ever made that embarrasses us in the slightest degree in permitting our ships to go through the canal without the payment of tolls.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I never suggested that the Senator from Kansas had the view which I entertain. I understand that he does not entertain that view; but, with great respect for his ability and his genius as a journalist and a legislator, I can not escape my own conclusion as to the legal effect of the terms of the treaty; and I have not a doubt about their meaning. If I were on the court of arbitration, with my convictions as to their meaning, I could not escape holding that if we let our vessels engaged in the foreign trade through the canal free, we would have to return tolls collected from vessels of other nations engaged in the foreign trade. Having arrived at that conviction after most careful consideration of the treaty, with a desire to reach a different conclusion, with a provision in an existing treaty that we must arbitrate any dispute growing out of the construction of a treaty, if the question is raised, after we adopt the Senate amendment and after we have charged tolls against English vessels, as to whether we should retain or return those tolls, I have no question that the decision would be that we should return them. If I myself were on the board of arbitration at that time I would be obliged to vote that the money should be returned; and I have no doubt that it will be returned.

I had not wished to express my opinion with reference to this part of the treaty upon the floor of the Senate, because that opinion was against the interest of our own Government, but when I see a measure apparently possible of adoption, the effect of which to me is so absolutely certain upon our country, I think it better now frankly to express the opinion than silently to sit by without doing so.

I am opposed to giving free passage through the canal in any event. I do not think it good policy. It is a very different proposition to extend free passage to the domestic trade and to broaden it to the foreign trade. The remission of tolls to ships in the domestic trade helps to regulate our transcontinental transportation by railroads; it benefits a far greater number of our people than would a like exemption in the case of the foreign trade. The number who derive the benefit is much less in the case of foreign trade. I do not, however, put it especially upon that ground; I put it especially upon the ground that I do not doubt the effect of such a course with reference to the final return of every dollar of tolls we collect from the vessels of other countries.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, in the committee the line of cleavage was not between those who favored free passage for American ships engaged in the coastwise trade and did not favor free passage for American ships engaged in the foreign trade, but the line of cleavage was between those who were opposed to free passage for any American ships and those who were in favor of free passage for all American ships. There was no dispute or discussion in the committee about the principle that if our coastwise ships were allowed to go through the canal free of toll then we should also allow American ships engaged in the foreign trade to go through free of toll, though there was on the part of two members of the committee—and I was one of them—a question as to the possible right under the treaty of permitting American vessels engaged in the foreign trade to go through free of toll. As I have already stated, I have resolved whatever doubt I then had in the matter in favor of the proposition that permits all American ships to go through free of toll, the proposition that is embodied in the amendment that we are now discussing. I think that if we should allow free passage to one class, we should allow it to the other class, and if this amendment is voted down, like the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], I shall be in favor of reconsidering the vote by which the word "exclusively" was inserted last night, and shall advocate striking out that word.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	McCumber	Root
Bailey	Cummins	McLean	Simmons
Bourne	Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Fall	Massey	Smoot
Bristow	Fletcher	Myers	Sutherland
Bryan	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Swanson
Burnham	Gronna	Oliver	Thornton
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Townsend
Catron	Johnston, Ala.	Page	Wetmore
Clapp	Jones	Perkins	Williams
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Poindexter
Crane	La Follette	Pomerene
Culberson	Lippitt	Reed

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is absent on the business of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My colleague [Mr. PERCY] is unavoidably absent upon necessary business. He is paired. I ask that this statement stand for the day.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to state that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is unavoidably absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum of the Senate present.

The question is on the adoption of the amendment which has already been stated; and upon that the Senator from North Dakota has demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment, giving the line and page.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 25, after the words "nineteen hundred and three," insert:

> No tolls shall be levied upon vessels of American registry engaged in the foreign trade if the owners agree that such vessels may be taken by the United States in time of war or other public emergency, in the discretion of the President, upon payment to the owners of the fair actual value at the time of the taking; and if there shall be a disagreement as to the fair actual value of the same at the time of the taking between the United States and the owners, then the same shall be determined by two disinterested appraisers, one to be appointed by each of the said parties, they at the same time selecting a third, who shall act in said appraisement in case the two fail to agree; and the decision of any two of the appraisers shall be final and conclusive.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment which has just been stated, and on which the Senator from North Dakota has demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator, I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair. If I were in a position to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY], but understanding he would vote the same as I would on this question, I take occasion to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr SMITH]. Upon this matter I have the authority of the Senator with whom I am paired to vote, because we agree upon the proposition. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has stated. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I have been requested to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has been suddenly called away by important matters, and is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], and withhold my vote on account of his absence.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] is absent on business of the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer the pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEYBURN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, having a pair with that Senator, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—37.

Ashurst	Crawford	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Bourne	Cullom	Massey	Stone
Bradley	Cummins	O'Gorman	Thornton
Brandegee	Fletcher	Oliver	Tillman
Bristow	Gallinger	Perkins	Townsend
Burnham	Johnston, Ala.	Poindexter	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Jones	Reed	Works
Clapp	Kenyon	Sanders
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Simmons
Crane	Lodge	Smith, Ariz.

NAYS—24.

Bacon	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Root
Bryan	Fall	Myers	Shively
Burton	Gronna	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Catron	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Smith, Md.
Culberson	McCumber	Page	Swanson
Dillingham	McLean	Pomerene	Williams

NOT VOTING—33.

Bailey	Dixon	Lea	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Foster	Lippitt	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Gamble	Nelson	Stephenson
Briggs	Gardner	Owen	Sutherland
Brown	Gore	Paynter	Warren
Chilton	Guggenheim	Penrose	Watson
Clarke, Ark.	Heyburn	Percy
Curtis	Hitchcock	Rayner
Davis	La Follette	Richardson

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few minutes ago I suggested an amendment, calling the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to it, and it was agreed that I should perfect it in accordance with the act of March 3, 1891. I have done so, and I now offer the amendment to follow the amendment that was adopted on motion of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that in the wording of the amendment the Senator from New Hampshire has used the exact language of the act of Congress, and the effect of it will be simply to place ships flying the American flag that were built in foreign shipyards upon an exact and equal footing with ships flying the American flag built in American shipyards?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have used the exact language.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That being the case, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, after the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, and which has been agreed to, on page 6, in line 14, after the word "United States," the following words:

Provided further, That foreign-built ships admitted pursuant to this section shall not be entitled to mail contracts under the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce," unless such ships shall be constructed with particular reference to prompt and economical conversion into auxiliary naval cruisers, according to plans and specifications to be agreed upon by and between the owners and the Secretary of the Navy, and shall be of sufficient strength and stability to carry and sustain the working and operation of at least four effective rifled cannon of a caliber of not less than 6 inches, and shall be of the highest rating known to maritime commerce; and all such ships before being accepted shall be subjected to the same inspection as is provided in the act of March 3, 1891.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, which has just been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee is on page 8——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before we get to that, Mr. President, Prof. Johnson has suggested that in line 24, at the bottom of page 7, there be stricken out the language:

The toll for each passenger shall not be more than $1.50.

I submit that to the Senate. I do not know why there should be any limit on the matter. I do not know why the tolls should not be fixed by the President the same as the toll on the vessel is fixed. I move that the language I have read be stricken out in lines 24 and 25

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words:

The toll for each passenger shall not be more than $1.50.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senate ought to have some better reason for changing the House bill than that some one man says the provision ought not to be contained in the bill, and gives no reason for it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I gave the reason that influenced me in it, which was that I did not see any reason why there should be a limit and why it should not be left to the discretion of those who are to fix the passenger tolls. It is perfectly immaterial to me whether it stays in or goes out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment striking out the words which have been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the next committee amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the language in line 22, page 7, after the word "determined":

Nor be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.

That is so indefinite that it seems to me it ought to be stricken out. It did not receive the attention of the committee. It has been called to my attention since we have had the bill in the Senate. It might be $5 a ton or 50 cents a ton. There is no way of determining what it will be.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have noticed that right along. It is in the House bill. I think it is a cumbersome provision, and I do not see how they could tell what "the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal" is until it has been operated, say, for a year, to find what is the total cost and then divide it by the total tonnage of the vessels that go through the canal. I think it would be impracticable for the first year, anyhow, and I have no objection to the words going out.

Mr. BRISTOW. Striking it out will throw it into conference, and if there is any reason for inserting it again, it can be restored. I move that the words in lines 22, 23, and 24 be stricken out, as follows:

Nor be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment striking out the words indicated by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me there ought to be some limitation on these tolls. Now this proposition is to strike out the clause which proposes that the tolls must be equal to the cost of maintenance and operation. There can be but one purpose in striking it out, and that is to operate this canal at a dead loss to our Government. It does seem to me that it is only a reasonable limitation that we shall get sufficient revenue to pay for the maintenance and upkeep of the canal, and while it may be said that the President would not go below that, what is wrong about the Congress saying he shall not?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator understood my remarks when I suggested the amendment, I said there is no way of determining what that amount would be. If the Senator thinks there ought to be a minimum, if he will suggest a minimum, we might put in a minimum there. This is so vague and indefinite that there is no way of determining what it is.

Mr. REED. Of course, these words would have to receive a reasonable interpretation in view of the circumstances. Now, what are they? We have a canal upon our hands, and we are about to fix the tolls, and we endeavor to fix such tolls as will pay for the cost of the operation and upkeep of the canal. We have not tested that. All that any authority can do is to take the opinion of the engineers in charge as to what it will cost to operate the canal and what proportion must be set aside for upkeep. That we have to do with almost every business in life. No man can tell what it will cost until we have actually tried it; that is true; and no man can tell what it will cost for upkeep—I mean, tell absolutely—until not only one year but scores of years have gone by, because the cost will vary. But estimates can be made reasonably accurate, and if it is found that they are below, then under this bill as it now stands the price will be raised. If they are found too high, then the price will be lowered. I think it is a safe rule in the bill, and I do not think it ought to be taken out.

Mr. OVERMAN. How is it possible to tell unless you know how many ships will go through the canal? Suppose it is estimated that it will cost $3,000,000 to operate and maintain the canal, and only a hundred ships go through. That would be absolutely prohibitory for the first year.

Mr. REED. I think my answer has already been made to that.

We can not tell what it will cost to repair this canal until a long period of years has passed. We can not tell what it will cost to operate it until we know the volume of trade, and until we have experimented along that line we can not tell with accuracy the number of ships which will pass through. All of these items must be matters of estimate based upon the best possible data obtainable.

Now, because we can not tell accurately is no reason why we should strike out the rule that in fixing these charges we should do so in such a manner as to return to the Government the amount of its outlay.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose the estimate is based upon a thousand ships going through and only 500 go through?

Mr. REED. Then we would have made a mistake in our estimates. Is there anything remarkable about saying that we shall fix the tolls so as to secure a return for the money invested and at the same time say that we can not accurately state that amount? We must estimate it. We have to do that in every business we enter upon. We must estimate as well as we can the volume of trade and business. It is not an impossible task. The language perhaps ought to be "the cost and expense as estimated." But the very circumstances of the case write in the words "as estimated," because we all understand it can not be accurately determined. I think there ought to be a limitation, and if there is no limitation the day may come when we will find the canal being run at a great expense to the Government under tolls deliberately fixed far below the cost of operation.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator would put in not exceeding a dollar and a half a ton, or something like that, it would be different.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, it is almost certain that the tolls will be based upon net registered tonnage. The language in the bill which the Senator is talking about applies only in case the tolls shall not be based upon net registered tonnage; and then it provides that—> they shall not exceed the equivalent of $1.25 per net registered ton as nearly as the same may be determined, nor be less than the estimated proportionate cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.

That involves two uncertain things. In the first place, you have to estimate in advance what will be the cost of the maintenance and operation of the canal. Secondly, you have to estimate what will be the tonnage that will go through the canal, in order to strike your proportion. Both are absolutely matters of speculation.

I do not care a bit whether this language stays in or goes out. The Senator from Kansas has suggested striking out from the middle of line 22 to line 24, so that it may be considered carefully in conference, and that we may confer with the House, which put it in, and see what the merits of it are. I do not want to waste one minute discussing the question. I leave it to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. REED. I see on looking at the bill again that it does cover the very matter suggested. It does provide that the charges shall not be less than the cost and not less than the estimated proportion of the cost of actual maintenance and operation of the canal. Now, that merely means that the President in fixing the charge shall do it upon the estimated cost, and while we can not get it accurately, we might say the same with reference to the limitation upon the tolls. We say here that the tonnage shall not exceed an equivalent of $1.25. Now, how do we get at that? It must be based upon the best estimate we are able to obtain.

If the Senator in charge of the bill wants this stricken out merely for the purpose of carrying it to conference I have nothing further to say, but if it is to go out of the bill to remain out, then I object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course if I should be one of the conferees on the bill I shall go into a free conference with an idea of getting the best terms I can to meet the views of the Senate, and I could not know in advance whether I would agree to strike it out or to reinsert it or whether I would have my way about it. I simply do not care to discuss it further.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was going to suggest to the Senator that the provision here is that the maximum charge shall be $1.25 and the minimum charge shall not be less than the estimated proportional cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal. Suppose that the estimated proportional cost of the actual maintenance and operation should be $2 a ton. That, then, would exceed the maximum amount of $1.25 which is fixed. Which would then govern?

Mr. REED. In that event we are driven to the position that those who framed the bill fixed the amount without any regard to the fact that it was really an arbitrary figure. I assume in fixing the amount they were satisfied that they had fixed it at a point in excess of the actual cost. In the contingency which the Senator suggests of course there would be a conflict. It would be impossible to reconcile that conflict.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the case I have suggested or in any case where the estimated proportional cost would exceed $1.25 there would be an irreconcilable conflict. That being so, is it not quite important that the matter should be presented in such a shape that it may be considered in conference?

Mr. REED. If that is true, the Senator's position ought to go further. He ought to insist on striking out also the limitation of $1.25, because certainly we do not want to operate the canal at a loss. The Senator's argument is altogether based upon the idea that the actual cost may exceed the maximum amount fixed in the bill. We ought not to put ourselves in that kind of a position. If the Senator is correct, if there is anything at all in his suggestion, then we ought to strike out both limitations and leave it all open.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It seems to me it is purely an academic question, not being less than the cost of operation. Prof. Johnson assumes that ten and a half million tons are going through in 1915. It is pretty certain that it will be $1 a net registered ton. Even with the American coastwise vessels free the probable revenue collected will be about $8,000,000. The cost of operation of the canal will be about three and a half million dollars. So there can be no question that the tolls will be established at such a low rate as that they will not pay the cost of the operation. I do not see any use in having the language in in that view of it.

Mr. REED. If there is no question about that proposition, then the words will do no harm in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas to strike out the words which have been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 13, after the words "against the," to strike out "governor of the Panama Canal" and insert "Isthmian Canal Commission," so as to read:

> Such regulations shall provide for prompt adjustment by agreement and immediate payment of claims for damages which may arise from alleged injury to vessels, cargo, or passengers from the passing of vessels through the locks under the control of those operating them under such rules and regulations. In case of disagreement suit may be brought in the district court of the Canal Zone against the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That amendment should be disagreed to as the Senate has already decided in favor of a governor instead of a commission.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the same amendment occurs seven or eight times in the bill and would suggest that the Secretary be authorized to make the change wherever it is found.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 8, line 16, after the word "paid," to strike out "off," so as to read:

> The hearing and disposition of such cases shall be expedited and the judgment shall be immediately paid without proceeding to execution. All such claims, whether by agreement or after judgment, shall be paid out of any moneys appropriated or allotted for canal operation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let that amendment be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, after line 19, to strike out the text of the bill down to and including line 19, on page 9, in the following words:

The President shall provide a method for the determination and adjustment of all claims arising out of personal injuries to employees thereafter occurring while directly engaged in actual work in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal or of the Panama Railroad, or of any auxiliary canals, locks, or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, whether such injuries result in death or not, and may revise and modify such method at any time; and such claims, to the extent they shall be allowed on such adjustment, if allowed at all, shall be paid out of the moneys hereafter appropriated for that purpose or out of the funds of the Panama Railroad Co., if said company was responsible for said injury, as the case may require. And after such method shall be provided by the President, the provisions of the act entitled "An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May 30, 1908, and of the act entitled "An act relating to injured employes on the Isthmian Canal," approved February 24, 1909, shall not apply to personal injuries thereafter received and claims for which are subject to determination and adjustment as provided in this section.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The provisions of the act entitled "An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May 30, 1908, and of the act entitled "An act relating to injured employees on the Isthmian Canal," approved February 24, 1909, shall apply to the determination and adjustment of all claims arising out of personal injuries to employees occurring while directly engaged in actual work in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, or of the Panama Railroad, or of any auxiliary canals, locks, or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, whether such injuries result in death or not; and such claims as shall be allowed under such provisions shall be paid out of moneys appropriated for that purpose, or out of the funds of the Panama Railroad Co. if said company was responsible for said injury, as the case may require.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before that amendment is acted on I desire to move to strike out lines 7 to 19, inclusive, on page 8, the proposition which has just been amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment now offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, strike out from line 7 down to and including line 19, in the following words:

Such regulations shall provide for prompt adjustment by agreement and immediate payment of claims for damages which may arise from alleged injury to vessels, cargo, or passengers from the passing of vessels through the locks under the control of those operating them under such rules and regulations. In case of disagreement suit may be brought in the district court of the Canal Zone against the governor of the Panama Canal. The hearing and disposition of such cases shall be expedited and the judgment shall be immediately paid off without proceeding to execution. All such claims, whether by agreement or after judgment, shall be paid out of any moneys appropriated or allotted for canal operation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to say just one word on that amendment. With the whole heart of the Senate beating in sympathy for this monopoly, I do not know that anything can be done to prevent our granting them any other special privileges, and I am somewhat surprised that the committee has not really gone further than they have in this proposition. We first build a canal at a cost of $400,000,000 for the benefit of this American monopoly. After building that canal, then we offer in this bill to allow them to use it freely without one dollar of expense to them. Still feeling most kindly toward this monopoly, we proceed further, and we furnish all the means and sail their ships ourselves the distance across the canal, which I think is in the neighborhood of 30 miles. It costs them nothing to sail through the canal.

We not only do that, Mr. President, but we operate the canal specially for their particular benefit. We then proceed to go a little further in our extreme kindness, and we offer to insure them against any damage or any injury that may occur from any cause while passing through the canal. It seems to me that we might have gone a little further and sailed them from New York to San Francisco also at the Government expense.

Being opposed, Mr. President, to this insurance clause, knowing how helpless I am to impress my own views upon the Senate in reference to what would seem to me to be exact justice to all of the shipping interests of the country and to the shippers and to those who have to pay this expense, I can do nothing further than to make my objection at this time apparent upon the record.

But still I desire to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the provision itself, which reads:

Such regulations shall provide for prompt adjustment by agreement and immediate payment of claims for damages which may arise from alleged injury to vessels, cargo, or passengers from the passing of vessels through the locks under the control of those operating them under such rules and regulations.

No question arises there of contributory negligence. If an injury occurs, according to this provision, whether that injury is caused by the contributory negligence of the owners of the ship or by the passengers themselves or those in charge of the vessel, still the Government is called upon to pay such damages as may result.

Nor do we stop there in our excessive kindness. We do not provide by regulations for the prompt adjustment and immediate payment of claims for damages which may arise from injury to vessels, but will pay damages which may arise from alleged injuries to vessels. I do not know exactly why we need the word "alleged" in there unless it is to make it so much more convenient and to leave out any question of fact, so that we may better express our feeling of gratitude to these shipowners for carrying goods for their benefit from one section of the country to the other. If the Senator from Connecticut will explain to me the grave necessity for the word "alleged," I shall be glad to hear the explanation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not think there is any necessity for it, either grave or gay. The language is that of the House. I seriously doubt myself, and have always doubted, whether we ought to compensate the vessels or persons for injuries incurred while passing through the canal. The theory about it has been that inasmuch as we compel the vessel to surrender herself to our care and management and render those who otherwise would care for their own property helpless to do so, if we injure their property, there should be some arrangement by which they could get compensation for the injury.

Of course, the provision is that—

Such regulations shall provide for prompt adjustment by agreement and immediate payment of claims for damages which may arise from alleged injury to vessels, cargo, or passengers.

I am perfectly willing, as far as I as an individual member of the committee am concerned, to have all the language from line 7 down to line 19, inclusive, stricken out and considered in conference, where we can confer with the House Members who framed the bill, and report back to the Senate.

I admit freely, and I have made heretofore on the floor the same point that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] makes, that it is a great favor we are granting these ships to transport them through free and also to pay any damages that may occur to them during the period. But, as I said, it is only justified, if it be justified, upon the ground that they are prevented from protecting their own property and we insist on having the sole custody of it.

The reason why we insist on having the exclusive custody of the vessels is, if they were allowed to go through under their own steam, having had no experience in these tremendously expensive locks and the intricate mechanism by which they will be operated, they would be very liable to damage the locks or the gates which keep the water in the locks.

I remember in the testimony of Col. Goethals and in conversation with him and the other commissioners down there they insisted from the beginning that they must have exclusive control of every vessel that came there to the extent of taking the captain and the pilot out of the pilot house, taking the engineer out of the engine room, and putting their own men aboard, skilled men who knew all the signals and rules providing for the navigation of the canal. If that was done they thought if they injured the vessel the owner should not be helpless.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield the floor, unless the Senator from California desires to ask me a question.

Mr. WORKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question.

The Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from North Dakota seem to be quite in sympathy with respect to this matter, but I ask the Senator from Connecticut whether he places the construction upon this clause in the bill that the Senator from North Dakota seems to place on it, namely, that all and every claim may be enforced against the Government without reference to its justice?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think, if the Senator wants me to answer the question, that if the regulations provided for agreement and immediate payment of claims for damages, of course no claim for damages would be paid by agreement unless there was actual damage. Therefore, I think the word "alleged" is immaterial in the text. Of course, if they disagree the bill provides they may bring suit in the district court of the Canal Zone against the Government and the hearing and disposition of the case shall be expedited, and so forth.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator, if the Senator from California will allow me, whether he believes, under the reading of that provision, a defense of contributory negligence could be set up or any other defense?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not be able to answer that question, because I do not know to what extent the rules of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence prevail in the courts of the Canal Zone. I know there are some remnants of Spanish law there which are applied in their courts, and if the rule of contributory negligence does not prevail it may be that it should; I do not know.

Mr. WORKS. The evident object and purpose of this clause is to render the Government liable only for just claims against it. In the first place it may be determined by agreement of the parties, in which case it is fair to suppose that the representatives of the Government will not consent to the enforcement of any claim unless it was a just claim against the Government, and if they fail to agree then they must go into court and settle it like any other litigants. In that case, of course, the Government could properly be made liable for damages that have resulted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator where does he read "just claims" into the bill?

Mr. WORKS. The whole scope of the clause indicates clearly enough that it must be determined first by agreement and afterwards be settled in court.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator if there can be any contributory negligence by any ship while under the care of the United States Government?

Mr. WORKS. There would hardly be any loss resulting by contributory negligence to the owners of a ship who had no control over it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I beg to differ with both Senators. The crew must be taken along on that vessel, the passengers must be taken; passengers may be injured and they may be injured due to their own careless contributory negligence and contend that they have a claim against the Government.

I want to say to the Senator from Connecticut whenever I send a package through the mail the Government does not allow me to send it through free. I must pay for it. I know that I am not as much of a favorite as this monopoly who are to have free tolls. I must pay for sending anything through the mails. I must pay for all it costs the Government and pay a little more for the benefit of some things upon which it makes a loss. If my package which I send through the mails is injured and I write to the Government for a repayment, the Government will inform me that it does not insure my packages. But it does insure a package or anything else that is sent through this Panama Canal. Now, if we are to grant to this monopoly such extraordinary acts of kindness it does seem to me there ought to be some limit in which we would close the Government Treasury against the grab of that monopoly or of any of its agents.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to suggest an amendment. It is to insert, after the word "regulations," in line 12—

Provided, however, That no payment shall be made to owners of vessels going through without paying toll, except where it is made to appear that the United States Government, through its officers and agents, were guilty of lack of ordinary care, contributing to and causing the damage.

I think this a fair rule as to vessels that pay no tolls.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Senator who has submitted the amendment if he will yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Looking at the language of the section again, at the bottom of page 7, the words beginning in the last line read:

The President is authorized to make and from time to time amend regulations governing the operation of the Panama Canal, and the passage and control of vessels through the same or any part thereof, including the locks and approaches thereto, and all rules and regulations affecting pilots and pilotage in the canal or the approaches thereto through the adjacent waters.

The lines on page 8 go on to provide:

Such regulations shall provide for prompt adjustment by agreement and immediate payment of claims for damages, etc.

It seems to me if the President can be relied upon to make the rules governing the operation of the canal and the passage of vessels through it, he can be relied upon to make some rules that the damages shall not be paid except upon certain contingencies.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not agree with the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, if there is a suit in court, then it will be determined by the laws down there in the Canal Zone.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so. I should like to answer the Senator from Connecticut upon that subject. It does not seem to me that the law of the Panama Canal Zone would control. We have control over the territory adjacent to the canal, and it would be the American rule of law—the rule of the United States—that would control. I do not think this provision is broad enough to authorize the President to fix the rules of law covering liability. It looks rather to his making regulations to provide a plan for adjustment, if possible, and for hearing, if necessary, upon the question of liability. Would not the rule of liability be this as to the freight, the vessel, and the cargo: The United States, through its officers and agents, having taken charge of it, would the Government not be absolutely liable for any damage that might happen, just as much as a railroad carrying freight would be liable; and would the Government not, as to passengers, be responsible for extraordinary diligence, just as any other carrier of passengers, subject, however, to the defense of contributory negligence on their part? Would not that line of doctrine apply to our relations both to vessels and to passengers?

My object in introducing this amendment is to free the United States Government from the relation of absolute liability with reference to those vessels that go through free. I think we ought not to be in the same status toward them; and there should be no liability if the officers and agents of the United States are in the exercise of ordinary care; that there ought to be a sufficient degree of care required to be exercised toward those people to whom we are making a gift and from whom we are receiving nothing as pay for the work done. It is for that reason that I seek to discriminate between the toll-paid vessel and the free-trip vessel. The two do not occupy the same relation; I do not think there will be much trouble about the court reaching a determination as to the rule of liability. I think it will be held to be about as I have indicated with reference to vessels, freight, and passengers. It would probably be true that the same rule of liability would be applied to our Government with reference to those who were taken through free; and I do not think it ought to be applied. That is why I suggest this amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, let the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 12, after the word "regulations," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, however, No payment shall be made to owners of vessels going through without paying toll, except where it is made to appear the United States Government, through its officers and agents, were guilty of lack of ordinary care, contributing to and causing the damage.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will repeat the view I expressed of the law as it would fix responsibility upon the Government under this bill without modification. It seems to me that the Government would be a carrier of freight for hire as to vessels and their cargoes, when the Government, through its officers and agents, takes exclusive control over them, and deprives their owners of authority over their vessels, either as to the management or handling of their vessels. It would become a carrier of freight and carrier of passengers for hire when it takes toll. I apprehend that the rules of law generally in force in the United States in reference to the carriers of freight and passengers for hire would become the standard of liability by the Government.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether, by this amendment, he is endeavoring to establish a different rule of law as applicable to ships passing through free from what would apply without any provision in this bill to other ships that pay tolls?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WORKS. Then, the Senator thinks that the declaration contained in this amendment is not the law as applied to the passing through of ships by whom toll is paid?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly not. I stated so distinctly.

Mr. WORKS. Does the Senator think that under this provision the United States Government would be responsible or liable for damages if it were not guilty of negligence?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that the question of negligence is not involved. I think the carrier of freight is a guarantor of the safety except for providential cause and certain classes of casualties that belong to the term "providential cause"; "acts of God and the public enemies," I believe is the expression, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri. That is the standard of liability, as I understand, for the carrier of freight. The carrier of passengers is not held to as high a standard of care as is the carrier of freight. The passenger has the privilege of locomotion and self-preservation, while the freight has not. The standard of diligence required for a passenger is extraordinary diligence. I think the Government will become under the terms of this bill the carrier of freight and the carrier of passengers through the canal, and absolute liability will be the rule of liability for damage to the freight and extraordinary diligence will be the measure of the care required from the Government as to the carrying of passengers. I am seeking to lessen the degree of responsibility when we carry them free. I think ordinary diligence is all that ought to be exacted from the officers and agents of the Government when we carry them free, and especially I think this is very important since we have broadened the scope of those that we carry free. I think we will be required to carry everybody free under the action of the Senate adopting the committee amendment. I believe that the vessels of the world will go through the canal free if we stand on that amendment, and I do not think the Government should be held to the usual standard of liability of carrier, that is, of absolute guaranty as to freight and extraordinary diligence as to passengers. I think the final effect of my amendment will be that as they all pass through free, none will be entitled to require of the Government more than ordinary diligence.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] will not be accepted, because it introduces an element of confusion into a paragraph of this bill, which will not contribute to its clarity. If the amendment were to prevail, it would expose every passenger—and he would probably be an American on an American ship—going through this canal without the payment of tolls to an injury, perhaps if it were inflicted, without any redress, while passengers on other boats could seek redress if an injury were inflicted. That, however, is only by way of criticism of this amendment.

I favor the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I think the act will be very much improved by striking out, on page 8, from line 7 to line 19. The language is faulty. If the section were to be retained, I do not think we should be satisfied with the provision that a liability is to follow from alleged injury to vessels or persons. That could be much improved by inserting that a liability would arise from negligence resulting in injury to vessels, cargo, or passengers, but I see no reason why this entire provision should not be taken out of the bill, and I think that is the judgment of the members of the committee who have given some consideration to the subject. I therefore second the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota in that respect.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the motion was made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], or the amendment was submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], I had noted on my bill a proposed amendment. I will not offer it, but I desire to state it. It was to strike out the word "alleged," in line 9, which I think ought to come out of the bill anyway, and after the word "passengers," in line 10, to insert the words "due to negligence on the part of those operating the vessels." It seems to me that if the Government should be negligent, having taken possession of the vessels in their passage through the canal, the owners of the vessels ought to have redress; but I imagine that the entire provision may go out, and I shall vote with the Senator from North Dakota to strike it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the motion made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is submitted to the Senate to strike out the paragraph, the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] is in order, and will be first submitted. The Secretary will, if desired, again state the amendment; if not, the Chair will put the question upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. The question is on that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to offer this one word about that: That is, fixing a court in which the liability of the United States can be determined. Without that provision, of course, the claims would have to be filed as claims ordinarily are, and passed upon by Congress or by the Court of Claims. We are not advised under what law this rule of damages would be fixed or the rule of liability determined. It is to be fixed by the Canal Zone court. It seems to me that the motion to strike out ought to prevail, and that this paragraph in conference could be gone over and the facts carefully ascertained. It is the part of wisdom to give the conferees that opportunity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, which is to strike out the paragraph beginning in line 7 and running to line 19, inclusive, on page 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals was, on page 8, after line 19, to strike out: "The President shall provide a method for the determination and adjustment of all claims arising out of personal injuries to employees thereafter occurring while directly engaged in actual work in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal or of the Panama Railroad, or of any auxiliary canals, locks, or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, whether such injuries result in death or not, and may revise and modify such method at any time; and such claims, to the extent they shall be allowed on such adjustment, if allowed at all, shall be paid out of the moneys hereafter appropriated for that purpose or out of the funds of the Panama Railroad Co., if said company was responsible for said injury, as the case may require. And after such method shall be provided by the President, the provisions of the act entitled 'An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment,' approved May 30, 1908, and of the act entitled 'An act relating to injured employees on the Isthmian Canal,' approved February 24, 1909, shall not apply to personal injuries thereafter received and claims for which are subject to determination and adjustment as provided in this section," and to insert:

The provisions of the act entitled "An act granting to certain employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment," approved May 30, 1908, and of the act entitled "An act relating to injured employees on the Isthmian Canal," approved February 24, 1909, shall apply to the determination and adjustment of all claims arising out of personal injuries to employees occurring while directly engaged in actual work in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, or of the Panama Railroad, or of any auxiliary canals, locks, or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, or sanitation of the canal, whether such injuries result in death or not; and such claims as shall be allowed under such provisions shall be paid out of moneys appropriated for that purpose, or out of the funds of the Panama Railroad Co. if said company was responsible for said injury, as the case may require.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by inserting, on page 10, after the word "require," in line 14, the following:

Provided, That claims for such compensation shall be determined and adjusted by the governor of the Panama Canal, who shall as to such claims perform all the duties which are or may be imposed by law as to claims for compensation in continental United States on the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I hope the amendment as now amended on motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] will not be adopted. I think the provision in the House bill upon this subject is far preferable, although I think one or two amendments should be made to that provision.

The method proposed by the House provision is that the President shall provide for the determination and adjustment of claims of this character; that is, for personal injuries arising from accident and for deaths to employees. The Senate committee provision proposes to adopt with respect to such accidents the existing Federal employees' compensation law.

In operating this canal we are engaged in a business enterprise for which we are receiving an income, and the employees of the Government upon that sort of an enterprise ought to be paid for their injuries and ought to receive as high compensation for their injuries and their families should receive as high compensation in case of their death as the Government would compel private employers to pay under like circumstances.

The provisions of the existing Federal employees' liability law are wholly inadequate, and the committee amendment will limit the amount that may be recovered, no matter how severe the injury may be, to the same inadequate amount. So that a man injured in such a way that he will never recover as long as he lives—a man losing both legs, both arms, both eyes, and wholly incapable of rendering any work in the future—is limited to one year's wages, which may be, in some cases, only four or five or six hundred dollars. In case of death it limits to one year's wages the amount which the dependents may receive.

We have recently passed through the Senate a Federal compensation law by which we compel railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce to pay reasonably adequate compensation in case of injury or death, and I think the Government of the United States ought not to compel its injured employees to receive less for injuries sustained in its purely business operations than it undertakes by law to compel private employers to pay in their business operations.

And so with the hope and with the belief that the President, if the matter be left in his hands, will fix an adequate scale of compensation, I think the House provision should be left in. But in order that there may be no doubt as to the operation of it, I think it should be amended so as to provide in specific terms that the President shall prescribe a schedule of compensation.

I suppose, Mr. President, that it is in order now to amend the House provision so as to perfect it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move to insert in line 3, page 9, after the word "not," the words "and prescribe a schedule of compensation therefor," and then, in line 4, after the word "method," to insert "and schedule," and in line 9, after the word "method," to insert again "and schedule."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that the first amendment be stated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is all part of the same amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is all part of the same amendment. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 3, after the word "not," insert "and prescribe a schedule of compensation therefor"; after the word "method," in line 4, insert the words "and schedule," and after the word "method," in line 9, insert the words "and schedule."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The only objection I have to the amendment is that it appears to be quite unnecessary. In the House bill it is provided:

> The President shall provide a method for the determination and adjustment.

In my judgment, that necessarily implies the establishment of a schedule. The language is broad enough to embrace it:

> The President shall provide a method for the determination and adjustment.

That is so comprehensive that it seems to me there is no need of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah.

As to the general proposition, while the Senate committee has recommended a change in this bill, personally, I see much merit in the House provision, and, personally, I prefer to see that retained rather than to have the Senate committee report or suggest any amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from New York may be right in his interpretation of the provision, but I think, to say the least about it, it is doubtful whether or not under this provision that "the President shall provide a method for the determination and adjustment of all claims," he can prescribe the amount which shall be paid; and it is simply to remove that doubt that I offer these amendments.

Mr. O'GORMAN. It must be embraced, if the President has power to prescribe the method and adjustment of the compensation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The word "method," if I understand it, means the "way" in which it shall be done.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The way, the manner, the system; and coupling with that the suggestion that it shall involve the method, the adjustment, it contains all that is necessary on that subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from New York thinks that the word "method" includes that, and that it ought to include it, he ought not to object to the language which I have suggested, which I think makes it clear.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Except it makes it tautological.

Mr. WORKS. That is just what I rose to say.

Mr. BRISTOW. The objection I have to the House provision is that it authorizes the President to provide for the payment of these damages. I think there should be a law providing for the payment of the damages. I do not think it should be left to an Executive order, and it seems to me that Congress ought to be able to legislate a just and equitable provision that would amply compensate these people for any injuries received.

I should like for the Senate amendment to be adopted so as to put the matter in conference, and then if the present law is not sufficient redraft the paragraph so as to put in the law a scale of compensation so that everybody will know what it is, and so that it will not be left to Executive discretion, which may vary from year to year, and might vary as it relates to one injury or another. It seems to me very much wiser to fix the method and the amount of this compensation by statute instead of by Executive order.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to ask the Senator from Kansas a question. The Senate amendment gives to these employees the benefit of the provisions of an act relating to injured employees on the Isthmian Canal, approved February 24, 1909. I am not familiar with the terms of that act, and I should like to know what compensation or method of payment the act provides for.

Mr. NELSON. My understanding is that that act, in reference to canal employees simply applied a general act that we had passed prior to that, and under that general act, my recollection is that the maximum allowance in any case was one year's salary, and nothing more, and in cases of injury, which did not result in death, but which did result in something not very serious, it was much less than that; but in no case more than one year's salary.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the latter act, the one of February 24, 1909, simply applies the general law of this country in regard to its employees to the employees of the Isthmian Canal, and would limit their recovery to the amount stated by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BRISTOW. And then the amendment just adopted makes applicable any law that the Federal Congress may pass. So that if the bill which passed the Senate should become a law, it would apply, under the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the committee to strike out the paragraph beginning at line 20, on page 8, and extending to line 19, on page 9, inclusive, and the insertion in lieu thereof of the amendment proposed by the committee beginning in line 20, on page 9, and extending to line 14, inclusive, on page 10.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to say a single word in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas. He says he hopes the Senate amendment will be adopted, so that the whole matter may go into conference. I suggest to him that if the Senate amendment is now rejected and the House text thereby remains in the bill, the House text is now amended, and that will carry it into conference as much as would the Senate amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Adopt the amendment of the Senator from Utah and it will all be open in conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOURNE. I should like to offer an amendment. On page 10, line 16, after the word "operated," insert "subject to the international convention and act of Congress to regulate radio communication."

That is to make this correlate with the international convention and the radio communication bill which has passed the Senate and, I assume, will pass the House in a day or two.

Mr. LODGE. Where does the Senator propose to have those words come in?

Mr. BOURNE. After the words "and operated," in line 16, so that it will read:

> That the President is authorized to cause to be erected, maintained, and operated, subject to the international convention and act of Congress to regulate radio communication, at suitable places, etc.

It is to perfect that that I make the suggestion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOURNE. Also, after the word "canal," the first word on line 21, page 10, I move to insert "and for other purposes." As it is now in the bill it applies only to the operation, maintenance, sanitation, and protection of the canal. It might be that some of the ships might wish to use this facility, and they might be estopped under the provisions of the bill, and I simply wish to enlarge the scope of its operation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 21, after the word "canal," insert "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is evident that we can not complete the bill before 6 o'clock, and I ask unanimous consent that at 6 o'clock the Senate stand in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would ask the Senator whether that would permit of a short executive session? If it means that we are to continue until 6 and then take a recess, of course there will be no opportunity for an executive session.

Mr. LODGE. Of course a motion for an executive session can be made at any time prior to the time fixed for the taking of the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas, that the Senate shall stand in recess from 6 till 8 o'clock this evening.

Mr. REED. Is that a motion or a request for unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas ask unanimous consent?

Mr. BRISTOW. That was my desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate shall stand in recess from 6 o'clock this evening until 8 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Will the Senator not include in that that the hour of adjournment to-night shall be fixed at 10.30?

Mr. BRISTOW. We can adjourn to-night when we get tired. Ten thirty o'clock might come when we were taking a vote on some matter.

Mr. REED. I mean not later than 10.30. My object in it is this: I am willing to come here to-night and work, but I do not want to come here and be held here, and I do not think it is right that we should be held here until half-past 11 or 12 o'clock, inasmuch as we commence at 10 o'clock in the morning. I think there should be an understanding that we shall adjourn by 10.30. I am not particular about it; I can stand it if others can; but I do think it is wrong to try to hold the Senate in session too long.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think we want to stay here later than 10 o'clock, or perhaps 10.30, but I do not like to put in the exact hour when we shall adjourn.

Mr. REED. Put in the agreement that it shall not be later than 10.30.

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to object to any night session at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. I move that at 6 o'clock this evening the Senate stand in recess until 8 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that at 6 o'clock this evening the Senate shall stand in recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move as an amendment that the session shall continue not later than 10.30 o'clock.

Mr. THORNTON. Ten o'clock, I suggest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves as an amendment that the Senate shall not continue its session later than 10.30 o'clock.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the vote is taken——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not a debatable question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to say that this is a most unprecedented long session of the Senate of the United States and the Congress. Senators are getting tired, Members of the House are getting tired, and the country is getting tired, and it does seem to me that it is as little as we can do, when we have our hands upon important legislation, to stay in session until we get rid of it by coming to a vote, and, as far as our own personal comfort is concerned, it is much less uncomfortable to stay here a night than it is to be kept here a week.

So I heartily indorse the proposition to take a recess, so that Senators may obtain something to eat, and then continue in session until we finish the business before us, getting to a vote at least upon this one bill. I think if we go on in the way we have been going on we will be here until the next session of Congress is due to meet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have something else to attend to, both as citizens and as representatives. There is something else in the world besides the senatorial method of postponing until to-morrow the thing that might possibly be done to-day. I hope we will finish up the work before us, if we have to stay in session three days.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that the motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable except by unanimous consent. The regular order is called for. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate stand in recess from 6 until 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would offer as an amendment that the speeches be limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Make it five.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will suggest to make it five.

Mr. BRISTOW. That can only be done by unanimous consent, and I object to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Does the Senator object to a limitation of 10 minutes?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Would the Senator object to a limitation of 15 minutes?

Mr. BRISTOW. I object to any limitation at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 11, line 6, after the word "messages," to insert:

The President is also authorized, in his discretion, to enter into such operating agreements or leases with any private wireless company or companies as may best insure freedom from interference with the wireless telegraphic installations established by the United States.

Mr. BURTON. If I understand what that amendment means, it is contrary to an act lately passed by the Senate, on the 7th of May. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if it means the establishment of wireless stations on the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It applies to agreements with other companies that may have wireless apparatus, agreements by which interference may be prevented. The committee knows very little about it, except that the Secretary of War appeared before the committee and said it was necessary to prevent interference. The committee supposed that he knew the act had been passed through the Senate with reference to this matter.

Mr. BURTON. Is that in the language sent here by the War Department?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is the exact language submitted by the War Department.

Mr. BURTON. Under the act passed on the 7th of May it is provided that—

No station on shore not in actual operation at the date of the passage of this act shall be licensed for the transaction of commercial business by radio communication within 15 nautical miles of the following naval or military stations, to wit.

Then it enumerates certain military or naval stations, and then goes on to say:

And those established or which may be established in Alaska and in the Canal Zone.

It absolutely forbids the location of any wireless station on the Canal Zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In what respect does the Senator think that this language in the bill conflicts with the act he has just read?

Mr. BURTON. The amendment of the committee reads:

As may best insure freedom from interference with the wireless telegraphic installations established by the United States.

That would naturally mean another wireless station. I think, however, that may safely be left to the conference, though I should like to ask the chairman of the committee to make sure that it does not conflict with the prior act.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On the Senator's statement of the prior act I do not see how it can, but I will look it up. Of course the Senator bears in mind that the Canal Zone is only 5 miles inside the central line, and the Panama Republic may have wireless stations within 5 miles.

Mr. BURTON. That would be on their own territory.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It would be on their own territory. I assume that under this language the President will have authority to make agreements with those companies, so that the whole system would not be jangled up by interference. If it means anything else I will endeavor to ascertain it in conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, in line 11, after the word "operate," to insert "through the Panama Railroad Co. or otherwise"; in line 16, before the word "vessels," to strike out "our official"; in the same line, after the word "vessels," to insert "of the Government of the United States"; and in line 21, after the word "received," to strike out "in the ordinary course of business," so as to read:

The President is also authorized to establish, maintain, and operate, through the Panama Railroad Co. or otherwise, dry docks, repair shops, yards, docks, wharves, warehouses, storehouses, and other necessary facilities and appurtenances for the purpose of providing coal and other materials, labor, repairs, and supplies for vessels of the Government of the United States and, incidentally, for supplying such at reasonable prices to passing vessels, in accordance with appropriations hereby authorized to be made from time to time by Congress as a part of the maintenance and operation of the said canal. Moneys received from the conduct of said business may be expended and reinvested for such purposes without being covered into the Treasury of the United States; and such moneys are hereby appropriated for such purposes, but all deposits of such funds shall be subject to the provisions of existing law relating to the deposit of other public funds of the United States, and any net profits accruing from such business shall annually be covered into the Treasury of the United States. Monthly reports of such receipts and expenditures shall be made to the President by the persons in charge, and annual reports shall be made to the Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 12, line 9, before the word "shall," to strike out "governor of the Panama Canal" and insert "Isthmian Canal Commission."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 12, in line 14, after the words "Panama Canal," to strike out "Unless in this act otherwise provided all existing laws of the Canal Zone referring to the civil governor or the civil administration of the Canal Zone shall be applicable to the governor of the Panama Canal, who shall perform all such executive and administrative duties required by existing law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment is one that has already been covered by the consent of the Senate. The Chair calls attention to the fact that the language is not identical with the language previously called to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the particular part of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Line 19, strike out "President" and insert "Isthmian Canal Commission."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the Senate to disagree to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, in section 7, on page 13, line 3, after the word "cases," to strike out "of every character"; in line 5, after the words "wherein the," to strike out "fine" and insert "punishment"; in the same line, after the word "that," to strike out "can" and insert "may"; in line 6, after the word "imposed," to strike out "could" and insert "shall"; in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "a fine of one hundred"; in the same line, before the word "imprisonment," to insert "or"; in the same line, after the word "imprisonment," to strike out "could"; in line 8, before the words "thirty days," to strike out "exceed" and insert "exceeding"; in line 11, after the words "real estate," to strike out "and all other matters and proceedings which are now within the jurisdiction of the present district judge or the courts"; in line 14, after the word "felony," to insert "and offenses under section 10 of this act"; in line 19, after the words "appointed by the," to strike out "governor of the Panama Canal" and insert "Isthmian Canal Commission"; in line 24, before the word "law," to strike out "appropriation act or other"; on page 14, line 3, after the word "judgments," to insert "providing for the allowance and prosecution of"; in line 6, before the word "convicts," to strike out "misdemeanor," so as to read:

In each town there shall be a magistrate's court with exclusive original jurisdiction coextensive with the subdivision in which it is situated of all civil cases in which the principal sum claimed does not exceed $300, and all criminal cases wherein the punishment that may be imposed shall not exceed a fine of $100 or imprisonment not exceeding 30 days, or both, and all violations of police regulations and ordinances and all actions involving possession or title to personal property or the forcible entry and detainer of real estate. Such magistrates shall also hold preliminary investigations in charges of felony and offenses under section 10 of this act, and commit, or bail in bailable cases, to the district court. A sufficient number of magistrates and constables, who must be citizens of the United States, to conduct the business of such courts shall be appointed by the Isthmian Canal Commission for terms of four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified, and the compensation of such persons shall be fixed by the President, or by his authority, until such time as Congress may by law prescribe the same. The rules governing said courts and prescribing the duties of said magistrates and constables, oaths and bonds, the times and places of holding such courts, the disposition of fines, costs, forfeitures, enforcements of judgments, providing for the allowance and prosecution of appeals therefrom to the district court, and the disposition, treatment, and pardon of convicts shall be established by order of the President.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 14, line 19, after the word "cases," to insert "all offenses arising under section 10 of this act"; in line 20, before the word "all," to strike out "of"; and in line 22, before the word "all," to strike out "of," so as to read:

That there shall be in the Canal Zone one district court with two divisions, one including Balboa and the other including Cristobal; and one district judge of the said district, who shall hold his court in both divisions at such time as he may designate by order, at least once a month in each division. The rules of practice in such district court shall be prescribed or amended by order of the President. The said district court shall have original jurisdiction of all felony cases, of offenses arising under section 10 of this act, and all causes in equity and admiralty and all cases at law involving principal sums exceeding $300 and all appeals from judgments rendered in magistrates' courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move to strike out, in line 20, the first word, the word "and," and to insert a comma instead of the semicolon; after the word "admiralty," in the same line, to strike out the word "and." The last is a committee amendment. Let the Secretary read the language as it will read with those words stricken out.

The SECRETARY. So that if amended it will read:

The said district court shall have original jurisdiction of all felony cases, of offenses arising under section 10 of this act, all causes in equity and admiralty, all cases at law involving principal sums exceeding $300, and all appeals from judgments rendered in magistrates' courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. May I ask the chairman of the committee how many courts will be established by this provision?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The courts at present are to be abolished and a new system inaugurated by which there will be one district court for the entire zone. Then the President is authorized to divide the zone into subdivisions, each subdivision to contain one town. Each town has a magistrate whose jurisdiction is defined. He has jurisdiction over minor offenses, with appeals to the district court. That is the system. There will be one district court, with one district judge holding court alternately once each month in the cities of Colon and Panama.

Mr. REED. I presume it would be utterly useless to make a suggestion, but with the present population of the zone and the extent of territory of the zone it must be manifest to any person that there is not enough work to keep one man busy if he held court one-half of the time. I can not see why the jurisdiction of all matters should not be placed in one court. I can see no reason for having three, four, or five minor courts.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The smaller magistrates are nothing more than ordinary committing magistrates—justices of the peace. There is only one district court. It has been greatly simplified and greatly reduced, and the number of judges cut down to the minimum. I do not think the Senator can find much fault with it on that account.

Mr. REED. Each of these magistrates, or by whatever term you call them, will have a court and a salary, and there will be a lot of expense involved first or last. This zone is about 30 miles long and 10 miles wide. It has about 2,500 white people living in it and will have very few more, according to the best information I can get. One judge with general jurisdiction ought to be able to run the legal business of that zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There are employed at the present time upon the Isthmus 30,000 to 40,000 people. There are in the actual employ, or were the last of June, of the Canal Commission over 27,000 people. They are scattered in the various towns and villages and settlements all along the line of the canal, which is a distance of 50 miles from deep water to deep water—from end to end. There are 500 square miles of territory, with probably 40,000 or 50,000 people upon it. No one judge could travel around fast enough in the different towns where offenses are committed every day to handle all that business. These local magistrates, in the nature of police judges, who handle the petty criminal business of those districts, will not have large pay. The President is authorized to fix their pay as soon as the canal is open for travel and the zone cleared so far as we can control it. Of course, these judges can be cut down, but we have two and one-half years before that event will come with these people there.

As the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] says, there has been a great change and reform in the cutting down of the number of courts and the salaries there. This, of course, is the House provision, prepared by the House committee, all of whom have been down on the zone and are entirely familiar with its conditions, as some of the members of our committee were. We adopted the House provision in this respect and thought it was fairly good.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, my understanding has been that this bill became effective when the canal was opened.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no; the bill goes into effect immediately.

Mr. REED. The provision for doing away with the Canal Commission does not take effect until the canal is finished, or practically finished.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is true.

Mr. REED. The employees are then to be dismissed and the entire work will be discontinued. I have been addressing my remarks to the condition which will exist when that takes place. Do I understand now that the Senator says that the bill with reference to the court becomes immediately operative?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, yes.

Mr. REED. Ought it not then to be amended so that when the work of the canal is completed the number of these judges shall be reduced?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think so. I think the towns where these magistrates are commissioned will be wiped out of existence when the canal is completed. The people there will move away. These are temporary places now. If, however, any of those towns should become permanent, so as to require a permanent magistrate, they can be continued; if not, they will be withdrawn by the President, of course.

Mr. REED. Will the wiping out of the towns wipe out the offices?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There will be no occasion for the office, and I presume if the President had appointed a man who was no longer required he would revoke his appointment.

Mr. REED. I come back to my original proposition. Notwithstanding the description of this zone, it does not occupy as much space as the ordinary county in an ordinary State, and one judge could run it well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 24, after the word "each," strike out "or" and insert "and," so as to read:

For terms of four years each, and until their successors are appointed and qualified.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. How far have the committee amendments been accepted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All the committee amendments have been acted on except the one last reported, at the bottom of page 15.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On page 15, in the second line, where it reads, "The district judge shall also have jurisdiction," and so forth, I move to insert, before the word "judge," the words "court and," so that it will read:

The district court and judge shall also have jurisdiction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 2, before the word "judge," insert the words "court and," so as to read.

The district court and judge shall also have jurisdiction of all other matters and proceedings not herein provided for.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In line 5 I move to strike out "of," the fourth word from the end of the line. I will make several verbal suggestions there all at once, and then ask the Secretary to read it as it would read if they were adopted. Also in line 6 strike out the word "or," the fifth word in the line; in line 7 strike out the word "or" and insert "and." I ask the Secretary to read it as it would read if these amendments were adopted.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 5, strike out the word "of"; in line 6 strike out the word "or"; and in line 7 strike out the word "or," the first word, and insert "and," so as to read:

The district court and judge shall also have jurisdiction of all other matters and proceedings not herein provided for which are now within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the Canal Zone, the Circuit Court of the Canal Zone, the District Court of the Canal Zone, and the judges thereof.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is correct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 24, after the word "each," strike out "or" and insert "and," so as to read:

For terms of four years each and until their successors are appointed and qualified.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In line 12 the bill provides that "there shall be a district attorney and a marshal for said court." I think that is an error. I move to strike out the word "court" and substitute the word "district" in lieu thereof.

Mr. REED. That would make two marshals.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. There is a district court with two divisions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is only one judge and there is only one court, which holds court alternately in different subdivisions.

Mr. REED. Did I misunderstand the Senator? Did he not say for each division?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no; there is one court for both divisions, and there is one marshal and one district attorney for the district, which composes both divisions of the court and all the territory on the zone.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 13, it is proposed to strike out the word "court" and insert the word "district," so that it will read:

There shall be a district attorney and a marshal for said district.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On page 16, line 6, after the word "court," I move to insert the words "and his assistants."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 6, after the word "court," it is proposed to insert the words "and his assistants," so that if amended it will read:

The district judge shall receive the same salary paid the district judges of the United States and shall appoint the clerk of said court and his assistants.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I also move to strike out the words "a salary," in line 6, page 16, and insert in lieu thereof the word "salaries."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the amendment first stated is agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, how many assistants will he have?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that amendment I have offered at the request of the Secretary of War, for the purpose of putting this matter into conference and asking him to appear before us and explain it. If it is not thought wise to have any assistants to the clerk of the court, I shall not ask that any be appointed; but that amendment has been sent to me by the Secretary of War since the committee closed its hearings, with the request that I should ask to have it put in. I submit it to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to; and also the amendment inserting the word "salaries" in lieu of the words "a salary."

The next amendment of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals was, in section 9, page 17, line 23, after the word "dollars," to strike out "or which involves the title or possession of real estate exceeding in value the sum of $1,000," so as to make the clause read:

The Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit of the United States shall have jurisdiction to review, revise, modify, reverse, or affirm the final judgments and decrees of the district court of the Canal Zone and to render such judgments as, in the opinion of the said appellate court, should have been rendered by the trial court in all actions and proceedings in which the Constitution, or any statute, treaty, title, right, or privilege of the United is involved and a right thereunder denied, and in cases in which the value in controversy exceeds $1,000, to be ascertained by the oath of either party, or by other competent evidence, and also in criminal causes wherein the offense charged is punishable as a felony.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that the House bill, on page 18, line 13, refers to the "governor of the Canal Zone." That is an error. It is not consistent with the previous provisions of the bill, which provide for a governor of the Panama Canal, and give him jurisdiction over the zone as well. I move that the language of the bill be amended so as to read:

That after the Panama Canal shall have been completed and opened for operation the governor of the Panama Canal shall have the right to make such rules and regulations—and so forth.

Then the words "Isthmian Canal Commission" should also be stricken from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OLIVER in the chair). In the absence of objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. REED. May I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that that same error occurs in probably 20 places in the bill? The text of the bill has been allowed to stand, notwithstanding the amendments which, on motion of the Senator, have been adopted, which provide for a governor. I presume the chairman of the committee overlooked that fact. He will find there are many places in this bill where that correction should be made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not think I comprehend what the Senator suggested in his last remarks.

Mr. REED. The chairman of the committee has asked that the words in section 10, "governor of the Canal Zone," which were stricken out, be reinstated and that the words "Isthmian Canal Commission" be stricken out, because the latter are not in conformity with the bill as now constructed, which provides for a governor and does away with the Isthmian Canal Commission. I say to the chairman of the committee that that same error occurs in probably 20 places in the bill, and that there should be corrections at the proper time in other parts of the bill similar to the one he now asks shall be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that the Secretary informs him that this is the only place where this particular error occurs in the bill; that the language of the bill in other places is as suggested, "the governor of the Panama Canal."

Mr. REED. The Secretary is in error unless there have been corrections made at the desk.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think I can explain it, or at least my understanding of it, to the Senator. I have asked at all points in the bill where it appears to have the language "Isthmian Canal Commission," that it be changed to "governor of the Panama Canal."

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, if the chairman of the committee makes the request in that way that will cure all the defects I have suggested.

Mr. LODGE. The request has been made and granted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That request was made and granted all through the bill. What I have now suggested in line 14, on page 18, was to have the word "Zone" stricken out, so that it shall read "the governor of the Panama Canal," and not "the governor of the Panama Canal Zone."

Mr. REED. Then, Mr. President, if that was done, it was while I was absent. I was calling the attention of the chairman of the committee to the matter in the kindliest spirit, because I thought it had been overlooked.

The next amendment of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals was, in section 10, page 18, in line 19, after the words "conviction in the," to strike out "magistrate's court" and insert "district court"; in line 20, after the words "of the," to strike out "subdivision in which the violation occurred" and insert "Canal Zone," so as to read:

SEC. 10. That after the Panama Canal shall have been completed and opened for operation the Isthmian Canal Commission shall have the right to make such rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the President, touching the right of any person to remain upon or pass over any part of the Canal Zone as may be necessary. Any person violating any of such rules or regulations shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction in the district court of the Canal Zone shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding a year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 9, to strike out:

SEC. 11. That section 5 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto a new paragraph at the end thereof, as follows:

"From and after the 1st day of July, 1914, it shall be unlawful for any railroad company or other common carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce to own, lease, operate, control, or have any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly, indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner) in any common carrier by water with which said railroad or other carrier aforesaid does or may compete for traffic; and in case of the violation of this provision each day in which such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

Jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine questions of fact as to the competition or possibility of competition, after full hearing, on the application of any railroad company or other carrier. Such application may be filed for the purpose of determining whether any existing service is in violation of this section and pray for an order permitting the continuance of any vessel or vessels already in operation, or for the purpose of asking an order to install new service not in conflict with the provisions of this paragraph. The commission may on its own motion or the application of any shipper institute proceedings to inquire into the operation of any vessel in use by any railroad or other carrier which has not applied to the commission and had the question of competition or the possibility of competition determined as herein provided. In all such cases the order of said commission shall be final.

And to insert:

SEC. 11. That no ship owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by a railroad company, or in which any railroad company has any interest whatsoever (by stock ownership or otherwise, either directly or indirectly, through any holding company, or by stockholders or directors in common, or in any other manner), shall be permitted to enter or pass through the Panama Canal if engaged in the coastwise trade between ports of the United States. That any ship of American registry, however owned or controlled, shall be permitted to operate through the canal in transoceanic trade to and from oriental or European countries; said vessel on its way to and from said foreign countries shall be permitted to do a coastwise trade between ports of the United States and intermediate foreign ports: Provided, That this shall not be permitted to any ship owned or controlled in whole or in part by any railroad company, except those engaged in said transoceanic trade, nor shall any coastwise trade be done by any such ship unless on a voyage to or from such transoceanic ports, and not to those of Canada, Mexico, or any Central or South American port: Provided further, That no such railroad owned or controlled ship shall pass through the canal unless at least 50 per cent of its cargo, in tonnage, is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to move an amendment to the amendment of the committee by striking out all after the words "United States," in line 25, page 20, down to and including line 16, on page 21.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 25, after the words "United States," in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out the remaining portion of the amendment proposed to be inserted down to the word "ports," in line 16, page 21.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cullom	McLean	Root
Bankhead	Cummins	Martin, Va.	Sanders
Bourne	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Brandegee	du Pont	Massey	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Fletcher	Myers	Smoot
Bryan	Gallinger	Nelson	Stone
Burnham	Johnson, Me.	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Burton	Johnston, Ala.	Oliver	Swanson
Catron	Jones	Overman	Thornton
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Page	Tillman
Clapp	La Follette	Penrose	Townsend
Crane	Lippitt	Perkins
Crawford	Lodge	Poindexter
Culberson	McCumber	Reed

Mr. OVERMAN. I again announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and his pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I will let this announcement stand for the day and also for to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire, in a few words, to explain what would be the effect of the amendment I have suggested.

Under the amendment proposed by the Senate committee all railroad-controlled ships are denied the use of the canal. Then there follows a provision that under certain conditions railroad-controlled ships engaged in coastwise trade may be permitted to stop at the ports of the two oceans on their way to foreign ports outside of this continent.

My proposition is to strike out that part of the amendment which, under the conditions specified in the bill, would permit a railroad-owned ship to engage in coastwise trade in connection with its foreign trade, so that with that part of the amendment stricken out the provision would be a positive prohibition against any railroad-controlled ship or vessel engaging in foreign commerce through the canal.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that the provision which the Senate committee has recommended here, amended as he suggests, would simply prohibit a steamship, in which any railroad owned any stock, from passing through the canal, so that if a railroad wanted to prevent a steamship line from using the canal all it would have to do would be to go upon the market and buy a share of stock in the steamship company.

Mr. SIMMONS. I catch the point of the Senator. The point is well taken. The provision is not complete, and I wish to suggest to the Senator that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has an amendment which he will offer to the House provision which will correct that, and if the Senate shall adopt the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the House bill then I shall move to strike out all of the Senate amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me, of course it will not be necessary to strike out the Senate amendment. It is purely a question then as to whether or not it should be adopted. I wanted to call attention——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, at the time I made the motion I did not know the Senator from Georgia would make his motion. The motion of the Senator from Georgia would necessarily, I think, precede mine, because his is a motion to perfect the House bill, to which ours is an amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would be glad to hear what is the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SIMMONS. For the present, in order to relieve the situation, I will withdraw my amendment. I think the amendment of the Senator from Georgia will meet the objection which the Senator from Kansas makes, the force of which I readily recognize.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this is one of the most important features of the bill. I can not agree with the House provision, and I do not think the Senate amendment provision effective. The objection to the House provision is that it undertakes, in connection with that provision for the canal, to go into a broad problem connected with all of our railroads throughout the entire country and their relations to ship service. I fear we now have not time to complete a bill on that broad subject. I do not think it ought to be a part of this Panama Canal legislation. We ought to confine ourselves to perfecting what we wish to do with reference to the canal.

Now, I object to the House provision for that reason, and by a very simple addition of five words, at the proper place, which I propose to ask the Senate to insert, we may limit the House provision to vessels going through the canal. Now, I like the House provision much better than the Senate provision, because it undertakes to reach the railroads that own this stock. That we can do. The House provision puts it within the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate the charge of ownership of stock. Thus we have the machinery provided by the House bill to reach the purpose to be accomplished and to do effective service.

The amendment I desire to offer is in line 22, on page 19, after the word "water," where the term "any common carrier by water" is used. In the House bill the restriction applies to any common carrier by water throughout the entire United States. I suggest that we add five words of limitation, so that it will read:

Any common carrier by water operating through the Panama Canal.

Thus we will limit the effect of the House provision to common carriers by water operated through the Panama Canal. We will free it from its present broad scope, about which I do not think we are prepared to legislate without investigation and preparation. We are now legislating with reference to the Panama Canal, and it is eminently proper to put in the provision applicable to common carriers by water operated through the Panama Canal. I favor separate legislation reaching all railroads owning stock in water carriers, but such legislation should contain provisions providing for existing established lines not covered by the House bill. I doubt whether we have now time to perfect such a measure.

Now, I want to state why I think the House remedy is effective and the Senate remedy less so. The Senate remedy forbids a vessel from passing through the canal where there is certain ownerships in its stock. Who is to pass on that question? Is it to be raised by the management of the canal each time a vessel gets to the canal and wishes to pass through? I see the utter impracticability of that plan. Are we to put a court down there and stop the vessel and have a trial? Under the Senate amendment what mode is there by which the proper investigation and determination of the right to pass through will be had? Is the governor of the canal to do so? The man operating the vessel, the captain, may not know who are the stockholders of the company that controls the boat. The amendment from the Senate committee lacks machinery effectively to reach the question.

The House provision proceeds upon a different theory. After great consideration and study of the problem—and I have had the advantage of conference with the chairman of the committee of the House in consideration of this question—I find that the reason the House took the other course was plain. Their plan is to prevent the railroads from owning the stock of competing water transportation companies—not to interfere with the ships that reach the canal; not to leave the question to be determined at the gates of the canal as to what can pass through; but to say that the railroads under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall not own the stock. Vest the power of investigation with the Interstate Commerce Commission, vest there the power for the enforcement of the provision of law that the railroad company shall not own stock in the steamship company, and a practical remedy is provided to enforce the object sought to be obtained.

Under the Senate provision a further trouble might arise. The treaties prescribe not only as to countries, but as to persons, certain rights. Railroad companies might buy or parties forbidden might purchase the stock for the purpose of interfering with the steamship company. The acquirement of the stock might be used under the Senate provision to accomplish the very thing that it is the purpose of the provision to prevent. Now, is it not better to reach the question by reaching the railroads, so that the facts may be investigated, that the question may be decided before the vessel reaches the canal?

I advocate this amendment to the House provision so that it will apply simply to carriers by water passing through the Panama Canal. I think we should free this legislation from any effort to pass on the rights of railroads owning steamship property on the coast somewhere else. I do not mean to express any disapproval of the general scheme to divorce water transportation from rail transportation. I cordially favor it, but I should like to know more about it. First, I want to know what the consequences will be. I want to see just how it will be done, from more knowledge of what occasion there is to prevent it. I think there should be careful provision made as to the time and manner of enforcing such a provision against companies with established business and patrons relying on them.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask the Senator a question. If the transportation through the Panama Canal reaches any such magnitude as it is generally hoped and anticipated it may reach, would there be many cases possible involving this question of less magnitude than the Panama Canal situation? If not, then if we are prepared to deal with that case, which will be, if not of the greatest magnitude, at least approximately one of the greatest magnitude, involving every possible question which could be involved in any other case, why should we not deal with it when we have the opportunity, if there is reason for dealing with it at this time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For two reasons, I answer the Senator from Minnesota. First, with reference to the Panama Canal, we are acting in advance. We are preventing the creation of a condition to which we object. In dealing with the railroads already operating steamship lines we are dealing with conditions that already exist. In the one case we are preventing the happening at all with reference to the Panama Canal of that to which we object. In the other instance we are tearing to pieces business conditions already established without a law to prevent it.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but I have not finished my reply.

Mr. CLAPP. I beg the Senator's pardon. Let him continue.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My second reason is that this bill applies to the Panama Canal, and I do not believe it is wise to add to legislation applicable to a particular subject provisions which reach beyond it and which are of a much wider scope.

Mr. CLAPP. As I understand—and I ask the Senator for information—the House provision, if enacted into law, would necessitate now the divorcement of a steamship line from ownership by a railroad where the railroad was supposed to be in competition with the steamship line. The steamship line, not only supposedly, but I think admittedly, will use this canal. I refer, of course, to the Southern Pacific Railroad and its ownership of the Pacific Mail Steamship. So there would be a case where a condition already exists that we have got to approach, would there not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; because the Southern Pacific has never operated through the Panama Canal.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, Mr. President, it is true, so far as concerns getting ships across the Isthmus, but the Southern Pacific has operated a line of ships in connection with that line of transportation which, when it is changed from rail across the Isthmus, will be by the canal through the Isthmus.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has never conducted its business through the canal.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true, but——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand; I will go on and answer the Senator. I do not mean to be technical in my reply, but broadly to answer and to present my views.

It has never operated its boats through that canal. It has no established business by the use of the canal, and when we say it shall not use the canal if it operates boats that are really competing with its rail line we are not taking from it any privileges that it now enjoys. We are saying it shall not enjoy this additional privilege, because we do not intend to permit any steamship line to be operated through that canal the stock of which is in part owned by railroads competing in a measure with it.

Mr. CLAPP. Does not the fact remain that when this canal is completed, if this company desires to operate through the canal the ships that are now owned by it, which now ply respectively from one side of the Isthmus up the Atlantic and from the other side up the Pacific, the communication between the two sides now being by rail, that it would involve a change of the conditions that to-day exist as to ownership?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think so. It might lead to a change in ownership, but it would not involve a change of their present rights and their present mode of operation, because they do not now operate their boats through the canal, the canal not having been finished. We are taking from them no plan of business which they now pursue. We are taking from them nothing which they are now doing.

We are saying, "You shall not operate those boats through this canal if the Southern Pacific continues to own them. You may, if you please, operate by the railroad, as you have done before, but we are not willing and will not permit through this canal boats operated by railroad companies that are in competition for this line of transportation."

The Senator and I are thoroughly together as far as concerns excluding these boats from the canal. The only question about which we seem to differ is the wisdom now of undertaking to go one step further and by this bill reach every line of competition between transportation by water and by rail where both companies are owned in a measure by the same parties.

I can conceive that there could be cases where a railroad company might own a steamboat line and handle one class of its freight by the steamboat line and another class by the railroad, there being no actual competition, but an established mode of managing the business of its customers. I do not know; I have not that knowledge about the entire status of this problem with reference to the entire country that makes me desire in this Panama Canal legislation to move over into the wider field which would cover all transportation of this character. I sympathize fully with the desire of the Senator from Minnesota to divorce water and rail transportation where they are used together to prevent competition.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. It may not be important to either the Senator or to the cause, but I am most heartily in accord with the Senator on one proposition, and that is that whatever is done shall be done under the House provision instead of under the Senate committee amendment. But what I wanted to say to the Senator is that while we are dealing in speculation as to the canal condition, involving the question of what might be desired or might not, we are dealing with an actuality as to those conditions which elsewhere exist in this country in the ownership of steamship lines by railroads, and the very fact that that evil makes itself so manifest must be one of the moving considerations for projecting it into a somewhat experimental realm with reference to the canal.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no doubt the view expressed by the Senator is entirely correct; I have no doubt there are places where this ownership or control ought to be stopped; but I do think that we ought to know more, at least I need to know more, about that. There may be places where the cooperation is not in restraint of competition, but beneficial and desirable, where shippers and the public would be injured by the change.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator from Georgia will find the opportunity to read the record of the testimony taken before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals he will have abundant and satisfactory knowledge on the subject. Many witnesses from different parts of the United States testified before that committee and almost without an exception, speaking of credible witnesses, the evidence established that no railroad company in the United States ever acquired control of competing water transportation without destroying competition at the expense of the public.

The Senate committee, as well as the House committee on the same subject, went into this matter exhaustively. Many members of the Senate committee and the majority of the House committee agreed with the testimony given by Judge Lane and Judge Prouty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was to the effect that the only salutary method, the only wholesome cure, that legislation can effect is to absolutely divorce the railroads from water transportation. I hope that the provision of the House covering this subject will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator from New York takes his seat, I wish to ask him a question. Does he think that the Senate committee amendment is effective?

Mr. O'GORMAN. It is not. I objected to it in the Senate committee. I then insisted, and I now insist, so far as I can, upon the adoption of the House provision, which absolutely prohibits any railroad corporation in the United States from having any interest, direct or indirect, in competing water-transportation facilities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the Senator from New York says that Mr. Prouty testified that he thought the railroads should be divorced from the steamship lines. I should like to know if Mr. Prouty did not distinctly say that he thought it would be a great misfortune if the steamship lines of the Sound were divorced from the New Haven Railroad. I will take the liberty of reading just one short statement.

My belief is—

This is the testimony of Mr. Prouty, on page 882—my belief is that the New Haven road continues its monopoly of that business by maintaining a service of a high quality at a reasonable rate;

* * * * * * *

I believe it would be unfortunate to compel that road to divorce itself from the New England Navigation Co.

Mr. President, that is the testimony of Mr. Prouty. It is not a statement that he thinks the steamship lines and the railroads should be divorced. It is a statement that he thinks it would be a misfortune to New England if they were divorced.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, taking an unrelated sentence from testimony does not correctly set forth the position taken by two members of the Interstate Commerce Commission who testified before the committee. They did unequivocally both declare that their commission could not adequately regulate railroad-controlled boats going through the canal. It was the judgment of both that the only safe remedy was the absolute exclusion of railroad-controlled boats from going through the canal.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will yield to me another minute, I will say to the Senator from New York, I am not reading a detached sentence. I am reading the positive declaration of Mr. Prouty. It is quite true that Mr. Prouty began his testimony with some such statement as the Senator from New York makes. Under cross-examination and after a fuller discussion of the question he said over and over again in his testimony that he thought it would be a mistake for those railroads and steamships to be divorced. He said that he thought the people of New England would not have as efficient service and he said that he thought it would not be satisfactory to the people. A little later on I will read more in detail from his testimony.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Rhode Island will remain on his feet for a moment—I thought at first he quoted a statement by one of the commissioners applicable to the railroads in the South Atlantic States. Did it only apply to New England, then?

Mr. LIPPITT. The testimony that I am reading was applicable to the New England situation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And there was no testimony from him with reference to the South Atlantic States?

Mr. LIPPITT. I am not sure about that.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. On page 83 there is a statement as to the Old Dominion Steamship Co.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the statement with reference to it?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I will just hand it to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Reading from the report, I find that the question by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] was—

Senator BRISTOW. Well, Judge Prouty, if the railroad was willing to establish the connection, the same connection, with an independent company—

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator state on what page he is reading; what place?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Page 883—that it has with this navigation company and to cooperate with it on the same terms, there would be no doubt about the success of the situation, would there?

Mr. PROUTY. I do not say that it could not be done; I suppose it could be done. The Old Dominion Steamship Co. operates from New York to Norfolk, in connection with those southern lines of railroads, a very satisfactory service; but you understand that that boat service on the Sound, the water haul, only takes a few hours; and when you come to undertake to split that up between two companies, making the railroad haul the affair of one company and the boat haul the affair of another company, and when you remember that the railroad which must perform a part of that service is a competitor with the boat line which performs the other part, it seems to me that you are going to hurt the water service.

Again, Mr. Prouty says:

Now, Senator, my judgment rather is—and perhaps I have not a sufficient knowledge upon which to base a judgment—that it would deteriorate the service to divorce the Sound steamers from the New Haven road, because that traffic originates at the interior points; it is delivered at an interior point, so to speak, in New York; if it goes west, it goes by some railroad. It is important that the Sound steamer and the railroad should operate in connection with one another; and, certainly, unless somebody has got a right to lay his hand on that operating situation and say "You shall start a train from Brockton every afternoon at 3 o'clock, which shall run down to Fall River, or somewhere else, and there discharge its cargo on a boat which leaves there at a certain hour and goes to New York at a certain hour"—unless you can say all that, you can not bring about the service that they have got there to-day.

With reference to the situation in the South Atlantic States, I know that we have been anxious for a long time to establish water transportation out of our ports. The principal water transportation we have now has been developed by railroads reaching the ports, and I am not sure what the effect of this bill would be as it comes from the House upon that character of transportation.

I say very frankly that my interest in the subject is not in the companies that haul the traffic, but in the people who are to be served by the haul. If I were sure that divorcing these companies would help our transportation situation, I would at once be ready to vote for a bill which would divorce them.

It is lack of complete information on my part that makes me hesitate to go further than a provision applicable to the Panama Canal. I am especially desirous to have the Senate committee amendment defeated and the House provision adopted, for the House provision will be effective as to the canal. I feel satisfied that the Senate committee amendment will not accomplish the purpose. The most important question before us is to save the House remedy. I shall vote first for the amendment that I have offered to the House provision, but I will vote for the House provision as it is if the amendment is not adopted. If the amendment I have offered is adopted, then I hope a carefully prepared measure may still be adopted in the near future which will bring to a close the control by railroad companies of competing transportation by water.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I propound a question to the Senator from Georgia? I paid very little attention to section 11. Am I correct in the supposition that if either the provision of the House bill or the Senate committee amendment becomes a law all steamships owned by railroads, whatever that may mean, will be prohibited from passing through the Panama Canal?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not think so. It will be from where the operation by water was in competition with their operation by rail. The measure is intended to prevent cooperation where the line could be considered competing.

Mr. GALLINGER. What is troubling me about the matter, if I understand it correctly, is this: I assume that if that provision goes into the bill the ships owned by, we will say the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., the Pacific Mail steamships, will not be given admission to the canal, but the ships owned by the Canadian Pacific Railroad, one of the greatest corporations of the world, a foreign corporation, will be allowed to enter the canal. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is a suggestion which had not before occurred to me.

Mr. CLAPP. I wish the Senator from New Hampshire would repeat his suggestion.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Minnesota asks me to repeat my suggestion. I do not know that I am right about it; I am asking for information. It is that if the bill becomes a law the ships, we will say, controlled by the Southern Pacific Co. will not be allowed entrance to the canal, while the ships owned by the great Canadian Pacific Railroad will be given admission.

Mr. CLAPP. I think that follows.

Mr. GALLINGER. So we will be giving preference to a foreign nation so far as their railroad-owned ships are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will say to the Senator of course I am not in favor of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I think we ought to amend the bill in some way.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. This provision relates to the coastwise traffic. If the Canadian Pacific owns a steamship that is operating in the coastwise traffic of the United States it must conform to all the rules that any other vessel does that is operating in the coastwise traffic. This law would prohibit it the same as any other railroad-owned steamship.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator means the House provision.

Mr. BRISTOW. The House provision. If the Canadian railroad owns a steamship that is operating under a foreign flag, that steamship is permitted to ply between ports or handle coastwise traffic in the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. BRISTOW. Therefore, it could not avail itself of this provision for free tolls, nor would it be prohibited by this provision, because it can not enter into the commerce that this relates to. It can not compete with itself in handling traffic between ports of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is in error in that statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so, too.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me call his attention to the fact that section 11 of the House bill does not say anything about the coastwise traffic at all, and I think the point he is making is not applicable to the situation.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the way I read the section, that it does not make any reference to coastwise traffic. If it does not relate to coastwise traffic, it is manifest to me that we are denying entrance to the canal to American vessels and giving entrance to the canal to foreign ships.

Mr. BRISTOW. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. This relates to all railroads that come under the jurisdiction of the interstate commerce act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Canadian railroads that have termini at the American ports which enter the United States territory are subject to the provisions of that act. So that no ship owned by a Canadian railroad competing with an American railroad-owned ship will in any way interfere or have a preference over the American ship in this commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I apprehend that the provision will be amended so that it will go to conference, and I will content myself by having made the suggestion. I really believe that we are legislating against our own ships—very likely in a proper way; and I am not discussing that at all—while we are giving a preference to the ships of our neighbor on the north. I think it is a matter that ought to be very carefully looked into. Even though this provision relates only to ships that are under the interstate-commerce act, we can easily put in another provision that will exclude the railroad-owned ships, as it seems to me. I do not know whether or not any treaty is in the way of our doing that, but I would be very unwilling that ships owned by American railroads should be denied a privilege that is given to the ships of that great corporation known as the Canadian Pacific Railroad.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that, so far as I am concerned, I thank him for the suggestion. I have not scrutinized the provision with that view in mind, and I would not be willing to undertake to express an opinion until I had gone over it carefully and considered the effect it might produce upon the line to which he has referred.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator for that. What I said was a mere suggestion. It occurred to me in reading the bill that that was a proper construction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My own study of these provisions has not been so thorough as I would have wished, because we have all been very much occupied with many matters and very much pressed. I was convinced that the proposed Senate committee amendment was scarcely practical of enforcement and that the House had inaugurated a plan for reaching the question which was the feasible plan, and the amendment which I have suggested occurred to me with reference to the House plan. That it may not require still further amendment I am not at all prepared to say.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that amendment is agreed to, as I hope it will be, the provision will then go to conference, where it can be enlarged, if necessary.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, to cover the suggestion made by the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. GALLINGER), if the House provision is retained the first paragraph of the Senate amendment might be used with a slight variation in the language, so as to read—and this would relate to ships controlled by foreign railroads—

That no ship owned, chartered, operated, or controlled by a foreign railroad company, or in which any foreign railroad company has any interest whatever—

And continue down to the word "States," in line 25, on page 20.

Mr. GALLINGER. That covers precisely what I had in mind, if my suspicions as to the meaning of the section are correct.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The insertion of those words would remove all possible uncertainty as to the act itself covering not only domestic railroads, but also all foreign railroads and vessels controlled by them.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I offer that amendment as an amendment to the House provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from New York that there is one amendment already pending.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Still, may not the Secretary read the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York for information?

Mr. O'GORMAN. The amendment as proposed is according to the language on page 20, beginning at line 18, and going down to the word "States," in line 25, with the insertion of the word "foreign" before "railroad," on line 19, and the insertion also of the word "foreign" before the last word in line 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would ask the Senator from New York where he would suggest the insertion of the amendment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That will follow as a consequent part of the House provision.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I understand, then, that the suggestion of the Senator from New York is to retain the House provision and to retain so much of the Senate committee amendment as is on page 20 down to the last word on that page with an amendment to it?

Mr. O'GORMAN. With two slight alterations which I have suggested, the insertion of the word "foreign" twice in line 19.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. ROOT. Does the junior Senator from New York think that it is competent for us to refuse passage through the canal to any foreign vessel because we do not like the ownership of the vessel?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to know, Mr. President, what objection there is to it. We are not discriminating against any particular nation, but we are establishing it as a general rule, applicable to all nations.

Mr. ROOT. We are undertaking to impose our ideas of public policy upon other nations.

Mr. O'GORMAN. We have the right reserved to us under the treaty to do that if we work no inequality among foreign nations.

Mr. ROOT. Our duty is to admit the ships of all nations to that canal and to allow them to pass through it. We have no right to say that any ship of any nation shall be excluded because of its ownership. That is perfectly clear, both under the treaty with Panama and the treaty with Great Britain. I do not know how many violations of this treaty it is desired that we shall make, but this would clearly be a violation of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to make one further suggestion before I take my seat, both to the Senator from New York and to the Senator from Kansas. Do not the Canadian railroads file their schedules with the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States and accept control in a measure over their work by that commission?

Mr. BRISTOW. They do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And would they not fall within the provision of the House bill?

Mr. BRISTOW. They would.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand that the theory of the members of the committee of the other House was that in that way they could reach the problem without involving the United States in any dispute with Great Britain and without subjecting our Government to the charge of undertaking a control it did not have, and that was the surest way to reach the question. I desire only to add, before the Senator proceeds, that I have no fixed views about this matter, except that I thought the Senate committee provision would not reach the object intended, and I am anxious to see that course pursued which wisely and legally will bring the benefits sought.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to say that I agree with the Senator from Georgia that the proposed amendment of the Senate committee would not be effective and would not meet the purpose desired by this legislation. So far as this being legislation against steamships owned by American railroads and placing restrictions on them that would not be placed upon steamships owned by Canadian railroads is concerned, that is not a matter that at all disturbs me.

What is the purpose of this legislation as it comes from the House? The purpose is to prevent a railroad company from acquiring a steamship line or establishing one that competes with it so as to control the rate that the water transportation would otherwise provide. The purpose is to control the water rates and protect the rail rates by controlling the competitors of the railroads; the purpose is to prevent the transcontinental railroads or the Sound railroads or the Lake railroads from acquiring possession of steamships on the Lakes, on the Sound, on the Pacific coast, or on the rivers in the United States—to prevent the railroads from acquiring those steamships and vessels so as to control the water rates and maintain higher rates by so doing. It is to prevent them from destroying water competition.

A Canadian railroad can not put a steamship in operation between American ports so as to compete with its own line in handling American traffic. It can not run a steamship from Boston or New York to San Francisco——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. Just a moment—and thereby protect the rates along the Canadian railroad, because such a steamship does not reach the terminus of the Canadian railroad, unless that railroad extends its lines down into the United States, and when it does extend its lines into the United States, then it is subject to the interstate commerce act, and the provisions of this bill will apply to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Canadian Pacific Railroad should put on a line of steamers running from Montreal through the Panama Canal to Vancouver, why would it not be competing with itself at its own termini on both coasts?

Mr. BRISTOW. Because the Canadian railroad-owned steamship running from Montreal to Vancouver will not handle coastwise American commerce.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is not what I asked, Mr. President.

Mr. BRISTOW. And we are not interested in the rates on the Canadian road from Montreal to Vancouver.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator stated that it could not compete with itself. It is perfectly evident that it could if it did what I have suggested.

Mr. BRISTOW. Are we interested in the rates from Montreal to Vancouver?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is a different question.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is exactly the question which the Senator from Connecticut presents——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it is not.

Mr. BRISTOW. Because it could not control any of the rates except those from Montreal to Vancouver; rates in which we are not interested.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I have presented any such question, I did not do myself justice, because I did not intend to present such a question, I am sure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I only rose to say that, in my judgment, we are very largely interested in the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railroad. They do a very large American business, especially on some parts of their line. They are competitors with our own lines, and certainly it would not do in this bill to leave it in a condition by which they would be preferred, so far as their general transcontinental business is concerned, to our own American roads.

Another question I should like to suggest to the Senator is this: Why could not the Canadian Pacific Railroad own a vessel doing business between New York and Seattle or San Francisco if it were an American vessel, registered in America, and flying the American flag, sailing from Montreal? There may be something in the law to prohibit that, but, if so, I am not aware of it. There is no reason why that vessel could not touch at American ports and do a coastwise trade as an American ship.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr President——

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me, if the Canadian railroad owned a ship under American registry it could do coastwise commerce, but the rates that would prevail between the American ports are rates in which the transcontinental railroads of the United States are interested, and not the Canadian railroads, unless the Canadian railroads enter United States territory; and whenever they enter United States territory they become subject to the interstate-commerce act, upon which this measure is based.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to know whether, under our registration laws, a foreign corporation can own a ship of American registry and do a coastwise business. I did not suppose they could. I supposed the ownership had to be American.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is right about that.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to make a suggestion right there. What is to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railroad from owning the stock of an American corporation whose vessels are engaged in the coastwise trade between Boston or New York and San Francisco? What is to prevent that road from owning the stock of some steamship company, like the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., and thus accomplishing the very purpose which you seek to avert, with reference to the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., which is now the owner of that stock?

Mr. BRISTOW. In answer, I will suggest to the Senator, What interest would the Canadian railroad have in running a steamship line from New York to San Francisco?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, my idea is that all the transcontinental lines wish to carry as much tonnage as possible overland, instead of having it carried by sea. They have a common interest; and if we prohibit by law American railroad lines from directly or indirectly controlling ships which are engaged in the coastwise traffic between the two coasts, then it will be to their common interest to see to it that the Canadian railroad operates such a line, the purpose being to prevent the use of the canal as a means of reducing transcontinental rates of transportation.

Mr. BRISTOW. In answer to the Senator from Nevada I will say that if any Canadian railroad is subject to the interstate-commerce act, this act will apply to any ships that it may own, and, in my judgment, the Canadian transcontinental railroads are all subject to the provisions of the interstate-commerce act, because they enter some part of the United States and thereby become subject to it. If it should appear that it would be practicable or feasible or possible for a Canadian railroad to own a steamship line operating between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of the United States to accomplish the very purposes we are seeking to prevent, then I think the bill should be amended so as to prevent such ownership or to prevent those railroads taking such an advantage; but I do not think that that condition exists.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Let me suggest to the Senator that that difficulty could be met this way. The Canadian railroad company could not directly own American ships engaged in transportation between New York and Boston and San Francisco in the coastwise trade. It probably could, if its charter permits it, own the stock of an American steamship organization that was engaged in that coastwise trade.

Now, whilst we can not control the Canadian Pacific Railroad in its operations as to the purchase of stock or in the control of steamship lines, we have control over American ships owned by an American company, the stock of which the Canadian Pacific owns, and our legislation should be directed to the ships and not to the railway companies, and should forbid the passage through the canal of ships owned by American companies engaged in coastwise trade, which companies are controlled, directely or indirectly, by any railroad, whether foreign or domestic, engaged in transportation between the two oceans. We can easily forbid those ships the use of the canal, and that is entirely a matter of domestic legislation.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator will find that that is not practicable, because if you make this inhibition apply to the ships instead of the railroad controlling the ship, any railroad company can go out and buy a share of stock in the company owning the ship and stop its passage through the canal.

The truth is that this discussion has been interjected into this debate not by Senators, but by the interests who have been here all winter to undertake to prevent the enactment of this legislation. They brought here this Canadian railroad bogey in order to confuse the public mind, in my judgment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I want to make a statement in a few words.

I have never been interviewed by any of these railroad people, nor has the Canadian situation been mentioned to me by them. It occurred to me in reading this section. They certainly have neglected me if they have been looking after Senators, and I feel aggrieved that they should have overlooked me.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think they probably thought the Senator from New Hampshire would have his mind made up, and there was no use to interview him, because they have been very persistent and the discussion before our committee has been very elaborate regarding this phase of the matter.

Mr. O'GORMAN. While the Senator from Kansas is referring to the Canadian railroads, I desire to say a word. A little while since the Senator from New Hampshire called attention to the possibility of a Canadian railroad-owned boat being permitted to use the canal when we would exclude from its use a boat controlled by an American railroad company, and to cover the situation suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire I proposed an amendment.

Upon reflection I do not see the need of pressing that amendment. We do not exclude railroad-owned boats from the use of the canal, if we pass this act, as a matter of sentiment. We attempt to exclude them because their use of the canal would interfere with free competition in transportation conditions in the United States.

Now, if a boat owned by the Canadian railroad comes down to use our canal, as suggested a moment ago by the Senator from Kansas, we are not concerned with local or domestic conditions in Canada; presumably the Canadians can take care of themselves; we have no affirmative duty to try to prevent monopoly finding a place in Canada; and, indeed, I can see how the use of our canal by the Canadian railroad-owned boats would really contribute to freer competition in the United States. We are only concerned with free competition in the United States, and while it might offend our sense of propriety at first to think that we permit a foreign railroad-owned boat to do something that we do not permit an American railroad-controlled boat to do, yet, as I have said, we are not to be controlled by a matter of sentiment. We are only influenced with respect to this situation because of the effect one policy or another may have upon the development of free competitive conditions in the United States, and the only menace threatening the American people with respect to the control of our markets and our rates and our facilities of transportation is the possibility of American railroads controlling water transportation; and in that aspect of the situation, Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment I proposed a few minutes ago.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I think it will be necessary to renew in some form the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, if we wish to cover our purpose. I think the Senator from New York underestimates the power of the Canadian Pacific Railroad Co. to minimize the use of the Panama Canal, and if the Senator will listen to me I will explain.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not for the present.

Mr. BRISTOW. I believe I have the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, I thought I had the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not have interrupted the Senator just at this time, except that it was agreed at the time when we made the unanimous-consent agreement that we would hold an executive session before 6 o'clock, several Senators having some matters which they want to bring up in executive session. If the Senator from Kansas will yield to me for that purpose, I shall make that motion. I dislike very much to take the Senator from Nevada off his feet, but it is in accordance with the agreement we made at the time.

Mr. BRISTOW. In a moment. Mr. President, I desire to state that when I resume after the recess I should like to proceed and get through in a few moments; but the debate will be interminable if there is a disposition to continually interrupt a Senator having the floor.

I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate, in accordance with its previous order, took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m. on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crane	McLean	Root
Bacon	Crawford	Martin, Va.	Sanders
Bourne	Culberson	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bradley	Cummins	Massey	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Dillingham	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Bristow	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Smoot
Bryan	Gronna	Oliver	Stone
Burnham	Johnston, Ala.	Overman	Townsend
Burton	Jones	Page	Warren
Catron	Kenyon	Penrose	Wetmore
Chamberlain	Kern	Perkins	Williams
Clapp	Lippitt	Poindexter	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Lodge	Reed

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the call of the roll of the Senate 51 Senators have responded to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

LISTS OF CLAIMS AND JUDGMENTS.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator in charge of the pending measure yield to me for a moment to introduce a resolution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 574), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate the following schedule and lists of claims and judgments requiring appropriations by Congress not heretofore reported to Congress at the present session, namely:

First. Schedule of claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 20, 1874.

Second. List of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims against the United States.

Third. List of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of claimants and against the United States under the act to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations, approved March 3, 1891.

Fourth. List of judgments rendered against the United States by the circuit and district courts of the United States under the act to provide for bringing suits against the Government of the United States, approved March 3, 1887.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Kansas will yield to me for a moment, I have here a communication from the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce which is very brief, containing the views of the Chamber of Commerce on the Panama Canal legislation. I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the paper, the character of which he has stated, may be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE FREIGHT COMMISSIONER,
August 5, 1912.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, representing 2,500 firms, I desire to impress upon you the importance of Congress taking immediate action with respect to Panama Canal tolls and the restriction of railroad owned or controlled vessels from using the canal. This organization has placed itself squarely on record in resolutions adopted December 14, 1911, and March 14, 1912, as favoring the free passage for vessels engaged in domestic commerce and the prevention of the railroad interests from operating steamship lines through the canal.

I would request that this communication be entered in the RECORD.

Very truly, yours,

N. B. KELLY, Secretary.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, referring to the matter which was under discussion when the Senate went into executive session, I will state that there are but two Canadian roads that could in any way be interested in transcontinental traffic, which are the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Pacific. Both those roads file their schedules with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The commission has access to their records at Montreal, and they are just as much under the Interstate Commerce Commission as are the American railroads. So there could be no possibility by which a Canadian railroad could exercise any discrimination or take any advantage under this bill in any way as against American roads.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am pleased to hear that statement from the Senator. It answers the query that I stated and which caused more discussion than I anticipated. It is very gratifying to me to know that that is the situation.

Mr. LIPPITT. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Grand Trunk Railroad is under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. BRISTOW. It is.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Grand Trunk Railroad has no mileage in the United States?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Grand Trunk runs through a portion of Vermont on the way to Portland.

Mr. LIPPITT. I can not understand that that is the case. I do not understand that there is a mile of the Grand Trunk Railroad in the United States.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Rhode Island is mistaken. My information comes from the Secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and I think he knows.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, yes; it certainly runs through towns in Vermont from Portland to Montreal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reporters are unable to hear the colloquy between Senators.

Mr. LIPPITT. I only wanted to verify it because it is entirely contrary to my information on the subject, and I am somewhat familiar with it. It was my understanding that the Grand Trunk Railroad had connections with several roads in this country, but that it did not directly have any of its own mileage in the United States.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Rhode Island is mistaken. I give my authority—the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, in connection with the discussion between the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Kansas I am led to observe that the Senator from Rhode Island has through inadvertence been inaccurate in some of his statements made during to-day's session as to the testimony of Judge Prouty. His statement was to the effect that Judge Prouty rather approved of the monopoly that the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad has over the water transportation facilities of Long Island Sound. In this connection I ask leave to call the attention of the Senate to a letter under date of March 12, 1912, from Judge Prouty, the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, addressed to the President. He said:

MARCH 12, 1912.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Referring to your request made to Commissioner Lane and myself recently, that we confer with our associates and inform you whether in the opinion of the commission transcontinental railroads should be permitted to own steamships navigating the Panama Canal, upon condition that the rates and practices of such carriers were made subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission, permit me to say:

The commission, after consideration, is unanimously of the opinion that if the waterways of this country are to be of any substantial benefit in the way of reducing rates of transportation it is absolutely essential that rail carriers be prohibited from owning or controlling, directly or indirectly, competing water carriers. From our knowledge of what has happened in the past we are of the opinion that this is particularly true of transcontinental railroads and steamships plying in competition with them.

While the Interstate Commerce Commission might, if vested with authority, prevent to some extent the injurious effect of allowing a common ownership over these competing carriers, still the limitations under which we act are such that we do not believe we could secure to the public the same favorable rates which would result from unrestrained competition. The conditions of water transportation are such that we do not believe that the port-to-port water traffic ought to be placed under the supervision of this body—certainly not under the same rules which apply in case of rail carriers. The law should, in our opinion, be so amended and strengthened as to give this commission power to compel a physical interchange of business between water carriers and rail carriers and to establish reasonable rates for through carriage.

Respectfully,

C. A. PROUTY, Chairman.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

That letter expresses the deliberate judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission that the only cure of this great evil is the absolute divorcement of railroads from the control of competing water transportation.

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator from New York give me the date of that letter?

Mr. O'GORMAN. March 12, 1912.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will turn to the testimony of Mr. Prouty on June 4——

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am very much interested in this colloquy, but I would rather that it should be deferred until I conclude my remarks.

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator will pardon me, the testimony of Mr. Prouty was on June 4, several months later, from which I read. The statements which I made were absolutely what Mr. Prouty said two or three months later than the date of the letter, and Mr. Prouty said it would be unfortunate to divorce the rail and steamship lines of New England.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I do not want to occupy the attention of the Senate a great while. I am perfectly willing to yield to questions. If any question comes to the mind of a Senator during my discussion I shall be glad to answer it, but I would prefer that Senators would not get into a controversy between themselves and thereby string out my time beyond any reasonable length.

The Panama Railroad was completed across the Isthmus of Panama in 1855. The Pacific Mail Steamship Co. was organized in 1846. When the Panama Railroad was completed it entered into a traffic arrangement with the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. for the Pacific Mail to handle the Pacific traffic; that is, the traffic on the Pacific side between San Francisco and Panama.

The first transcontinental railroad was completed in 1869, when the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific joined hands, I believe, at Ogden, Utah. Up to that time the Panama Railroad was the only transcontinental railroad. It had its own ships on the Atlantic side. It connected with the Pacific Mail on the Pacific side.

The competing boats that then existed were a line of ships known as the clipper ships or sailing vessels that sailed around Cape Horn. The clipper ships were probably the finest sailing ships that were ever built, the fastest and most efficient. When the transcontinental railroad was built it was not contemplated that it should do an extensive transcontinental business, so that the transcontinental rates that were originally established were very high, $8 or $10 a hundred pounds, I think, from one side of the continent to the other, and the rates were higher from New York to San Francisco than from Pittsburgh or Chicago to San Francisco. In a very short time, however, these transcontinental rates were reduced, and the railroads began an effort to control traffic by way of Panama. So in 1871, two years after the railroad had been completed, an arrangement was made by which rate agreements were entered into between the Panama Railroad and the Union Pacific and Central Pacific roads.

That continued for some years, I think until 1879. Occasionally there was a rate controversy and a readjustment; but in 1878, if I remember the dates accurately, there was a contract made between the Southern Pacific Railroad and the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. by which the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. agreed to pay a certain sum of money for a period of 15 years. To be accurate, I think I will just read what a congressional committee found in regard to that in 1893, when the investigation was made. I can read it more briefly than I can state it, and it will contain more accurate information:

On the 1st of February, 1878, the Pacific Mail Co., a corporation organized under the laws of New York, owning and running steamers between New York and Aspinwall on the Atlantic, and between Panama and San Francisco on the Pacific, together with certain intermediate Central American and Mexican ports, made a contract for 15 years with the Panama Railroad Co., also a corporation under the laws of New York. At that time there was no showing that there were any foreign stockholders in either of these two corporations.

This contract provided that the Pacific Mail should have the exclusive right "to bill freight through" from New York to San Francisco and vice versa over the Panama Railroad, and all freight offered by others between these points could not be "billed through," but would have to pay local rates on the Isthmus railway. The sum paid for this was to be a lump sum of $75,000 a month to the railroad company, which, by modification, was afterwards lowered to $55,000 a month.

A remarkable fact about this contract is that it was the result of a contract made before that time between the Pacific Mail Co. and the Transcontinental Railway Pool, as at that date the Association of Transcontinental Railways was called. That was a contract whereby the Transcontinental Railway Pool, embracing all of the roads between the Missouri River and the Pacific seaports, and covering entirely all railway traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, several of which had received large donations of public lands and the bonds of which the United States Government was guaranteeing, paid the Pacific Mail the sum of $90,000 a month—which was afterwards reduced to $75,000 a month, for the consideration that the Pacific Mail would carry only 1,200 tons a month of freight each way between New York and San Francisco, and on that freight would allow the transcontinental pool to fix the price and rate to be paid. That was the upshot of the contract, although the form was a reservation of space for 1,200 tons a month for the exclusive benefit of the transcontinental railway roads whether the steamers sailed full or half empty.

Seventy-five thousand dollars of which went to the Panama Railroad—

After the passage of the interstate-commerce law had compelled the dissolution of the so-called "pool" a transcontinental railway association was formed, which, under some name or other, is still in existence; and down to the present time the Pacific Mail, subsidized by the Government in a large amount each year, has been allowing the transcontinental railways to fix the rates and limit the traffic over its line. These two contracts were so far practically parts of one and the same that the amount paid the Panama Railroad monthly was fixed with regard to that paid to the Pacific Mail by the transcontinental roads, and when the latter was lowered from $90,000 a month to $75,000 the former was lowered from $75,000 to $55,000. The object of this is frankly stated by the officers of both the transcontinental roads and the Pacific Mail; it was to maintain rates above the level to which they would fall if free competition between these several routes had continued.

It seems to be certain that a very large, if not an absolutely controlling, interest in the stock and directory of the Pacific Mail Co. is owned by individuals and estates very largely interested in the stock and directory of the transcontinental roads.

I am reading now from a report of a committee of Congress.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of what date?

Mr. BRISTOW. This report is dated the 3d of March, 1893. The report continues:

Whatever be the case in the last 60 days, it is perfectly clear to your committee that the Panama Railroad Co. has for 15 years been prevented by these arrangements from being a competitor with the transcontinental railway lines.

Your committee recommends that whenever, under provisions of the act of March 3, 1891, "for ocean mail service and to promote commerce," the Postmaster General shall enter into contract with any line of vessels a clause shall be inserted in said contract to the effect that if said steamship line shall enter into any combination or arrangement with competing lines of traffic the result of which is to diminish traffic or raise or maintain rates of freight on American commerce, foreign or domestic, over what free competition would effect, that said contract may be terminated forthwith by the Postmaster General.

That was the provision by which they sought at that time to prevent this monopoly of traffic or this suppression of competition by way of the Isthmus of Panama.

Your committee regrets, so far as the ownership of nearly all the stock goes, that the control of any American corporation, as the Panama Railroad is, should be held in foreign hands, particularly in the hands of the liquidator or receiver of another corporation, also foreign appointed by judicial authority and subject to foreign judicial supervision. It fails to see, however, that any law, treaty stipulation, or contract obligation has been violated by the purchase of these railroad shares by the Panama Canal Co., or that as yet any discrimination has been attempted against American commerce or any injustice practiced thereon on account of such foreign ownership of this stock.

Now, I want the attention of the Senate.

The restrictions and injuries American trade and commerce have sustained have been laid on them by American citizens controlling various other American corporations, and it is not a pleasing subject to contemplate.

Your committee can not refrain from calling attention to what seems an obvious deduction from the facts shown, that it is to the interest of the United States that the American people should absolutely control some outlet across the Isthmus at some point, which shall be used for the benefit of American trade in general as an open and continuous competitor, affording no opportunity for entangling subsidies from great competing lines or chance of falling into the grasp of any monopoly through stock manipulations.

JOHN R. FELLOWS, Chairman.
T. J. GEARY.
JOSIAH PATTERSON.
H. HENRY POWERS.
BELLAMY STORER.

You will observe that back in 1893 a congressional committee, upon investigation, found that the transcontinental railroads were suppressing competition by way of Panama. This congressional committee suggested then, as you will observe, that some means of outlet across the Isthmus should be provided whereby the control of traffic by way of Panama by the railroads could be prevented. That was 19 years ago. Yet during those 19 years the transcontinental railways, through various devices, have controlled the traffic by way of Panama, and it never has been a competitor until in the last year, when it has been a competitor to some extent; but to that I will refer soon.

It is believed by some that with the canal across the Isthmus it would not be so easy to control traffic as it has been with the railroad across the Isthmus. A contract similar to the one that existed 15 years between the Panama Railroad Co. and the Pacific Mail was in existence in 1905, and, indeed, in 1903, when we acquired the Panama Railroad. That contract was abrogated by the United States Government in 1905. During all the years that contract was in existence the traffic aggregated about twelve or fifteen hundred tons a month. Occasionally there would be a quarrel between the Pacific Mail and the Panama Railroad, which would last for a short time. At one time, for about a year, I believe, the Panama Railroad established a line of its own on the Pacific coast, and there was very fierce competition; but that was adjusted after both had lost money, which usually is lost in rate wars, and then this contract was entered into.

In 1900 the Southern Pacific Railroad acquired 50½ per cent of the stock of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. Prior to that it had been controlled by Mr. Huntington personally or by those associated with him in business, and afterwards by the Harriman system, but at that time the stock was placed in the ownership of the Southern Pacific Railroad, and so continues down to the present time. During all this time the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. has been used for the purpose of preventing competition with the transcontinental railroads by way of Panama. It was worth a million dollars a year to the transcontinental railroads away back in the eighties to control the rates by way of Panama. When the interstate commerce act was passed, having controlled it in the way I have indicated prior to the enactment of that law, then they sought to control it in another way to evade the inhibitions which the law sought to impose. For the last 10 years they have controlled it by the Southern Pacific owning the stock.

The Panama Railroad has been in operation for about 57 years, and for more than 50 of those years it has had an iron-clad contract of some kind, or traffic agreement, with the Pacific Mail to give the Pacific Mail the monopoly of the water traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States. The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad controls the traffic of New England. The railroads control the water transportation of the Great Lakes. In order to get control of the water traffic of the Great Lakes they first put down the rates of traffic until they had gradually acquired all of the lines that operated between Duluth and Buffalo; and after they had acquired control of the lines, they then gradually raised the rate on wheat, which was the principal commodity. When there were independent steamship lines on the Great Lakes there was a differential of 5 cents a hundred on wheat from Duluth to Buffalo. When this water competition was eliminated that differential was reduced, first from 5 cents to 3 cents and then to 2 cents, by increasing the water rates.

Take the situation between Galveston and New York. There is the open sea, and yet there is not to-day an independent steamship line operating between Galveston and New York—no steamship line that is not under control of the railways. The Mallory Line is associated with the Santa Fe Railway; the Morgan Line is owned by the Union Pacific, and no independent line has been able to get in there and get a footing and hold it. The Texas City Line went into the field a few years ago and lasted about a year, and then it was blanketed and ceased to be a competitor. That is the story of water transportation of the United States. Wherever it has been to the interest of the railroads to control it, wherever it competes with railway rates, it has been controlled.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not understand that section 11 would virtually allow the railroads to-day absolutely to control the traffic through the Panama Canal, not by the operation of ships, but by buying a share of stock in any ship company that may be operating through the canal and thus prevent them from going through the canal at all?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senate amendment to section 11 would. The proposed amendment by the Senate committee to section 11 would be absolutely ineffective and would give the railroads an opportunity to buy a share of stock in any steamship line or any steamship company that was operating through the canal and thereby make it ineligible to go through. The railroads could not have anything more desirable to enable them easily to control by way of Panama than the amendment proposed by the Senate committee to section 11. I want to say that I am very much opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senate committee and in favor of the House provision standing as it is.

I am not in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, because I think the time to meet this condition that confronts the people in our transportation affairs is now. There is no occasion for postponing it any longer. We have all the information we need.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says he is not in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. I should like him to explain why he is not. As I understand the House provision now, it applies to any common carrier by water. Now, that does not mean through the Panama Canal, but it means upon the lakes and it means upon the high seas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Not upon the high seas unless it is competing with the road that controls it.

Mr. SMOOT. It may be competing indirectly.

Mr. BRISTOW. If it is competing——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to know why that amendment should not be adopted as offered by the Senator from Georgia. It looks to me like it is a very proper amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. That limits this inhibition to the Panama Canal.

Mr. SMOOT. I say I recognize that fact, and I thought while we were dealing with the Panama Canal and the competitive rates that would come about through the transportation of freight through the Panama Canal, that that was a proper thing, to limit the inhibition to the Panama Canal.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Committee on Interstate Commerce in the House has sent us a bill which goes much further than that, and the reason that we think the railroads should not be permitted to monopolize the use of the canal with steamships is because it gives them an opportunity to monopolize transportation in that way and hold up rail rates; control the traffic and control the rates.

Now, if it is necessary or desirable to prevent the railroads from controlling the rates by way of the Panama Canal, because it is against public policy for them to do so, is it not desirable to break up the control they already have formed in other parts of the United States?

If it is desirable to break up or to prevent the control of rates by way of Panama, it seems to me it is desirable to break up the control on the New England coast or the Great Lakes or by way of Galveston, and that is the reason I favor the House provision, because it covers the entire country.

The railroads have driven the steamboats off the rivers. I do not want to take the time of the Senate to read extended statements from these hearings. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] very forcibly illustrated yesterday how the railroads control the steamboat traffic on the rivers in Oregon; they absolutely control the rates.

Take Montgomery, Ala. The merchants of Montgomery, Ala., a few years ago established a barge line from Mobile to Montgomery, hoping to get the advantage of water rates. We have expended more than a hundred thousand dollars to make the river between Mobile and Montgomery navigable. A barge line was purchased and put on that river by the merchants of Montgomery to get the advantage of water transportation which we had been trying to give them by the expenditure of public money. What did the railroads do? I read a statement by a citizen of Mobile, on page 151 of the hearings. He gives exactly what happened in briefer form than I can tell you:

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think that railroads ought to be prohibited from owning steamships?

Mr. TURNER. Yes.

Senator O'GORMAN. Why?

Mr. TURNER. I do not think you are going to have any real competition on the ocean as long as you permit that. They will by one club or another control the terminals. They can control the port out of which the traffic will move, the steamer which will carry it, and the wharf which it will pass over. If a rival has got to compete with them under conditions like that he will soon be out of business. No one is going to build steamers, there is going to be no freedom in ocean travel, unless there is an absolute chance to do business on equal terms to all.

Senator TOWNSEND. Are you referring now to foreign commerce?

Mr. TURNER. Coastwise as well. I do not think they ought to be allowed to own steamship lines. They are hauling goods on land. That is exactly what they are supposed to be for. I do not think they ought to be allowed to make good any deficits of the steamship lines which can carry goods at a minimum rate until they drive everybody else out of business, and then they can restore the rate.

We had a steamboat line operating between Montgomery and Mobile which was undertaking to do business. The Southern Railway had permitted the Mallory Line to land at the Southern Railway wharf under a contract, which was an exclusive arrangement. This steamboat line, which was really all of the merchants of Montgomery combined, began to ship their goods from New York to Mobile by Mallory Line steamers. As soon as the railroad found it out they notified the Mallory Line to make the barge line keep away from the wharf; that they could not come there and get their goods and take them up the river. Those merchants were trying to get their freight a little cheaper by the combination of the New York to Mobile rate by the Mallory Line, and then by barges towed by steamboats up to Montgomery, thus getting their goods up cheaper than rail rates.

Continuing, Mr. Turner said:

Senator BRISTOW. You spoke, Mr. Turner, of the steamboat line between Montgomery and Mobile on the river.

Mr. TURNER. Yes.

Senator BRISTOW. That the railroads had refused to permit the Mallory Line to use its terminal.

Mr. TURNER. The Mallory Line used the railroad terminal under contract. The railroad notified the Mallory Line that they must not let this barge line land alongside the Mallory steamer even when she was tied to the wharf, or come to the wharf when the steamer was gone and take the barge line cargo brought to Mobile by the Mallory Line.

Senator BRISTOW. That barge line plied on the river between Montgomery and Mobile?

Mr. TURNER. Yes.

Senator BRISTOW. That was owned by an independent company, was it?

Mr. TURNER. It was owned by the merchants of Montgomery operating under the name of the Montgomery Barge Line. I believe that was the title.

Senator BRISTOW. The river has been made navigable by a large expenditure of the Government money, has it?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Senator BRISTOW. Is the barge line still in operation?

Mr. TURNER. No; they have quit. They failed a few months ago.

Senator BRISTOW. They were driven off by the railroads?

Mr. TURNER. I do not say that.

Senator BRISTOW. That was the result of it?

Mr. TURNER. That was my opinion. They made them quit—put them out of business.

Senator BRISTOW. In that instance, as in many others, the Government expends large amounts in the improvements of these rivers, to make them navigable, and then permits the railroad companies to prevent them from being used by this system of discrimination at the terminals, etc.

Mr. TURNER. The railroad said that they had entered into a contract with the Mallory Line alone to use the terminal, and that they could prevent the Mallory Line from letting anyone else use it. They told the Mallory Line not to permit the barge to come back; and the barge line had to pay wharfage on the goods, dray them across the city to another dock, and pay another wharfage still. They piled up enough charges on the barge line until the barge line just became sick.

Now, that is a simple story which can be repeated, I think, a thousand times in the history of steamboat navigation on American rivers.

Mr. GALLINGER. That was genuine competition. Now, what is the remedy?

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, I think that the railroad should not be permitted to own and control the terminals, so that it could compel a competitor by water to go to this additional expense. I think, if the Senator will permit this diversion, that the terminals, the wharves and docks in a city at which ships land should be as free to be used upon payment of proper compensation as the streets of a city are free to be used by the public.

Mr. CLAPP. Or the waters of a harbor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Or the waters of a harbor. If they are owned by private companies, then that private company should be paid a reasonable and just compensation for the use of the wharf, but every steamship line that wants to use it ought to be permitted to use it upon exactly equal terms.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Whom would the Senator advocate should pay the Pennsylvania Railroad for its terminal facilities in New York City?

Mr. BRISTOW. Those who use the terminal facilities.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This is a practical question. It is all right to have a theory, but whom would the Senator tax to pay the condemnation price for those facilities?

Mr. BRISTOW. I would not have anyone pay the condemnation price myself, but if that is necessary it had better be done by the municipality——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator does not think they can be acquired without somebody paying for them?

Mr. BRISTOW. Property can not be taken without due compensation, but no private company has the right to monopolize harbors, created by the expenditure of millions of the public money, and use these facilities as private engines to kill other competing companies which have as much right to live in this country as the company which happens to get the harbor privileges.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That may be the Senator's theory. He arbitrarily announces his opinion. Here is a quasi public company that has acquired this property and these privileges under authority of law, and it is its property. The Senator would like to see it thrown open to the public; or, in another case, that anybody who puts on a steamship line could use the accommodations which have cost millions of money to the corporations who own them.

Mr. BRISTOW. The party who uses them should pay a fair compensation for the use of the facilities.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the steamship company, the individual, or some one has to pay. Who is going to pay?

Mr. BRISTOW. Pay for the use of any property that is used that belongs——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought the companies ought not to be allowed to own them?

Mr. BRISTOW. I think it would be better for the municipality to own them; but if private companies do, then they ought to be required to permit their use by other steamships. A steamship that does not own an interest in it should, upon paying a proper compensation for its use, be permitted to use it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator from Kansas has already answered the question I was going to attempt to answer.

There is no possible question that, under the law, the governing power has the right to compel any private company owning wharves or docks to receive at that wharf or dock the goods of all other companies or individuals upon fair and just terms, the principle being exactly the same as that applied daily by the Government with reference to the railroads themselves.

A Senator here asks me aside why they did not do it in Mobile. I do not know why they did not do it at Mobile, but I know that they can do it whenever the legislative branch undertakes to and does pass proper legislation.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that this bill, in section 11, as it passed the House, gives the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to handle just such situations as the Mobile situation, and requires the railroad companies to permit the use of the wharf or to make the proper connections upon the payment of a proper compensation for the use of its property.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been of the opinion of late years—I may be wrong—that when a barge company undertakes to compete in the matter of doing business with a great railroad corporation, the barge company is bound to come to grief sooner or later. Has the Senator investigated the situation there to see whether the barge company could have existed if it had had the privileges of the wharf?

Mr. BRISTOW. There is a barge company, organized at St. Louis, to ply up and down the Mississippi River, which is at present successful; and a representative of this company appeared before the committee and stated that the barges were being operated, and successfully operated, and if they had proper connection with the railroads and were not squeezed out of business but were given a fair show, that it would be a success and a great advantage to the shipping public of St. Louis.

Mr. GALLINGER. A good many of such companies, some of them barge companies and some of them steamboat companies on the Mississippi River, have certainly come to grief. I suppose it would be said that the railroad oppressed them.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will explain to the Senator from New Hampshire just how that has been done. It has been some time since I looked at the figures, and while they may be a little inaccurate they are practically accurate.

On cotton, from Memphis to New Orleans, 450 miles, when I looked it up, the rate was 17 cents a hundred, New Orleans and Memphis being on the Mississippi River. Meridian, Miss., 196 miles from New Orleans, is not on the Mississippi River, but on the same railroad that runs between New Orleans and Memphis. From Meridian to New Orleans the rate was 36 cents a hundred. It is less than half the distance, and yet the rate is twice as much as between Memphis and New Orleans. Memphis and New Orleans are on the Mississippi River and there is water competition, or a possibility of water competition. Meridian is not on the Mississippi River, and the rate is 36 cents a hundred. It is an exorbitant rate if the 17 cents per hundred pound rate is a fair and reasonable one.

My contention is that if 17 cents a hundred pounds between Memphis and New Orleans is a just and fair compensation for the use of that railroad for that distance and the transportation of that cotton, then 36 cents a hundred on cotton from Meridian to New Orleans is exorbitant. If 17 cents a hundred pounds is not remunerative, then the railroad company has no business to lower its rate to that point, and the only reason for doing it is to destroy competition that otherwise would exist, and to make up the loss there they lay a tax upon interior points by charging them excessive rates.

That instance happens to come to my mind as an illustration of how traffic has been destroyed on rivers by the railroads. I could repeat them here by the hour by refreshing my memory a little.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SANDERS. I can tell from experience why it is that barge lines have so often been unfortunate. It is on account of the terminal facilities at each end. The railroads reach all the factories and the warehouses and the places where goods are to be had, and the same is true at the point of delivery. The steamboats and the barges have no way of doing that, and the cost at each end of the line eats up the advantage of water transportation.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will read from Commissioner Lane on that point in a statement before the committee, on page 897 of hearings. Commissioner Lane is one of the ablest transportation authorities in the United States:

> The CHAIRMAN. Do you think the Pacific Mail would create a monopoly in the canal if they were allowed to go through there?
> Mr. LANE. I think the inevitable tendency of a railroad owning a boat line that competes with it, when it is a great and powerful system, is to keep all other competitors and independent lines off, and I think the history of the Pacific Mail shows that this is so in that case.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> Senator JONES. But you would allow American railroad-owned ships to go from San Francisco through the canal to Liverpool, would you not?
> Mr. LANE. My principle is a simple one: That you should not allow a rail carrier in the United States to put on a line of steamships to compete with itself.

We do not permit a railroad to acquire a competing line of railroad. Why should we permit it to acquire a competing steamship line or establish a competing steamship line? That is simply what this bill undertakes to prevent.

> The CHAIRMAN. Do you think it is wise to attempt to inaugurate this policy, as indicated by section 11, with doubt as to its effect upon the commerce of the country and all parts of it, with the evidence we have in hand in connection with this Panama Canal bill?
>
> Mr. LANE. Of course I do not know what evidence you have before you. I have not followed your hearings.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. But, on the facts you have before you, what would you say?
>
> Mr. LANE. I think, so far as the Panama Canal is concerned, if the matter was up to us to-morrow to put into effect the provisions that are in this bill, or something similar, preventing the ownership of those boat lines by transcontinental railroads, that we probably would be unanimous in favor of this proposition.

On page 904:

> Senator BRISTOW. I think you are an older man than I am—
>
> I was mistaken about that; he is not—
>
> I think you are an older man than I am, and I remember when there were magnificent steamboats—a great many of them—on the Ohio River.
>
> Mr. LANE. They were put out of business by the railroad, were they not?
>
> Senator BRISTOW. Yes.
> Mr. LANE. They were put out of business by a combination of two things: The railroads got the terminals and the railroads made low rates and put them out.

Now, section 11 as it passed the House will control the situation as to terminals, and it will control the situation as to the acquiring and the operating of steamboat lines in competition with rail lines.

Mr. GALLINGER. In what way, if the Senator will permit me, does it remedy the matter of terminals?

Mr. BRISTOW. It gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to require the railroads to permit the use of terminals and to require the railroads to make proper connection where it can be done in the interest of the public and in fairness to the railroads.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I dislike to interrupt him, because I know he wants to get along as rapidly as possible. The Government has spent millions upon millions of dollars on the Mississippi River, ostensibly for the promotion of commerce. I believe there is a great railroad system on each side of the Mississippi River, and as a result the commerce on the Mississippi River is negligible—hardly worth talking about. Is it not a fact that the rapid transit has something to do with this matter?

Merchants do not want to wait for their goods to be hauled by an old hulk of a steamboat these days any more than we want to travel in the old-fashioned stagecoach. Does the Senator think that legislation is going to affect a change in conditions to an extent that we will ever have any very great commerce on the Mississippi River?

Mr. BRISTOW. In answer to that, I desire to say that I believe the traffic, especially the heavy traffic, can be moved by water more cheaply than by rail.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. BRISTOW. If it can and the water route has a fair chance, or if the parties who undertake to operate steamboats on the water route have an equal show, they will do business, because they can do it cheaper and at less cost. But if the railroad companies control the terminals so that they can not get into the interior from the river, if the rate of transportation from the river point to the interior point is excessive and the combined water and rail rate more than the through rail rate, then the water rate will fail.

I will just read something from the statement of Commissioner Lane on that point, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. If the Senator will allow me, of course Germany regulates that matter by government ownership to a large extent of both railroads and boats. Germany divides the freight between the boats and the railroads, giving the heavier freight to the boats, and in that way, beyond question, there is competition and perhaps cheaper transportation.

But there is one other thing that has always troubled me about this matter, and that is the tremendously low rate at which commerce is being transported in this country by rail, a rate so low that it has been to my mind rather a surprise; there has been such a tremendous reduction as a rule. There may be exceptions, but the Senator will admit that rail transportation has been reduced to a point that is certainly not, as a rule, excessive.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, sometimes they are excessive and at other times they are not. Now, Commissioner Lane says what I shall read:

Senator BRISTOW. Now, Mr. Lane, if the railroads can destroy competition because they can give better service and carry the traffic cheaper, why, then, do they demand low rates where there is water competition and demand the privilege of charging high rates where there is no water competition?

If the railroad can handle the traffic cheaper than the water line can, why do they charge such high rates where there is no water line?

Mr. LANE. I am not saying that the railroads do give the rates that they might be giving, but they do say that a properly conducted railroad system will keep a boat line out of existence because it will be more popular, and we know perfectly well it is true in the large centers of the country; down in the South the Illinois Central has made rates which are extremely low which are continued to keep those boat lines off the river.

I have just given you an illustration of that in the Memphis and New Orleans and Meridian and New Orleans rate.

Senator BRISTOW. That was always between river points.

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Senator BRISTOW. When it got off the river, it did not make those extremely low rates, did it?

Mr. LANE. No.

Senator BRISTOW. If the charge for the traffic was reasonable, why should not the same rate be applied to the inland points as to the river points?

Mr. LANE. They do not go upon that theory. They say they can differentiate between those points because there is one place where they can get that rate and there is another place where they can get a still higher rate.

Senator PERKINS. That is pretty well established in California.

Mr. LANE. Yes; their system is to charge what the traffic will bear. That is their rate system. It is fundamental. So long as they do not have to make these low rates why should they?

Senator BRISTOW. Do you think it is a just basis for rate making?

Mr. LANE. No.

I do not believe anybody can think that is just or right, but it is done everywhere.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not know that there is a valid explanation for an illustration I will give the Senator. When I was a Member of the other House, now a good while ago, we had a Representative from the State of Illinois who delivered an oration regularly once a day on the tremendous possibilities of cheap transportation if we would build the Hennepin Canal. He persuaded me that we ought to vote for it, and we voted for it. The Hennepin Canal has been built at an expense of $10,000,000, and the last report I had from it was that there was one motor boat on it. It never has done any business. I do not know but it was an unfortunate place to build that canal, but that is the history of that waterway, which cost the Government of the United States $10,000,000. I once traveled over it and failed to discover anything that looked like a steamboat from end to end, and it has not improved from that time to this.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator spoke of the situation in Germany, where the Government owns the railroads and established proper connection between the water and the rail rates. I do not want the Government to acquire the railroads. I do not believe that the Government ownership of our railways is necessary for their control. I may be driven to that belief in time. but I have not yet come to that conclusion. I think we should try to regulate these rates by giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority that it needs to enforce an equitable division and a fair charge. If that is done and still there is a failure to control the transportation rights in a way that will be just to all sections of the country, then we will have the larger problem to confront us.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask the Senator if in his investigation he has not become pretty thoroughly convinced that it is almost as essential, if not as essential, that there should be some regulation of terminal charges as well as railway charges.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly; that is as essential as the rate itself. I am taking too much time, but I call the attention of the Senate to the chart there [indicating]. It shows the traffic by way of Panama from 1900 to 1911. You will observe the tonnage there, New York to San Francisco in the first column, from San Francisco to New York in the second column, and the total in the third, by way of Panama. The other three columns are the business transacted by the American-Hawaiian Steamship Line. The American-Hawaiian Steamship Line is the successor to what was known as the clipper ships, sailing vessels that went around Cape Horn. The American-Hawaiian is an American steamship line. They sail under the American flag and they run from New York to San Francisco and from ports on the Pacific coast of the United States and Hawaii.

In 1905 the American-Hawaiian Line made a contract with the Tehuantepec Railroad, which is a Mexican railroad running across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, when they ceased to go by way of the Straits of Magellan, and then went through Tehuantepec, as you will see from the chart.

You will see the tonnage from New York to San Francisco in 1900 was 33,000 tons; in 1901, 43.00 tons. In 1901 there was strife. The Panama Railroad Co. had an independent line on the Pacific side and was fighting the Pacific Mail, and there was a disagreement which lasted for some time. Then they made up and entered into another agreement. In 1902 the tonnage dropped to 32,000 tons from New York to San Francisco; in 1903 it was 35,000 tons; in 1904, 39,000 tons; in 1905, 36,000 tons; and in 1906, 26,000 tons. In 1905 the contract which the Pacific Mail had with the Panama Railroad Co. for the exclusive privilege of through bills of lading was abrogated over the protest of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., contending that they could not do business unless they had all the business and the exclusive right. The United States Government having acquired the Panama Railroad Co., it did not think it was justified in continuing the Pacific Mail monopoly which it had enjoyed for some 50 years.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Pacific Mail by virtue of its connection with the Southern Pacific Railroad still controlled the traffic on the Pacific side. It had no competitor for that coastwise business. No one was willing to go in. At one time the merchants of San Francisco had established a line to run between San Francisco and Panama and it competed with the Pacific Mail. That competition lasted for a number of months until the line was destroyed. Commissioner Lane, in a report which he made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is in the hearings here, says that the railroads lost, if I remember rightly, over $1,000,000 in their effort to crush out this competitor, which they finally did, and it went off the sea.

The result was that no man is willing to risk his money in a ship line in competition with this powerful competitor, which would be able to destroy him by lowering the rate to a point he could not meet and live.

After this exclusive contract was abrogated there was a gradual decline in the amount of business by way of Panama until 1909. In the meantime the Tehuantepec Railroad had made a contract with the American-Hawaiian Steamship Line to run that road as a competitor of the Panama Railroad, and that competition came in, although it has never been a vital competition. There has always been an understanding between the American-Hawaiian Line and the Pacific Mail so that they have not had any rate controversies.

In 1910 the California and the Atlantic, a steamship line, was established by two young men, one a Mr. Bates and the other Mr. Cheeseborough, known as the firm of Bates & Cheeseborough. They leased a number of vessels. They were men of no great means, but were able to get credit, and leased these vessels and began handling traffic between San Francisco and Panama. Up to that time it had taken from 28 to 35 days to make the trip from San Francisco to Panama, the Pacific Mail dragging along the Mexican and Central American coast, stopping at all the ports, so that the time consumed in the movement of traffic by way of Panama was very great.

In 1905 I was appointed as a special commissioner of the Panama Railroad, and made an investigation in regard to these rates. The general manager of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. reiterated time and again that it would not be profitable to run a direct line from the ports of California—that is, from San Francisco to San Pedro, which is the port of Los Angeles—direct to Panama; that it would not pay; that, while the trip could be made in 12 or 13 days, the traffic between the Pacific coast ports and the Atlantic coast ports of the United States would not be sufficient to maintain a direct line; and that he would not run it, could not run it, and he did not.

Bates & Cheeseborough concluded that there was enough traffic to make that a profitable business. So they proposed that if the Panama Railroad would give them facilities on the Isthmus of Panama and take care of their traffic they would put on an independent line and compete with the Pacific Mail, and in October, 1910, they put it on; and at the same time the Pacific Mail concluded that a direct line would pay, so it began to run boats direct to Panama.

Those are fiscal years. I want you to observe the difference in the amount of traffic that was moved via the Isthmus: For the first nine months after the Bates & Cheeseborough line was established the Pacific Mail handled 37,842 tons more than they had ever handled before in that length of time, and the California and Atlantic handled 66,922 tons, practically twice as many tons as the Pacific Mail, which had been the old established line and had been operating for 50 years. I have not the figures for the last month of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, but for 11 months of 1912 the Pacific Mail cargo from New York to San Francisco reached 52,000 tons, while the California-Atlantic, the new line, operated by two young men as independents, handled 84,000 tons, making a total in the 11 months of 136,000 tons; showing that during all these years the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. was used by the transcontinental railroads to suppress traffic and prevent the Panama route from being used or becoming a competitor of the transcontinental lines. The figures are the strongest evidence that can be presented.

Now, take the traffic from San Francisco to New York the other way. It ran down in 1909 as low as 8,000 tons. The Pacific Mail collected the tonnage from the Pacific side, and, if they did not take it, it went in the Panama Railroad ships that are owned by the United States Government, and they were compelled to secure scrap iron to use for ballast to get those ships back to New York from Colon, because the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., controlled by the Southern Pacific Railroad, refused to bring freight there that these ships might have tonnage back to New York.

Mr. GALLINGER. What year was that?

Mr. BRISTOW. That was in 1909; but when the Tehuantepec route became more active, and especially when Bates & Cheesebrough came in in October, 1910, you will see the traffic at once increased. The first nine months after Bates & Cheesebrough entered this field of competition the Pacific Mail took from San Francisco to New York 57,000 tons, an unprecedented tonnage, more than it had ever before handled by about 20,000 tons at any time in its history, and at the same time its competitor moved 105,000 tons, demonstrating the enormous traffic that has been waiting for decades there if there had only been some way by which it could have been handled.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Kansas think that the inability of the Panama Railroad Co., a single-track railroad, which was engaged in constructing the canal, had anything to do with the slack movement of freight from San Francisco to New York at that time?

Mr. BRISTOW. Not in the least. I know of my own knowledge that it did not have; I know that the Panama Railroad Co. was hungry and begging for traffic from San Francisco to New York, and because it did not have it it had to use scrap iron for ballast in order to get its ships back to New York.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I may not quite understand the situation, but Bates & Cheesebrough seem to have solved the problem of competition, did they not?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that was open to anybody through all these years who wanted to invest money in a competing line?

Mr. BRISTOW. But I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that every line that went on in competition with the Pacific Mail since the Panama Railroad was opened was driven out of business, because the Pacific Mail, backed by the transcontinental railroads, had resources which were able to crush them; and the merchants of San Francisco, when they undertook to establish this line, lost hundreds of thousand of dollars in their effort, and no man would go in there. Why has this company been able to compete?

Mr. GALLINGER. I was going to ask that question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Because the United States Government owns the Panama Railroad and refuses to permit the Bates & Cheesebrough line to be crushed; and I will give the Senator the reasons why.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the United States Government acquired the Panama Railroad it was owned by the French company, was it not?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the French company took the Pacific Mail off the Atlantic side and established a line of their own.

Mr. BRISTOW. The French company ran its own ships for over a year.

Mr. GALLINGER. They did for a good while.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; not for a good while. They ran a line there for a little over a year.

Mr. GALLINGER. They did buy some old Brazilian steamships and put them on a line.

Mr. BRISTOW. They lost on their line some $200,000; they struggled some time, and then gave up. They made a contract with the Pacific Mail and again gave it a monopoly because they thought it was more profitable to do that than fight it.

Mr. GALLINGER. They limited the amount of tonnage to the Pacific Mail for a very considerable time, I think, to 250 tons a month or something like that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Twelve hundred tons a month. That was the contract for which the Panama Railroad Co. received $75,000 a month and the Pacific Mail received $90,000, and paid out of that $90,000 $75,000 a month to the Panama Railroad Co. That was one of the arrangements that was made, and through that arrangement the transcontinental railroads were able to close up this commercial highway and control it. After this competition, you will observe, that during 11 months of 1912 the Pacific Mail has moved from San Francisco to New York 105,000 tons, and there has never been a time in 20 years when it could not have moved that much freight or more if they had not been controlled by the transcontinental railroads or if they had been permitted to do so, but during that time these young men moved 153,000 tons, making a total, you will see, of 289,000 tons that year.

During this time the American-Hawaiian Line became active, and when these young men got into the field as independent competitors there was an enormous increase in the waterborne traffic. The American-Hawaiian Line during the calendar year of 1911 moved 457,000 tons, 157,000 tons more than it had ever moved before, showing that when competition became active two young men, with a few inferior ships, were able to break loose that combination.

What did they undertake to do? These young men went out and sought business; they went into fields, visited men who never had shipped a pound by way of Panama, and proposed to make on this new business a low rate that would move the traffic. They took the crude, heavy material—asphalt, I think—and lumber and commodities that had never been moved that way before, commodities that the Pacific Mail never would touch. When this California-Atlantic Line undertook to go out and get business which formerly had gone to the railroads, then the Pacific Mail began to cut the rates.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if those young men could compete so successfully with the Pacific Mail against all these adverse conditions, why could they not compete through the Panama Canal?

Mr. BRISTOW. Those young men would have been out of business before this and lost every dollar they had if the United States Government had permitted the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. to cut the rates as low as they would have done and as low as they had done in the past.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; but suppose that the Pacific Mail Co.'s boats are put under the control of a commission, with authority to fix rates, why can not these young men compete through the canal?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator must admit that it is not practical. Commissioner Lane and Commissioner Prouty say—I do not want to take the time of the Senate to read their testimony, though I will do so if it is necessary—that it is not practicable for the Interstate Commerce Commission to control the rates, and they report against it; they say it ought not to be done, but that the proper way to do it would be to prohibit the railroads from monopolizing this traffic and to have free competition between the steamships that seek to handle the tonnage between the two coasts.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Wise as may be those two gentlemen to whom the Senator from Kansas delights to pay tribute, I do not take the slightest stock in their statement that it is impossible to fix a reasonable rate on regular liners between New York and San Francisco.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is the difference between the Senator from Connecticut and myself.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is.

Mr. BRISTOW. And while I have the highest regard for the Senator's opinion on a great many things, I prefer very much to rely upon the opinion of Mr. Lane and Mr. Prouty in regard to this matter of rates, because I think they are very much better advised upon the subject. That has been their business for years, and if we have any authority on a matter of that kind, it seems to me they would be competent.

I must soon close, but there is one thing I want to refer to, and that is the policy of the Pacific Mail, not only in connection with the coastwise trade but with the foreign trade. I want to read from the testimony of Capt. Dollar, who has been quoted. He is an independent old gentleman who has ideas of his own. On pages 553 and 554 of the hearings you will find some very interesting statements from him in regard to the methods of the steamship lines that do a trans-Pacific business.

Senator TOWNSEND. What do you mean by "Ship Trust"?—

Capt. Dollar was on the stand—

Senator TOWNSEND. What do you mean by "Ship Trust"? You said that the Ship Trust did not want this, or did not care about it.

Capt. DOLLAR. The so-called Ship Trust—there seems to be a general opinion throughout the country that there is a ship trust, a shipping trust. There is no such thing. The shipping men, unfortunately, are very much divided; they do not work together.

Senator TOWNSEND. That is unfortunate, is it?

Capt. DOLLAR. That is unfortunate for themselves, for their own pockets.

Senator PERKINS. How many ships do you control, Captain?

Capt. DOLLAR. Well, I am managing four ships in the Asiatic trade that we own and four steamers in the American trade, and some sailing vessels.

Senator PERKINS. You have no combination in your company, have you, Capt. Dollar?

Capt. DOLLAR. There is no combination, Senator.

Senator PERKINS. As to rates or otherwise?

Capt. DOLLAR. As to rates or otherwise; no, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You say "we" own four ships; who are "we"?

Capt. DOLLAR. Myself and family and those who are interested with me.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, is it a company?

Capt. DOLLAR. A corporation; yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the name of it?

Capt. DOLLAR. The Dollar Steamship Line and the Robert Dollar Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator TOWNSEND. Have you tried to form a combination with the other shipowners?

Capt. DOLLAR. Have I done what?

Senator TOWNSEND. Tried to combine with the other shipowners.

Capt. DOLLAR. We have not; no, sir. There has been no attempt to combine on the rate at all.

Senator TOWNSEND. Well, why do you think it is unfortunate, then, that they have not combined?

Capt. DOLLAR. Well, because we have unfair and unjust competition that reduces rates below a living price sometimes. There is a combination in the trans-Pacific trade which has cut us out of the Japanese trade. I am not in the combine there; they have combined there; but we are not in it; and therefore we have been crowded out of the Japanese trade. We are still permitted by the combination to engage in the Chinese trade.

Senator TOWNSEND. How did they crowd you out?

Capt. DOLLAR. Because they made a rate to the shippers with a promise of a rebate at the end of a year if they shipped entirely by those lines, but if they shipped by our line they would lose their rebates.

Senator TOWNSEND. Therefore they reduced the rate below what you could afford to give?

Capt. DOLLAR. Not necessarily; no. But we were prohibited from doing business, because the people wanted a regular service, and knowing that they would get this rebate at the end of the year.

Senator TOWNSEND. Do you not run regularly?

Capt. DOLLAR. We run regularly, but not as passenger steamers run.

Senator BRISTOW. That is, they contracted with shippers that if they shipped exclusively by the ships of the combined companies, at the end of a year they would get a rebate on all of their shipments?

Capt. DOLLAR. Yes, sir.

Senator BRISTOW. But if they shipped anything over your line they would not get any rebate on anything. Is that correct?

Capt. DOLLAR. Yes, sir; none whatever.

Senator BRISTOW. And the result of that kind of proposition was that it froze you out of that business?

Capt. DOLLAR. Yes, sir.

Senator TOWNSEND. Who were the other people?

Capt. DOLLAR. The Toyo Kisen Kaisha, the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, the Canadian Pacific, and Alfred Holt's Line. All these steamship lines are in the combination, I understand.

Mr. GALLINGER. All the steamship lines there mentioned are foreign, except the Pacific Mail.

Mr. BRISTOW. Except the Pacific Mail; and the Pacific Mail went into the combination with them and froze another American competitor out of the trade because he would not go into the combine.

Senators, I have gone over this in a rambling way; I could talk for hours about it, but I am not going to do so. It seems to me that from the illustrations I have given it is clear that unless railroad-owned steamships are prohibited from using the Panama Canal it will not be of much use to the American people; it will be monopolized and controlled absolutely by the transcontinental railroads, as they control the traffic from Galveston to New York, as the railroads control the traffic on the Lakes, and as they have controlled it on the rivers. I feel that it is a duty that we owe to the country and to the people, whose money has constructed this great commercial highway, to keep it free from the monopoly of the gigantic transcontinental lines.

In conclusion, I want to say that, in my opinion, the Pacific Mail Steamship Co., which is fighting so tenaciously for control, wants to be permitted to put its ships on the line and do a coastwise trade in competition with its majority owners, because the Southern Pacific Railroad, which runs from San Francisco and Los Angeles to New York by way of Galveston and New Orleans, controls the Pacific Mail and owns a steamship line—the Morgan Line—running from those two ports to New York. Why does it want to put a line in competition with the line it already has from New York to San Francisco by way of Panama? It wants to do that for the sole purpose of controlling the rate and dominating the traffic by way of the Panama Canal. It has been a commercial pirate for half a century, used as the handmaiden of the transcontinental railroads to crush out every legitimate water transportation company that has ever undertaken to do business in competition with it. It seems to me it would be a political crime to permit this canal, which has been constructed at such tremendous expense, to become simply another agency for this gigantic combination to further crush and destroy the merchant marine of the American people.

We talk about developing the American merchant marine. I believe that there would be an American merchant marine if the merchant marine that we now have had not been acquired by the railroads for the purpose of protecting rail rates and preventing a development of water transportation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think he is quite wrong about that. If we go down to Galveston, where $15,000,000 has been spent in improving the harbor, deepening it for large vessels, we will find one American schooner going out of Galveston in the foreign trade. Every other ship is a foreign ship. I do not think that we would have had a very great merchant marine if the railroads had not acquired a few ships, nor do I believe that a single one of them would have been engaged in the over-sea trade to-day, under existing conditions. Galveston is a very excellent illustration of the plight in which we are in in this country so far as a merchant marine is concerned. That lone schooner, going out of Galveston harbor with the American flag at the topmast, and every other ship going out, carrying an enormous traffic, a foreign ship.

Mr. BRISTOW. And every ship that sails between Galveston and New York on a regular line is owned or controlled by a transcontinental railroad. There is not an independent steamship line that goes into Galveston, even in the coastwise trade, because the tremendous power of the railway corporations is such that no man will risk his money in ships in competition with their ships. That has been demonstrated a thousand times in the commerce of our country.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, a good deal of time has been devoted to the debate on the Panama Canal. I am going to refer to only one phase of the question, and that is the question of divorcing ships from railroad ownership. A man might stand here by the hour and illustrate the vice of the ownership of steamships by railroad companies that run their roads in competition with the steamships.

If there is any one thing which is grotesque in public life, it is taking money from the Public Treasury and devoting it to the construction of a canal and locks and deepening harbors upon the theory, which, perhaps, once was a fact, that water transportation, being cheap and open to small investors, presented a field for independent activity which, resulting in competition, causes cheaper transportation, and justifies in its general benefit the use of public funds for that purpose. I say if there is anything grotesque it is to continue a condition where the public generally does no longer get the benefit of it.

Between the combinations that have been organized, not only is the building and development of independent agencies discouraged, but railroad-controlled water transportation, instead of admitting of competition, has become an instrument for the stifling of competition. I would enlarge upon that argument except for the fact that the House admits it and the Senate admits it, so I shall devote no more time to that phase of the question.

The House, recognizing this vice, incorporated a provision in this bill to reach it by affording a remedy. The Senate committee, recognizing this vice, incorporated a provision in the form of an amendment for the purpose of reaching this vice.

Now, the House remedy is to prohibit railroads from owning steamships to be operated upon routes in competition with the railroad routes. The Senate committee proposition is to prohibit the use in the Panama Canal of ships owned by railroads. Without any reflection upon the Senate committee, if there ever was a device by which the railroads could continue their dominion over water transportation and effectually stifle competition, it is by the proposed amendment of the Senate committee. Therefore, without any hesitation, I for one am for the House amendment. Now, it seems to me that outside of some opposition here which I think it fair to say is a negative force, the Senate is in favor, so far as the Panama Canal is concerned, of prohibiting, by one or the other of these means, the use and operation of railroad-owned steamships in that canal.

This Congress met last December. It met with a full knowledge that there were many conditions in this country which required a remedy. For three years we have been practically powerless to secure any constructive remedial legislation. It has almost been a signal success that we have prevented as much as we have the passage of reactionary legislation. Here is an opportunity for constructive legislation that will meet one of the many evils that confront the American public, the remedy for which must be found in legislation, and that is to make this prohibition apply not only to the Panama Canal, but generally throughout the country and within the Federal jurisdiction, wherever water transportation is controlled to-day or is liable to-morrow to be controlled by the railroad ownership of water facilities in competitive routes of transportation.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has proposed an amendment to the House provision limiting this prohibition to the Panama Canal, and the limitation is urged, first, upon the ground that we are not ready to deal with this question in its broader aspect within the general Federal authority and jurisdiction.

Mr. President, if the Panama Canal does the business which the more sanguine believe and prophesy it will do, there will be no instance under Federal jurisdiction where the importance of the subject, upon this line of regulation, will equal that with reference to the Panama Canal. If, then, we are not ready to deal with this situation in its minor relation, it seems to me we are hazarding a great deal to attempt to deal with it in what will undoubtedly be the larger and more important matter—the subject of our jurisdiction along this line.

Again, it is urged that in dealing with the Panama situation we are not dealing with a present condition, a condition which exists, but are seeking to prevent the development of a condition similar to those which now exist elsewhere. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has shown the relation of the Southern Pacific to the water transportation that to-day touches each side of the Isthmus, on the one side distributing to the Pacific coast and on the other side distributing to the Atlantic coast, and there is not a Senator in this body who does not recognize that the reason for putting this provision in the bill is to break up the relations which to-day exist between the Southern Pacific Railroad and the water transportation which is at present utilized on each side of the Isthmus and which will be used in the canal when the canal is constructed.

It is said that this can not apply to existing conditions, because no railroad company is to-day operating ships in the canal. That is true. But there is not a Senator in this body who does not know that if this provision becomes the law of this country a condition now existing is affected, namely, that the Southern Pacific will be obliged within two years to dispose of its stock in the Pacific Mail. Then we are dealing with an existing condition. We are, if I may use the term, disturbing an existing condition. In other words, we require that the relation existing to-day between the Southern Pacific and the Pacific Mail shall be severed prior to use by the Pacific Mail of this canal. We give the Southern Pacific two years within which to dispose of that stock.

I want to submit, Mr. President, that if it is fair to require the Southern Pacific within two years—and I believe, of course, that it is—to dispose of that stock and dissociate itself from the ownership of the Pacific Mail, then it is just as fair to require every other railroad within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government to dissociate itself from the ownership of steamship lines with which it is at present associated.

There may be in one case more complications than in another; in one case there may be more involved than in another; but there is not a single case to-day in the United States where a railroad owns the stock of a steamship line which involves a different principle.

We are dealing with an existing condition. We are dealing with the existing ownership by that railroad of stock of the Pacific Mail, and we require them by the provisions of this bill, if limited to the Panama Canal, to dissociate themselves from it within two years.

There is another suggestion, and that is that in the relation of these railroads to the steamship lines which they own, a question may arise whether or not the route of the steamship line is, in fact, in competition with the route of the railroad company. To safeguard against that, the House provision, which has been drawn with wonderful care and accuracy, provides that the question of competition shall be settled by the Interstate Commerce Commission. So we have here provided all the machinery that is necessary in that respect not only for the Southern Pacific and the Pacific Mail relationship, but for the relationship which exists between any railroad in this country and any steamship line that is connected therewith.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that there can be no possible excuse for nonaction. If we to-day dare take the risk of demanding the severance of the relation between the Southern Pacific and the Pacific Mail, if we know enough of this question to demand that there be imposed this prohibition upon a phase of this problem which will be the most important, under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, we certainly are sufficiently acquainted with the conditions to impose it in the relation of minor concerns. If we have established the means to determine whether competition does exist in this instance, then the same instrumentality can be employed in other cases.

Now, with the history of these three years behind us, with the history of this winter behind us, and practically nothing accomplished along constructive lines, I appeal to those Senators who believe in constructive legislation that now and here is an opportunity to initiate some constructive legislation in a case as vicious, perhaps, as any that may be reached by constructive legislation which Congress may devise or pass.

Now, there is one other subject that I want to touch on. A good deal has been said in regard to the effect of this legislation; whether it will reach the Canadian railroads and the ships owned by Canadian railroads. Mr. President, I do not want to question anyone's motives, and yet I am satisfied that in certain quarters that question has been raised for the sole purpose of creating confusion, doubt, uncertainty, and opposition to this measure. If ever there was a question which bore no relation to the legislation under consideration, it is the instance of the bugaboo of Canadian railroad-controlled ships in connection with this prohibition. If this prohibition becomes a law, and if the effect of this prohibition is to develop competition on the lines in the United States and lower the rates to the United States, Canadian railroad-owned steamships in combination with Canadian railroads can do only one of two things, supposing, of course, they are beyond the scope of our governmental regulations. One would be to raise their rates. No one anticipates they would do that. The moment they did that they would simply lose their business, and it would be a business impossibility for them to do it. If they are beyond our control there is only one thing they can do, and that is to lower their rates. So we accept the alternative, recognizing that they are beyond the control of this legislation, of either reducing their rates, to which certainly we will not object, or raising their rates, which of course they would not do as it would cost them their proportion of the business.

So, Mr. President, I think that bugaboo ought no longer to frighten the Senate, and I do hope that with this occasion before us, with this bill one of the few things that has behind it a momentum to force its passage, we will attach this prohibition and at least accomplish that much constructive legislation during this session, for I am frank to say that it is about the only opportunity I see for accomplishing very much along the line of constructive remedial legislation.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the question which we now have under consideration has two features. One is the question as to whether or not railroad-owned steamships shall be allowed to go through the canal. The other is the question as to whether or not railroads shall continue to be allowed to own steamships in this country.

On the first question I am not going to speak, except to say in passing that it is a monstrous idea to me that an American canal, built with American money by American brains, when the fleets of all the world come to the entrance the only vessel that is going to be refused admittance is an American vessel, built by American money and managed by American brains.

I do not see any necessity for that in the argument which is being put forward that it is necessary to have it in order to control transcontinental rates. I understand that we have a commission for the purpose of controlling transcontinental rates. I can not understand that arguments drawn from circumstances and conditions which existed before the commission was appointed can have any bearing on this question.

Furthermore, if that commission can not control those transcontinental rates I can imagine no more effective competition that can possibly be produced with those transcontinental railroads than the competition which would be produced by the Atlantic coast line railroads in the extension of their route through the Panama Canal.

We in New England have looked forward to this situation. We have supposed that the great transportation facilities that have been built up in that community would find their natural extension in a line of steamboats that would run through the canal and put us in closer touch with the Pacific coast ports. They would have no interest except in putting our merchandise through at the lowest rate that it could be profitably handled.

But that is not the question I was going to discuss. It is an important question to New England. It may be in the end the most important question, but for the minute the important question is what is going to happen to the great transportation facilities which have been built up as the result of some two centuries of experiment and are now what may be termed the survival of the fittest.

I want, then, briefly, to call the attention of Senators to the geographical position of the 200 miles of coast line that lie between New York and Cape Cod. So far as I can discover New England has but three advantages for commerce and for manufacturing. One is the climate. Another is the pure waters of her rivers. The third is the transportation facilities that are afforded us by Long Island Sound, Narragansett Bay, Buzzards Bay, and Marthas Vineyard Sound.

I am not going to give the Senate a lesson in geography. You are most of you familiar with that coast line. But I will just say that I think there is nowhere in the entire world such a coastal protected channel of trade as is formed along that coast by Long Island Sound and the other waters that are hidden behind that chain of islands—Block Island and Marthas Vineyard. In the midst of it, going inland some 40 miles, is Narragansett Bay, at the head of which is the city of Providence. On the east shore in Massachusetts, but tributary to the bay, is the great manufacturing city of Fall River. Just beyond it some 16 miles is New Bedford. Going on beyond Providence and up the Blackstone River we have a line of manufacturing villages ending with Worcester, which is the center of the largest manufacturing district in New England. From the earliest time we began to use it in our transportation facilities. Scarcely had our colonists got settled and secured enough means to do more than secure food and shelter for themselves than they began reaching out along the waters of Long Island Sound to New Amsterdam, where they began trading with the Dutch, and they have continued trading with them and other nationalities down to the present time.

During that time they have tried every reasonable method of conducting transportation along those waters. They began possibly with a small vessel, the sloop. They went on as time developed to larger vessels. They had individually owned vessels; they had schooners; they had barges and tow lines; and finally they have come to their present great transportation system.

Now, New England is perhaps more dependent upon that, or as much so, as any other section of this country. We are hidden away in one corner of the United States. We have to bring into our country every raw material that we use—our cotton, our wool, our iron, our coal—and then in its manufactured form we have to send them out to our customers all over this country. Naturally we have paid a great deal of attention to our waterways, and naturally they are still a subject of very great importance to us.

The picture has been painted here of a country that was lying bound and helpless in the hands of an uncontrollable and despotic transportation system. That is not New England as I know it. Quite the contrary is true. There is no monopoly of water transportation in New England. There is no monopoly of water transportation along Long Island Sound and up Narragansett Bay.

The first great item of transportation, and that is of vital importance to us, is our coal. That coal is carried by independent lines. Some of them, I believe, are owned by the coal roads or helped by the coal roads. Some are absolutely independent lines in private ownership. Some are independent vessels, large schooners, five and six masted, carrying 5,000 tons of coal. So far as the New Haven road is concerned, I believe it has absolutely no connection with that traffic in any way, name, or nature.

The oil transportation is entirely free from any railroad control. Naturally so, for it was in the hands of one great corporation, utterly separated and independent from any control except that of the Standard Oil Co. Now the Texas Oil Co. has come in and we have two competing companies. Both of them come to Rhode Island.

Then we have the lumber trade and a number of smaller articles in which the New Haven road does not have any interest.

There is, however, one form of transportation in which that road has a very large interest, and that is the transportation of the miscellaneous finished articles and products of our mills, cotton and woolen textiles, boots and shoes, and all the great variety of products that come from New England. That traffic, however, is not without competition.

A picture has been drawn of monopoly. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], in the course of his remarks, referred to the monopoly of transportation on the waterways of New England. Even that transportation is not a monopoly. There is an independent line at Providence. There is an independent line at New London. There is an independent line at Norwich. There is an independent line at New Haven. There are a number of other lines that are independent, but the New Haven Line has given us the most efficient and the most satisfactory service of any of them. It has been the result of conditions growing out of long experience.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], a moment ago, talked about constructive legislation. To my mind there is no constructive legislation in destroying something that has been built gradually and slowly and is the accumulation of experience, and that is now conducting its business to the entire satisfaction of the people it serves.

I just want to call attention for a few minutes to the position that New England takes on this question, and particularly the State of Rhode Island, and to show the reason why. I have here petitions which have been sent to this body. I am not going to read them in their entirety because they are all a matter of record, but I wish to call attention to some parts of them so that you can see why these people think that they want their present transportation system preserved.

I have, first, a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island passed, I am told, by a unanimous vote. They say:

> Whereas it has been the policy of this State, beginning with the earliest railroad charters, to authorize and encourage railroad companies to build their railroads to tidewater, to own wharves and docks, and to operate, or to own the stock of companies operating steamboats; and
> Whereas in the last railroad charter granted, and as late as the year 1910, the General Assembly of Rhode Island, in furtherance of this policy, authorized the building to tidewater, the owning of wharves and docks, and the operation of, and ownership of the stock of, other companies which operate steamboats or steamships; etc.
> Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island opposes any action by Congress in conflict with the beneficial policy of this State as aforesaid, and that the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Rhode Island be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to do all in their power to the end that section 11 of said bill be stricken therefrom.

Now, you will notice that there are two reasons given there for the request which they make of their representatives. One is that it has been their traditional policy for a long time. The reason for that traditional policy has been that the railroads of New England are of two kinds, one going from tidewater inland to various points. The natural extension and complement of a railroad of that sort must be a steamship line to reach New York, which is the market to which all our transportation tends.

The other system or style of railroad is the one running east and west along the shore. In the case of the New Haven, it is commonly called the Shore Line, which we have under consideration, the railroads would be precluded from owning the steamships, because they compete with that Shore Line system, but they are desired to own the steamships by the people they serve, because they are an extension of the other class of railroads.

Further, they say that they have within the last year chartered a road to be constructed in Rhode Island and to own ships. That is a branch of the Grand Trunk Railway, which, by the way, is not in any way the Grand Trunk Railway, but the Southern Railway of New England, I think it is called, in which the Grand Trunk owns the stock. That road is now being built to tidewater at Providence. It is building a steamship line to operate in competition with the New Haven road and with other steamship lines to New York.

The effect of this section 11, if it should become a law, the New Haven having a shore-line system, and thereby becoming a possible competitor, would be to transfer a certain part of the business of Providence from the New Haven road, which is owned by New England capital. It has been our friend for 50 years or more. It has met the demands of the community. To transfer a material part of the traffic that that road has built up to a foreign corporation, a foreign railroad owned by British capital, with which we have no affiliations, and with whose management we are not in touch and do not know what the result might be, I think would be manifestly unfair.

I have in addition to that the protest of the Providence Board of Trade, the principal commercial body in Rhode Island. It refers to this bill and says:

> Whereas the effect of such provision, if the bill becomes a law, will be to terminate the relations between the railroad and the New England water carrier owned or controlled by them and operating between New England ports and New York City, whereby the products of New England are satisfactorily delivered to convenient wharves in the business parts of Manhattan Island more quickly and satisfactorily than if they were carried all rail.

That says that they are delivered at convenient wharves. I want to have the Members of the Senate realize and understand exactly what that means. New York City is not a small place. It covers a very large area. It is on an island that is densely crowded. The New Haven road extends only to Forty-second Street. I believe that its freight facilities are limited at the Harlem River. We in Rhode Island and in New England have no way to get to the wharves of New York except by water. The New Haven can not transport our merchandise to the point in New York City where we want it sent.

Over a long period of years our commission houses, our merchandise connections, our storehouses have accumulated in a certain section of the city where they are in reasonable proximity to the wharves. The only way we can reach those wharves is through some form of steamship transportation, and that steamship transportation is given us by the terminal facilities of the New Haven water lines. They are in several different places in lower New York, so that the different kinds of freight can be and are delivered to the point where it is desired to have it go.

They go on to say:

> Whereas the effect of destroying this cooperation between the rail and water carriers would tend to retard the transportation and handicap the industries of New England, particularly those of the State of Rhode Island: Therefore
> The Providence Board of Trade respectfully protests, etc.

I have, in addition to that, the protest of a large number of individual shippers. They say:

> We deem it especially important for the great industries of New England that under proper restrictions railroads should be allowed to develop and maintain transportation by water. This is of the utmost importance in the transportation of the freight to and from New England points and the South, especially in connection with the cotton industry.

It is signed by a very large number of the principal manufacturing plants in Rhode Island and in Massachusetts, especially those that are on or contiguous to Narragansett Bay, Fall River, Providence, New Bedford, and places of that kind.

Now, these petitions, gentlemen, represent the policy and desire of New England from its long experience with this system.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he has any knowledge of a single protest that has been sent to Congress, or to any man representing anyone in the New England States, against the existing conditions as to transportation? Has any citizen of New England, so far as the Senator knows, made representations that he wants the existing conditions changed and the divorcement of water transportation from the railroads of New England?

Mr. LIPPITT. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that, so far as my knowledge goes, I know of no such case.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I will speak for my own little State, where we have, as the Senator knows, very large manufacturing interests and the transportation of a very large amount of manufactured goods, and I know of no single citizen, manufacturer, mechanic, workingman, or farmer who has ever complained of the situation. The complaints seem to come from a distance from New England.

Mr. LIPPITT. In addition to these petitions, we have the testimony of Mr. Prouty. That testimony has been read this evening and yesterday. So I scarcely think it is necessary to reread it.

I was very much obliged to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] for bringing out the diversity in the testimony of Mr. Prouty. Mr. Prouty, did, in March, write a letter to the President saying that it was his opinion and that of his board that railroads should be divorced from steamships, but later on, in May, in his testimony before the Interoceanic Canals Committee, he on further reflection, absolutely changed that view, and stated that he thought it would be a great injury—I am not repeating his testimony verbatim—but he said he thought it would be a great injury to New England to have those two kinds of transportation separated. He said he thought that New England received more satisfactory service and cheaper service by having the two managed together than if they were separated. It is not necessary for me to go into that further.

I will say that I am not trying to make a speech for my constituents, but I am only trying to get a few facts before Senators who do me the honor of listening to me, so that they may understand why we in New England look with great dread upon this proposed legislation. There is going to be given us, according to this bill, 18 months in which to absolutely change the form of our transportation, and to absolutely change it where we are in that condition that the railroads can not land our freight where we must have it. We shall have to be absolutely dependent upon somebody, name unknown, whom nobody can guarantee to be in existence, coming forward and being willing to handle that business at the price at which it is now handled.

The New Haven people testify that they get but 3½ per cent profit from their water transportation. There has been a good deal said about prices, and costs, and competition. The New Haven rates by water are in some cases but one-half what they are by land. I think in no case are the rates so high by water as they are by land. I will just take the opportunity to read one or two of them, particularly on textiles. From Worcester by rail, cotton piece goods, 21 cents; by rail and water, 13 cents. Woolens, by rail, 32 cents; by rail and water, 15 cents.

Lowell, on cotton goods by rail, 25 cents; by rail and water 15 cents. Woolens, 35 cents by rail and 15 cents by water. It is not necessary to go through the whole of them, but the rates I have read show the situation.

In the beginning, as I have said, our railroads were isolated lines, some going north and south, some east and west, and they were gradually combined. They were combined for economy of management and for efficiency of service. With long and thorough experience with this policy we are still doing the same thing. The State of Massachusetts, after an exhaustive discussion of the question, lasting, I think, for some two years in the public press and by her public men, has just authorized the New Haven road to take over the great Boston & Maine system, which extends its lines practically to the border of New England. That action has not been taken, and the steps that led up to it in the way of combination and consolidation have not been taken because we were forced to do it, but they were taken because it was to the best advantage of the people who were being served by that railroad; and the longer the experience we have had the better we have been satisfied with it. I say to-day if there is one man—as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has asked me—who complains about the New Haven system, whatever his complaint may be, he would never dream of asking that that system should be broken up and that we should go back to the individual units which were originally put together.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LIPPITT. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would ask the Senator from Rhode Island how he accounts for that apparent tremendous difference between the rates by rail and water, under which, it seems, bulky commodities go by water and not by rail?

Mr. LIPPITT. They do go by water. The purpose of those rates is to have them transported by water. I will say to the Senator that perhaps the only explanation I can make of that is that we are being served by a very progressive railroad, which is serving one of the most progressive communities in the United States, and that road realizes that its profits must come from developing our resources and from developing our industries. Therefore I think that the company makes it an object to give as low rates as possible to our raw material in and our finished product out.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to inquire if there were any terminal facilities, or something to the advantage of the railroad at the termini, that would in a measure offset the difference in freight rates between the rail rates and the water rates; in other words, are there any dock charges or wharf charges?

Mr. LIPPITT. Oh, no; these, as I understand, are the complete and full rates covering the entire transportation from dock to dock, from freight delivered on the docks at the point of departure to the dray on the docks at the point of receipt.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is it possible that the cartage is more expensive from the terminus of the water lines to the warehouses? The railroads probably run into or are more convenient to the warehouses.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not think the Senator thoroughly understands the system. It is not all-water and all-rail transportation, but it is all rail in one case and rail and water in the other, so that the rail in many cases runs into the yard of the factory, and the factory has the choice, when the goods are put upon the car, of having them transferred to the steamers or having them stay in the car and go on to New York.

I merely want to say one more thing about that system of transportation, and that is——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LIPPITT. With pleasure.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator from Rhode Island a single question? Do I understand the Senator to say that there is no complaint heard in New England regarding the monopoly control of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad?

Mr. LIPPITT. That question was asked me yesterday, and I think my reply to it was—and I know of no better one to make to-day—that New England is a place where nobody ever agrees on everything, and I have no doubt that some people complain about the New Haven road, about the transportation system, and about almost everything else.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I understood the Senator a short while since to state, in general terms, that the system was so satisfactory to the people of New England that it would be very unfortunate if it were disturbed, and I was wondering whether that is the attitude of the people of Bridgeport, because I understand—and if I am in error I will be glad to be corrected by the Senator from Rhode Island—that, although Bridgeport is one of the great manufacturing cities of New England, it does not possess a single foot of its water front. The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad has complete control and ownership of every single foot of water front of that great city.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LIPPITT. I would prefer to have the Senator from New York complete his question, and I should like to answer that question myself.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to have that statement confirmed, if it be correct.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator made that statement in a speech, which he delivered here a few days ago in which he said that—

> The city of Bridgeport does not own one foot of frontage on the Sound; every foot of it is owned by the railroads.

The railroads, I understand, own along one side of the river, perhaps 1,500 feet or so. As the Senator is aware, the New Haven road has recently made an enormous expenditure at the city of Bridgeport for the purpose of elevating its tracks; and, in doing that, it took in a little stretch of land on one side of the river. Adjoining it is a great park on the river front owned by the city of Bridgeport. On the other side of the river—the river is only some few hundred feet wide—the railroad does not own a foot of land. On that side of the river—I happened to go by it on the train a day or two ago and looked out of the window and saw it; it was perfectly plain before me—on the other side of the river there is a large coal-dock delivery system, to which vessels, not owned by the New Haven road, land their coal. As I have said, the road has no connection with that coal-transportation system.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Can the Senator inform me whether an independent steamboat can find a landing place at Bridgeport?

Mr. LIPPITT. I was trying to tell the Senator that. I was explaining to him that only on one side of the river has the New Haven road any land at all.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LIPPITT. Then, I was proceeding to say—if the Senator will allow me to finish my explanation, as he has asked the question—adjoining that coal yard was a large weaving plant, reaching to the river, and adjoining that was an iron manufacturing concern, not one of which is owned either by the New Haven road or by the city of Bridgeport, but which undoubtedly the city of Bridgeport could easily obtain.

In addition to all that, there have recently been negotiations between the New Haven road and the city of Bridgeport. The New Haven road has offered to sell to the city of Bridgeport any of its river front, or the whole of it, at a price to be agreed upon between them, and, in case they can not agree, to leave it to arbitrators. That offer, I understand, is still open. So I can not see, to save my soul, why the city of Bridgeport should have any anxiety about being tied up, so far as water facilities are concerned, by the New Haven Railroad.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Perhaps it was not exactly fair to ask the Senator from Rhode Island something with which perhaps the Senators from Connecticut are more familiar than he is——

Mr. LIPPITT. I think I am fairly familiar with it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. But my attention is called to the testimony given by Mr. Buckland, vice president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals a few months ago. This is his testimony:

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What page?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Page 432.

> Mr. BUCKLAND. I should like to say a word about our dock frontage in the city of Bridgeport. Those of you who have been at Bridgeport will realize that our rails parallel the water front the entire distance, with the natural consequence that we monopolize the entire water front at Bridgeport.
>
> If the people of Bridgeport are satisfied with those conditions——

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator please read the rest of that?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. LIPPITT. Then I will do so, with the Senator's permission. Here is the additional testimony which the Senator from New York failed to read:

> The city of Bridgeport asked us if we would sell any portion of the water front. We told them we would sell any portion they wished. That is in our correspondence with the mayor. We offered them any portion of the water front they might desire at a price to be fixed by three real estate agents in Bridgeport, one to be selected by them, one by ourselves, and the other selected by the two if the first two could not agree.

Further than that——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Will the Senator read the next sentence?

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'GORMAN. To make it complete.

Mr. LIPPITT. I thought I had read it all.

> That offer has not been accepted, and it is still open whenever the city of Bridgeport wishes to accept it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Unfortunately, the Senator omitted the intervening sentence, which I regard as important, and which reads as follows——

Mr. LIPPITT. I did not do it intentionally.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Of course not. Mr. Buckland says:

> I say this because in the report of the Commissioner of Corporations the statement is made that the New Haven road is monopolizing the water front in the city of Bridgeport.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think my answer to that is very complete. I have shown that the railroad only owns a small portion of the water front.

Now, I want to say further, that in considering this great question it is of absolutely no importance whether the railroad does or does not monopolize or own certain parts of the water front at Bridgeport. There are inevitably, in the case of a great system like that, certain points—this is not one of them—which are probably controlled by the New Haven railroad; but what I do say is that the New Haven road does not control the water transportation into the city of Bridgeport; and I say to you—and I challenge any man on this floor to contradict it—that the largest item of transportation into that water front is coal, and that the New Haven road has nothing to do with that transportation now and has no monopoly. Now, Senators——

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I be pardoned for asking a further question? Do I understand the Senator from Rhode Island to say that there is no monopoly, nothwithstanding the language of the vice president of the New Haven road, who says:

Those of you who have been at Bridgeport will realize that our rails parallel the water front the entire distance, with the natural consequence that we monopolize the entire water front at Bridgeport.

Mr. LIPPITT. I am aware that the vice president of the road said that, and I am also aware that the statements which I have made are correct—that a large part of the water front is owned by the city of Bridgeport and used for a park, and that none of the water front on the other side of the river is owned by either the railroad or the city of Bridgeport. Mr. Buckland, in making that statement, was in error.

Now, gentlemen, these are small things in a great question, and this is a great question for the State of Rhode Island—for New England—whether or not this great system of transportation that we have built up there and with which we are satisfied and that we want to go ahead and develop, that we are competent to handle, shall be destroyed. We in New England are not, gentlemen, a weak people. We have been able to struggle with a great many problems, and many of them we have solved. A railroad is nothing but a great piece of machinery. We know about machinery in New England. We use it. We make it. We know how to judge of it. We know the difference between efficiency and cheapness, and we know that we have a system of transportation that is meeting our needs; and I do not think that because certain gentlemen or certain sections of this country are dissatisfied with railroad facilities and steamship facilities on the Pacific coast, on some of the rivers, and elsewhere, is a reason for destroying what has been built up to our complete satisfaction. It may be some reason for controlling the transportation systems in other sections of the country. It is no reason for destroying what the people of New England are using and are satisfied with.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the course of the discussion on this bill has directed itself away from the great important central question which is involved in the bill, namely, the establishment of the Panama Canal, the laws which are to govern it, and the laws, both natural and artificial, of transportation through it. The people on the Pacific coast, whom, in small part, I represent, are perhaps more interested, materially and otherwise, in the Panama Canal—in its completion, in the character of the laws by which traffic through it shall be conducted—than those of any other section of the country.

I do not think there has been an event in the history of the Pacific coast, since the time when it was first settled—when the first pioneers from New England and Virginia, and other Eastern States, carried American institutions there and established a community, organized Territorial government, and procured some sort of communication with the eastern country—which has been of as much interest and in which the people of the coast have had as high hopes as the prospective opening of this great waterway, whose principal object was to bring closer together the people of the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts.

I feel impelled to say a word before the vote is taken upon the bill, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, for the reason that I am convinced, from a careful examination of it, that if the Senate amendment to section 11 of the bill should be adopted as against the House provision, the object of this great work and the benefits we have hoped would flow from it will be discounted to a large extent; in my judgment at least 50 per cent.

I desire to call attention very briefly to the peculiar form of the Senate amendment, to some aspects which have not been called to the attention of the Senate. The Senate amendment, to all intents and purposes, would allow the unrestricted railroad control of traffic through the canal. It provides, in so many words, that the railroad companies may own ships and may engage in the coastwise traffic from the Pacific to the Atlantic with those ships through the canal, although in the discussion here and in the appearance of this provision as it is read, if it is not examined closely, it would appear to prevent the ownership by the railroads of ships engaged in traffic through the canal. The language of the Senate amendment is—

That any ship of American registry, however owned or controlled, shall be permitted to operate through the canal in transoceanic trade to and from oriental or European countries; said vessel on its way to and from said foreign countries shall be permitted to do a coastwise trade between ports of the United States and intermediate foreign ports: Provided, That this shall not be permitted to any ship owned or controlled in whole or in part by any railroad company, except those engaged in said transoceanic trade, nor shall any coastwise trade be done by any such ship unless on a voyage to or from such transoceanic ports, and not to those of Canada, Mexico, or any Central or South American port: Provided further, That no such railroad owned or controlled ship shall pass through the Canal unless at least 50 per cent of its cargo, in tonnage, is destined to or shipped from oriental or European ports.

Instead of being a restriction on traffic through the canal by railroad-owned ships, this is an express permit of such traffic. The provision that the ships should be restricted to 50 per cent of the coastwise tonnage of their cargo is not a disadvantage but an advantage. The Great Northern Railroad Co. already owns a large vessel engaged in the transoceanic trade. What would be more natural, what would be to the greater advantage of the railroad than that that vessel, which now plies between Yokohama and Seattle, should continue upon its passage through the Panama Canal to New York; and if the increased length of the voyage rendered its sailings too infrequent, what would be easier than for the railroad company to duplicate that vessel and put on another? More than 50 per cent of its cargo would be cargo, of course, destined for or from oriental ports—cotton that is hauled from the South, consigned to the Orient, and the transportation of which has been one of the principal commercial enterprises and objects of the Great Northern Railroad; loading with cotton for the Orient, loading with silks and oriental products for the United States, touching at Seattle, and thence proceeding on its journey through the Panama Canal, as it is permitted to do by this bill.

The same thing would be the case with the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. with its Pacific Mail Line. What disadvantage or obstacle, in any way, would this bill impose upon the railroad ownership of vessels going through the canal when it allows the Southern Pacific to send the Pacific Mail vessels, after coming from the Orient to San Francisco, discharging a portion of their cargo and taking on such additional cargo as it saw fit, 50 per cent or less, through the canal to New Orleans and New York? If anyone is under the impression the Senate amendment will prohibit in any substantial way traffic through the canal by railroad ships he is under a misapprehension. Instead of prohibiting, it expressly allows this condition.

There is a very peculiar proviso in the amendment, which simply adds to the confusion. I do not think it has any effect whatever, but it is peculiar, as it is simply a repetition of the previous portion of the amendment in this respect:

That any ship of American registry, however owned or controlled, shall be permitted to operate through the canal in transoceanic trade to and from oriental or European countries; said vessel on its way to and from said foreign countries shall be permitted to do a coastwise trade.

"Any ship of American registry." Then there is a proviso:

Provided, That this shall not be permitted to any ship owned or controlled in whole or in part by any railroad company, except those engaged in said transoceanic trade.

The whole paragraph applies to ships engaged in transoceanic trade, and the proviso that it shall not apply to a ship owned by a railroad company unless it is engaged in transoceanic trade is absolutely a sham as a limitation upon the railroads, because it simply repeats verbatim the same conditions which are allowed to any ship, whether owned by a railroad or not, namely, that it shall be engaged in the transoceanic trade. So that it imposes no more restrictions upon railroad-owned ships than it imposes upon other ships. There is, however, the further proviso that railroad ships shall not carry more than 50 per cent of their cargo in domestic trade between ports of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, my reason for saying that if this amendment is adopted in preference to the House provision, the benefits which the Pacific coast has expected to receive from the canal will have been neutralized and destroyed, is that, as has been demonstrated, not only on the Atlantic coast, but on the Pacific coast, if railroads are allowed to operate steamships in connection with the railroad upon competing waterways, it is absolutely impossible for any independent line to compete with them, and I desire in a very brief manner to point out why that is so. It is a very plain and simple proposition.

It is argued by Senators from New England—the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]—that nothing of evil is to be apprehended from the joint operation by railroad companies of steamship lines with their railroad lines, because it can be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I am heartily in favor of extending the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission in every direction in which it is practicable or possible to extend it, but we have all experienced the fact that regulation by the Government, whether through the Interstate Commerce Commission in the case of rate making, or through some other tribunal of the Government in the matter of other agencies which require governmental regulation, is difficult and frequently ineffective; that it is slow; and we have the testimony of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission themselves in this case that, in their opinion, delivered after an experience of 25 years of railroad regulation, in which these questions of joint operation of ships and railroad lines have constantly been before them, it will be ineffective and insufficient.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Washington whether he desires to conclude to-night, or would he prefer to go on in the morning?

Mr. POINDEXTER. While I do not desire to delay the Senate——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is about the time of adjournment. We are all tired.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If we are to go on in the morning, I will not occupy very much time, and I would prefer to have the Senate adjourn until morning.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send to the desk a proposed unanimous-consent agreement looking to the fixing of an hour for the taking of a vote upon this bill and all amendments pending and to be offered, which I will ask the Secretary to report.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Friday, August 9, 1912, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, etc.; and that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on said day, the Senate will proceed, without further debate, to vote upon any amendment that may be pending to the bill, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill itself—through the regular parliamentary stages—to its final disposition.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am anxious that it should be emphasized that we will vote on the amendments as soon as we can get to them to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I hope we can complete it before 5 o'clock. The reason I say this is that to me it is very unsatisfactory to have amendments proposed after the hour for closing of debate has arrived, because amendments may be offered the effect of which can not be readily grasped, and there is no opportunity for explanation.

Now, we meet at 10 o'clock to-morrow, and if we can proceed to vote on the amendments at once, as soon as debate on a particular amendment is through, so that we can vote on amendment after amendment and then on the bill itself as soon as possible, but not later than 5 o'clock, I will not offer any objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course Senators can offer their amendments whenever they please, but I shall do everything I can to conform to the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas. And I would state in that connection that it would be a great help to all the Senators if Senators who intend to propose amendments would have them in the Secretary's hands in the morning, and they could be read, notice given that they intended to offer them at the proper time, and then Senators would not be taken by surprise. Will the Secretary again report the proposed agreement?

The Secretary again read the proposed agreement.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Would the Senator be willing to add to it that speeches shall be confined to 10 minutes each?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should be more than willing.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think that has ever been done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If it could be agreed to, I mean.

Mr. SMOOT. And I do not think it would be proper.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the request for unanimous consent is put, I want to say that I shall ask unanimous consent or move to take up the bill immediately after the routine business is concluded to-morrow morning, so that we may have all the time there is.

Mr. BRISTOW. I suggest that that be incorporated in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I prefer it that way. Let the agreement be read as it will read if amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Friday, August 9, 1912, immediately upon the consideration of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill—

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is right.

The SECRETARY (reading):

(H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, etc.; and that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on said day the Senate will proceed, without further debate, to vote upon any amendment that may be pending to the bill, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill itself, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent for the adoption of the order just read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 9, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate August 8, 1912.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 8, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for the preservation of our lives, the activity of our minds, the excellency of our moral convictions, the lofty ideals of our religion, and we most fervently pray that we may heed these convictions and pursue these ideals until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. And Thine be the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the general deficiency bill be taken up.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the unfinished business, which is the general deficiency appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25970) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1912 and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned last Tuesday evening the matter that was pending was a motion for the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] withhold his motion for the previous question in order that I may submit an amendment and see whether it can be agreed to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withhold the motion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding as a new section the following:

"The Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to modify and extend the harbor lines in front of the city of Chicago in such manner as to permit park-extension work which may be desired by the municipal authorities, including the changing and widening of the southern entrance to the Chicago Harbor."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] reserves a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This does not involve any expense, but gives the War Department discretionary power to modify the harbor lines of the lake, as I understand.

Mr. MANN. That is what it does. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move now the previous question on the pending amendments and the bill to its final passage.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold for a moment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman suspend a moment in order to give me an opportunity to amend the antipass law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object to that.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I would like the gentleman to withhold, so that I can offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Colorado that it is now too late to offer an amendment, unless the order for the previous question is vacated.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I was on my feet, Mr. Speaker, asking the gentleman to withdraw his motion for the previous question when the Chair put the question. I was asking leave to have my amendment presented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not tell what the gentleman was doing down there. The Chair could not hear a word that was being said.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the previous question is ordered, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The question now is on the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the committee amendments? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no such demand, and the question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY FOR ALASKA.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Union Calendar the bill (H. R. 38) to create a legislative assembly for Alaska, to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of it, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Alaska legislative bill, and asks that the Senate amendments be disagreed to and that the House ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will announce the conferees on the part of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Mr. HOUSTON, and Mr. WEDEMEYER.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7409. An act to constitute a commission to investigate the purchase of American-grown tobacco by the Governments of foreign countries.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5817) granting to the county of Hill, in the State of Montana, the jail building and fixtures now upon the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation, in the State of Montana.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 346. Joint resolution to correct an error in an act entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war," approved June 19, 1912; and

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to direct the Secretary of State to issue invitations to foreign Governments to participate in the Fourth International Congress on School Hygiene.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HOWLAND, for three days, on account of death in his family.

To Mr. ROUSE, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. GUDGER, for six days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. WILSON of New York, indefinitely, on account of illness.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] calls up the conference report on the bill H. R. 18960, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

An act (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The conference report was read, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1150).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 42, 57, 58, 72, 73, 101, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 111, 120, 124, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 155, 170.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 43, 44, 46, 47, 49, 51, 53, 54, 55, 62, 63, 64, 67, 68, 70, 75, 76, 78, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 91, 93, 98, 99, 100, 108, 110, 112, 114, 118, 119, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 165, 166, 167, 168, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 179, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 45: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$600,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 48: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$1,217,866;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "the" where it occurs the first time in the amendment strike out the words "exhibition of animals"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 52: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$1,670,316"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 56: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$25,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 59: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$8,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 60: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$52,430"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 61: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$40,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 65: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$80,765"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 66: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$35,795"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 69: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 69, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$300,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 71: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "demonstrations" strike out the word "in" and insert the words "and for"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 74: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 74, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$125,000" and add thereto the following: "Provided, however, That the sum of $50,000 of this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used for the purchase of land and equipment and the construction of buildings necessary to establish, equip, and maintain an experimental farm in the northern section of the Great Plains area to demonstrate the kind and character of plants, shrubs, trees, berries, and vegetables best adapted to the climate and soil of the semiarid lands of the United States: Provided further, That the limitation in this act as to the cost of farm buildings shall not apply to this paragraph"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 77: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$1,658,080"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 79: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 79, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$2,323,580"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 85: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following: "That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed and required to select, classify, and segregate, as soon as practicable, all lands within the boundaries of national forests that may be opened to settlement and entry under the homestead laws applicable to the national forests, and the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated for the purposes aforesaid"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 86: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 86, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$35,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 87: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 87, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the amendment, after the word "forests," insert the following: "but it is not the intent of this provision to restrict the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to permit the free use of timber as provided in the act of June 4, 1897"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 88: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 88, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$170,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 89: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 89, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following: "And the Secretary of Agriculture shall investigate the best methods of distillation of Douglas fir and other northwestern species of fir and timber, and ascertain the yields of distillates of various species, and the refining and commercial use of the distillates"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 90: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$20,180"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 92: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$165,640"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 94: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 94, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$400,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 95: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following as a new paragraph:

"That an additional 10 per cent of all money received from the national forests during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, shall be available at the end thereof, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails within the national forests in the States from which such proceeds are derived; but the Secretary of Agriculture may, whenever practicable, in the construction and maintenance of such roads, secure the cooperation or aid of the proper State or Territorial authorities in the furtherance of any system of highways of which such roads may be made a part."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 96: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 96, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$3,107,285"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 97: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 97, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$5,343,045"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 102: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 102, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$968,940"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 109: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 109, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$75,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 113: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 113, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$30,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 115: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 115, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$328,750"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 116: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$672,340"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 117: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 117, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following as a new paragraph:

"For the establishment of a national game preserve to be known as the Wind Cave National Game Preserve, upon the land embraced within the boundaries of the Wind Cave National Park, in the State of South Dakota, for a permanent national range for a herd of buffalo to be presented to the United States by the American Bison Society, and for such other native American game animals as may be placed therein. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to acquire by purchase or condemnation such adjacent lands as may be necessary for the purpose of assuring an adequate, permanent water supply, and to inclose the said game preserve with a good and substantial fence and to erect thereon all necessary sheds and buildings for the proper care and maintenance of the said animals, $26,000, to be available until expended."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 121: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 121, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$45,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 122: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 122, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$166,300"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 123: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 123, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$191,400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 152: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 152, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$194,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 153: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 153, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$219,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 154: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 154, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by said amendment insert the following: "And the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to secure from the various branches of the department having authority to investigate such matters, reports relative to systems of marketing farm products, cooperative or otherwise, in practice in various sections of the United States, and of the demand for such products in various trade centers, and shall make such recommendations to Congress relative to further investigations of these questions and the dissemination of such information as he shall deem necessary"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 163: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 163, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 164: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 164, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$1,871,700"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 169: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 169, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$16,264,496"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 180: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 180, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum inserted by said amendment insert "$16,651,496"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN LAMB,
A. F. LEVER,
G. N. HAUGEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

HENRY E. BURNHAM,
F. E. WARREN,
J. H. BANKHEAD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18960) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the conference report, namely:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

The appropriations under this title consist entirely of salaries. The estimates provided for a total appropriation for these salaries amounting to $287,300.

The bill as reported to the House carried for salaries in the office of the Secretary $279,380.

The bill as it passed the House carried $278,930 and as it passed the Senate it carried $292,280—an increase of $13,350. Of this sum, $450 is accounted for by the restoration to the bill of certain increases stricken out upon points of order on the floor of the House, viz, one inspector $250, and one construction inspector $200; and the remaining $12,900 is due to transfers from lump-fund appropriations, slight increases in salaries, and readjustments in accordance with a supplemental estimate submitted by the Secretary too late to be considered by this committee in formulating the bill, but which have been carefully considered since, and which we believe to be just and necessary for efficiently carrying out the work of the department.

WEATHER BUREAU.

Amendments Nos. 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, to which the House agrees, restore to the bill language stricken out upon points of order on the floor of the House providing for increases in salaries as follows: Assistant chief of bureau, $250; four copyists or typewriters, $60 each; one assistant foreman, $200; one lithographer, $200; one engineer, $100; in all, $990.

Amendment No. 37, to which the House agrees, increases by $10,000 the amount appropriated by the House, and is to provide for the establishment of two additional weather stations.

Amendment No. 38, to which the House agrees, increases the appropriation by $1,000, and is necessary to provide fuel, light, furniture, stationery, etc., for the new stations authorized as above.

Amendment No. 39, to which the House agrees, increases the appropriation $6,000, and is necessary in order to provide instruments, etc., for the new stations authorized as above.

Amendment No. 40, to which the House agrees, increases the appropriation $1,000, and is made necessary because of the establishment of the new stations authorized as above.

Amendment No. 41, to which the House agrees, increases the appropriation $2,000, this being necessary because of the establishment of the new stations authorized as above.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Amendment No. 45, to which the House agrees, increases the appropriation $7,300. The amount asked for in the estimates was $611,800. The House appropriated the amount carried in the current law, viz, $592,700. The amendment as agreed to makes the sum appropriated $600,000, which is $11,800 below the estimates.

Amendment No. 46, to which the House agrees, restores to the bill language stricken out upon a point of order on the floor of the House, extending to renovated-butter factories certain sanitary provisions of the meat-inspection act. It carries no appropriation.

Amendment No. 47, to which the House agrees, increases by $4,700 the sum appropriated by the House, bringing the amount up to $52,180, which is the sum asked for in the estimates.

Amendment No. 49, to which the House agrees, restores to the bill language stricken out upon a point of order on the floor of the House authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to sell in open market or to exchange for other breeding animals or animal products, without the usual condemnation proceedings and public auction, such animals or animal products produced or purchased under act of Congress for the use of the bureau and no longer needed in the work of that bureau; and provides for the deposit of the proceeds in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. This amendment carries no appropriation.

Amendment No. 50, to which the House agrees, increases the appropriation for "Cooperative experiments in animal feeding and breeding" from $50,000 to $100,000—the additional amount to be used in the new work of experimentation in the breeding of horses for military purposes. It has been held by the House that—

The subject of improving the breed of horses, even with the improvement of the Cavalry as an object, belongs to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture (Vol. IV, sec. 4158, Hinds' Precedents)—

And it is believed the great importance of this matter fully warrants this appropriation. The provision inserted by the Senate authorizing "the exhibition of animals" has been stricken from the amendment.

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

Amendment No. 53, to which the House agrees, increases the salary of the chief clerk $250, and amendment No. 54, to which the House also agrees, provides for an additional clerk of class 1 ($1,200). The House believes both these increases are warranted by reason of long service and increasing responsibility of the chief clerk and the increasing work of this important bureau.

Amendment No. 56, to which the House agrees, increases the appropriation for investigations of plant diseases and pathological collections by $2,070, but still leaves the amount appropriated $4,500 below the estimates.

Amendment No. 59 relates to a proviso that not to exceed $12,000 of the amount appropriated for the ginning, handling, grading, baling, and wrapping of cotton, etc., may be used for the purchase of spinning machinery in order to conduct certain tests with cotton. This sum has been reduced to $8,000, and the House agrees to this amendment, as it appears that the Bureau of Plant Industry is now at a point in its investigations of the ginning, handling, and grading of cotton where it is absolutely necessary that accurate tests of the spinning value of different samples of cotton should be made.

Amendment No. 60, to which the House agrees, appropriates $52,430 for the collection, propagation, testing, and experimenting with seeds of interest to agriculture, including rare new seeds, etc., and amendment No. 61, to which the House also agrees, provides that $40,000 of this sum shall be used for the purchase and distribution of drought-resistant field seeds. This is an increase of $39,320 to provide for the new work indicated.

Amendment No. 65, to which the House agrees, increases by $5,000 the appropriation "for the investigation and improvement of grains" (cereals), and thus provides for the added work of "the study of cereal diseases."

Amendment No. 66, to which the House agrees, increases by $5,000 the sum appropriated for investigation and improvement of sugar-producing plants, including their utilization and culture.

Amendment No. 67, to which the House agrees, increases by $1,930 the sum appropriated for taxonomic investigations and study of the improvement of grazing lands and brings the appropriation up to the amount asked in the estimates.

Amendment No. 68, to which the House agrees, adds the words "and for farm demonstration work" to the item "To investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management, etc.," and amendment No. 69, to which the House also agrees, increases the appropriation for this purpose from $251,000 to $300,000.

Amendment No. 70, to which the House also agrees, adds to this item a proviso: "That of the amount hereby appropriated the sum of $10,000 may be used in the investigation and utilization of cacti and other dry-land plants as food for stock." The increase in the appropriation is deemed necessary because of the additional lines of work imposed by the new language.

Amendment No. 74, to which the House agrees, gives authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase land for a special experiment station in the northern section of the Great Plains area for the purpose of demonstrating the kind and character of trees, shrubs, berries, vegetables, etc., best adapted to the climatic and soil conditions of that region, and the appropriation for "Investigations and improvement of methods of crop production under semiarid or dry-land conditions" is increased by the sum of $55,000 for this purpose.

Amendment No. 75, to which the House agrees, restores to the bill language stricken out upon point of order on the floor of the House, as follows:

For studying methods of clearing off "logged-off" lands with a view to their utilization for agricultural and dairying purposes; for their irrigation; for testing powders in clearing them; and for the utilization of the by-products arising in the process of clearing, in cooperation with the States, companies, or individuals, or otherwise, $5,000.

Amendment No. 76, to which the House agrees, adds the words "western irrigation agriculture" to the item for "Investigations in connection with the utilization of lands reclaimed under the reclamation act"; but the amount appropriated is not increased.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS.

Amendment No. 78, to which the House agrees, merely adds a proviso authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to award contracts for printing the envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, etc., for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year. It has been shown conclusively that such authorized practice will result in a saving of at least $10,000 per annum.

FOREST SERVICE.

Amendment No. 80, to which the House agrees, increases the number of forest rangers at $1,200 each from 198 to 252; and amendment No. 81, to which the House also agrees, drops from the rolls 54 forest rangers at $1,100 each, the net result being that 54 forest rangers are promoted $100 each; a total increase of $5,400.

Amendment No. 83, to which the House agrees, provides:

That all of the military reservation of Fort Wingate, N. Mex., as described in Executive order of May 31, 1911 (No. 1367), shall become a part of the Zuni National Forest and shall so remain until said order shall be revoked, modified, or suspended by the President, but that the said lands shall remain subject to the unhampered use of the War Department for military purposes, and to insure such use the land shall not be subject to any form of appropriation or disposal under the land laws of the United States; but nothing is added to the appropriation by reason of this proviso.

Amendment No. 84, to which the House agrees, is explained as follows: Under existing laws each of the national forests has an appropriation which reads:

For salaries and field and station expenses, including the maintenance of nurseries, collecting seed, and planting, necessary for the use, maintenance, improvement, and protection of the national forests.

Then, after each established forest is enumerated, there follows a clause which reads:

Additional national forests to be created under section 11 of the act of March 1, 1911 (36 Stat. L., p. 963), $32,000; and amendment 84 adds to this clause the following language, which is inserted before the amount of the appropriation and does not change it:

And lands under contract for purchase or for the acquisition of which condemnation proceedings have been instituted for the purposes of said act.

Since the estimates were submitted to the House it has been learned that there is no legal authority for the protection of lands which have been contracted for purchase, but title to which has not yet passed to the Government, and it is deemed important for the Government to begin immediately the protection of lands which it contracts to purchase. The lands here referred to are those to be purchased under what is known as the Weeks Act.

Amendment No. 85, to which the House agrees, is a new paragraph, which provides:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed and required to select, classify, and segregate, as soon as practicable, all lands within the boundaries of national forests that may be opened to settlement and entry under the homestead laws applicable to the national forests, and the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated for the purpose aforesaid.

The purpose of this amendment is to expedite the classification and opening to entry of lands within the national forests.

Amendment No. 86, to which the House agrees, is a new paragraph, which provides:

For the expenditure under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture for survey and listing of lands within forest reserves chiefly valuable for agriculture and describing the same by metes and bounds, or otherwise, as required by the act of June 11, 1906, and the act of March 3, 1899, $35,000: Provided, however, That any such survey and the plat and field notes thereof paid for out of this appropriation shall be made by an employee of the Forest Service under the direction of the United States surveyor general, but no land listed under the act of June 11, 1906, shall pass from the forest until patent issues.

This is to relieve settlers of the cost of a survey when a tract has been entered on unsurveyed land.

Amendment No. 87, to which the House agrees, is a new paragraph, which provides:

That the Secretary of Agriculture, under such rules and regulations as he shall establish, is hereby authorized and directed to sell at actual cost to homestead settlers and farmers, for their domestic use, the mature, dead, and down timber in national forests, but it is not the intent of this provision to restrict the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to permit the free use of timber as provided in the act of June 4, 1897.

This is to permit the sale of timber, at cost, to settlers and farmers where the circumstances are such that the Secretary of Agriculture is not justified in authorizing its use free of cost.

Amendment No. 88, to which the House agrees, increases by $5,000 the appropriation "For investigations of methods of wood distillation, and for the preservative treatment of timber," etc.; and amendment No. 89, to which the House also agrees, adds to this paragraph a proviso that the Secretary of Agriculture shall investigate the best method of distillation of Douglas fir, etc., which accounts for the increase in the appropriation.

Amendment No. 90, to which the House agrees, increases by $1,760 the appropriation for experiments and investigations of range conditions, but this amount is still $5,000 below the estimates.

Amendment No. 91, to which the House agrees, adds the words "cones and nursery stock" to the material which may be purchased under the item for seeding and tree planting within national forests. Amendment No. 92, to which the House also agrees, increases the amount for this purpose by $15,640; and amendment No. 93, to which the House agrees, provides:

That the Secretary of Agriculture may procure such seed, cones, and nursery stock by open purchase without advertisements for proposals, whenever in his discretion such method is most economical and in the public interest, and when the cost thereof will not exceed $500.

It is shown that purchases of seeds and cones particularly are made very largely from mountaineers, settlers in the forests, Indians, and similar classes of labor. The purchases are necessarily restricted to people of these classes, as a rule, because they alone are familiar with the region and the work of seed collecting and are the only ones available who are able to supply the needs of the Government. Proposals for bids under such conditions are futile and often would involve delay which would greatly reduce the opportunities of the Government to secure the amount of seed required. Furthermore, in dealing with people of these classes in inaccessible regions, where mail facilities are very poor, it is extremely difficult to secure bids made out in proper form in compliance with the fiscal regulations of the department. Many of the people who furnish seeds and cones, in fact, particularly Indians who have been frequently employed in this work, can not write, and it is impossible to carry out the prescribed method of procedure in purchases.

Amendment No. 94, to which the House agrees, increases the appropriation for the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, telephone lines, etc., by $125,000, which is $100,000 below the estimates.

Amendment No. 95, to which the House agrees, is a new paragraph, as follows:

That an additional 10 per cent of all moneys received from such national forests during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, shall be available at the end thereof, to be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails within the national forests in the States from which such proceeds are derived; but the Secretary of Agriculture may, whenever practicable, in the construction and maintenance of such roads, secure the cooperation or aid of the proper State or Territorial authorities in the furtherance of any system of highways of which such roads may be made a part.

The object of this is to aid the counties in the construction of roads in national forests needed for development purposes.

BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY.

Amendment No. 98, to which the House agrees, restores to the bill language stricken out upon a point of order in the House and increases the salary of the chief food and drug inspector from $2,760 to $3,000.

BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY.

Amendments Nos. 108, 109, 110, to each of which the House agrees, all relate to the item "For investigations of insects affecting cereal and forage plants"; amendment No. 108 adds the words "including the alfalfa weevil"; amendment No. 109 increases the appropriation by $25,000; and amendment No. 110 increases the amount to be immediately available from $10,000 to $15,000. The added work accounts for the increase in the appropriation.

Amendments Nos. 112 and 113, to both of which the House agrees, relate to investigations of insects affecting truck crops. Amendment No. 112 adds the words "sugar beets," and amendment No. 113 increases the appropriation $6,000. This increase being accounted for by the added work.

Amendment No. 114, to which the House agrees, strikes out the proviso that no part of the appropriation for the investigation of the Mediterranean fly shall be used on the Atlantic seaboard.

BUREAU OF BIOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Amendment No. 117, to which the House agrees, is a new paragraph, which provides:

For the establishment of a national game preserve, to be known as the Wind Cave National Game Preserve, upon the lands embraced within the boundaries of the Wind Cave National Park, in the State of South Dakota, for a permanent national range for a herd of buffalo to be presented to the United States by the American Bison Society, and for such other native American game animals as may be placed therein, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to acquire by purchase or condemnation such other lands as may be necessary for the purpose of assuring an adequate, permanent water supply, and to inclose the said game preserve with a good and substantial fence, and to erect thereon all necessary sheds and buildings for the proper care and maintenance of the said animals—making $32,000 in all, which is to be available until expended.

The purposes of this item are fully explained in the item itself.

Amendment No. 118, to which the House agrees, adds to the item for investigating the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, etc., the following language (with an increase of $4,000 in the appropriation):

And for investigations and experiments in connection with rearing of fur-bearing animals, including mink and marten, $43,000, of which sum $3,000 shall be used for the destruction of ground squirrels on the national forests in California.

This brings the total to $43,000, which was the amount asked for in the estimates.

Amendment No. 121, to which the House agrees, is a new paragraph, which provides:

For the establishment of a winter game (elk) reserve in the State of Wyoming, which shall be located in that section of Wyoming lying south of the Yellowstone Park, and shall include not less than 2,000 acres in township 41 north, ranges 115 and 116 west.

This amendment appropriates $45,000 for this purpose, to be available until expended, and authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase such lands, with improvements, to erect necessary buildings and inclosures, and to incur other expenses necessary for the maintenance of the reserve.

DIVISION OF ACCOUNTS AND DISBURSEMENTS.

Amendments Nos. 125, 126, and 127, to all of which the House agrees, restore to the bill language stricken out upon points of order on the floor of the House, providing slight increases in the salaries of three officials, the aggregate increase being $700.

Amendment No. 128, to which the House agrees, restores to the bill language stricken out upon a point of order on the floor of the House, as follows:

Provided, That hereafter employees of the Division of Accounts and Disbursements may be detailed by the Secretary of Agriculture for accounting and disbursing work in any of the bureaus and offices of the department for duty in or out of the city of Washington, and employees of the bureaus and offices of the department may also be detailed to the Division of Accounts and Disbursements for duty in or out of the city of Washington, traveling expenses of employees so detailed to be paid from the appropriation of the bureau or office in connection with which such travel is performed.

This is simply for the purpose of detailing persons from the Division of Accounts to the various bureaus and divisions in cases of emergency, which details are very necessary from time to time. It adds nothing to the appropriation and changes no salaries, but adds materially to the efficiency and economy of the service.

DIVISION OF PUBLICATIONS.

Amendment No. 140, to which the House agrees, increases by $200 the salary of one assistant in document section.

Amendment No. 141, to which the House agrees, increases by $300 the salary of one foreman, Farmers' Bulletin distribution.

Amendment No. 142, to which the House agrees, provides for 1 clerk of class 3 in lieu of 1 clerk of class 2.

Amendment No. 143, to which the House agrees, provides for 1 additional clerk of class 1.

Amendment No. 144, to which the House agrees, strikes out 1 clerk at $1,000.

Amendment No. 145, to which the House agrees, provides for 5 additional clerks at $900 each.

Amendment No. 146, to which the House agrees, strikes out 4 clerks at $840 each.

Amendment No. 147, to which the House agrees, strikes out 1 skilled laborer at $720.

Amendment No. 148, to which the House agrees, provides for 1 assistant chief folder at $960.

Amendment No. 149, to which the House agrees, strikes out 1 folder at $900.

Amendment No. 150, to which the House agrees, provides for 1 skilled laborer at $1,100.

Amendment No. 151, to which the House agrees, strikes out 1 skilled laborer at $1,000.

These changes cause a total increase of $1,480 over the amount allowed by the House and are generally in accord with the purpose of the committee to increase the salaries of the lower-paid clerks.

BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Amendment No. 154, to which the House agrees, directs the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate systems of marketing farm products in various sections of the United States and make report to Congress on the results of such investigations. This amendment carries no appropriation.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

Amendment No. 159, to which the House agrees, restores to the bill language stricken out upon a point of order on the floor of the House, viz, a proviso as follows:

Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of Agriculture may purchase stationery, supplies, furniture, and miscellaneous materials from this appropriation and transfer the same at actual cost to the various bureaus, divisions, and offices of the Department of Agriculture in the city of Washington, reimbursement therefor to be made to this appropriation by said bureaus, divisions, and offices from their lump-fund appropriations by transfer settlements through the Treasury Department.

The practice of purchasing supplies in this way and transferring them to the various bureaus and offices was in vogue in this department for a number of years, but recently the Comptroller of the Treasury decided that in the absence of specific law such procedure was improper and suggested that it be discontinued. The provision in question will give the department the necessary authority to continue the practice, which was found exceedingly expeditious and economical, saving time and labor and obviating the necessity of handling countless small requisitions for supplies and auditing an equally large number of accounts covering such transactions. Certainly a private corporation would purchase its supplies in large quantity and have one general storeroom from which to distribute them to its various offices and branches.

OFFICE OF EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

Amendment No. 161, to which the House agrees, is a new provision under the item for irrigation investigations and provides as follows:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause a thorough investigation to be made and report to Congress at the opening of the next session upon the feasibility and the economy of irrigation by the reservoir system or plan in western Kansas and western Oklahoma.

This new provision does not increase the appropriation and contemplates investigations likely to result in much good in the territory mentioned.

Amendment No. 162, to which the House agrees, restores to the bill language stricken out upon a point of order on the floor of the House and merely provides for the employment of labor and for rents outside of the District of Columbia, under the item for drainage investigations.

Amendment No. 163, to which the House agrees, increases by $3,300 the appropriation for drainage investigations.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS.

Amendment No. 165, to which the House agrees, restores to the bill language stricken out upon a point of order on the floor of the House, and increases the amount by $10,000. The paragraph is as follows:

For conducting field experiments and various methods of road construction and maintenance, and investigations concerning various road materials and preparations; for investigating and developing equipment intended for the preparation and application of bituminous and other binders; for the purchase of materials and equipment; for the employment of assistants and labor; for the erection of buildings; such experimental work to be confined as nearly as possible to one point during the fiscal year, $30,000.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Amendment No. 172, to which the House agrees, allows to officials and employees of the Department of Agriculture when traveling on official business in the United States a per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence and all other traveling expenses. This language was stricken from the bill upon a point of order on the floor of the House, and this amendment merely restores it to the bill. It is believed that this method of per diem allowance is in all ways preferable to the present method of paying subsistence and traveling expenses, and will result in economy and efficiency.

Amendment No. 173, to which the House agrees, restores to the bill language stricken out upon a point of order on the floor of the House providing for reimbursement to officials and employees of the Department of Agriculture for moneys expended for street car fares when expended in the transaction of official business.

Amendment No. 174, to which the House agrees, reappropriates and makes available until expended so much of the maximum sums mentioned in section 3 of the act of March 1, 1911, entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, etc., for the fiscal years 1912 to 1915, inclusive, as shall remain unexpended at the close of each of said fiscal years."

This amendment applies solely to section 3 of the above-mentioned act of March 1, 1911, which section appropriates a total sum of $11,000,000 for the purposes named, said sum to become available in installments, as follows: $1,000,000 for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1910; and for each of the succeeding five fiscal years, up to and including the year ending June 30, 1915, the sum of $2,000,000.

It was clearly the intention of Congress to appropriate the sum of $11,000,000 and to have that entire sum expended for the purpose set forth in the act, but the Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled that, under the wording of said section 3, only such sums as are actually expended during each or any fiscal year are appropriated for that year and any unexpended balances are not available after the expiration of the fiscal year but lapse and go back to the Treasury.

Amendment No. 175, to which the House agrees, appropriates the sum of $10,000—and makes the appropriation immediately available—to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make an exhibit at the next annual meeting of the International Dry Land Congress, to be held at Lethbridge, Alberta, Canada, in October, 1912. The meetings of this congress have heretofore been held in the United States, but Canada is much interested in these problems, and, as the next congress is to be held in that Dominion, it is believed that this Government should be suitably represented.

Amendment No. 176, to which the House agrees, is as follows:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he hereby is, empowered to prepare from the several divisions of the Department of Agriculture an exhibit to be displayed at the Fifth National Corn Exposition, to be held in Columbia, S. C., from January 27 to February 9, 1913.

That the said exhibit shall be of such nature as the Secretary of Agriculture deems appropriate: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make such arrangements with the proper officers of the said exposition that the Department of Agriculture shall be at no expense for transportation of said exhibit to and from the exposition: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall also make such arrangements with the proper authorities of said exposition that there shall be no expense to the department for any breakage or damage that may occur to the exhibit, nor for the living expenses of such appointees as he may see fit to send to said exposition to demonstrate the exhibit sent.

This amendment carries no appropriation, and it will be noted that it expressly provides that there shall be no expense to the department for any breakage or damage or for living expenses of any of the department's employees.

Amendment No. 177, to which the House agrees, appropriates the sum of $80,000 to meet the emergency caused by the continuous spread of the chestnut-bark disease and makes $30,000 of this sum immediately available.

In regard to this amendment Dr. Galloway, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, states as follows:

Referring to the amendment providing for an appropriation of $80,000 to meet the emergency caused by the continued spread of the chestnut-bark disease, I beg to say that this matter has been under consideration by the experts of the bureau for the last seven or eight months.

Our officers have made careful estimates of the funds that would be required and believe that $80,000 would be needed to carry out the plan of cooperative effort with the several States which have already made large appropriations for the work.

The funds, if appropriated, will be expended in continuing the investigations which the bureau has been engaged upon on a rather limited scale since 1907, which have had for their object the discovery of methods to check the advance of the disease. The scope of these investigations will be increased and cooperative work will be taken up with all of the States which are making, or intend to make, any active campaign against the disease. One of the first things that will be undertaken will be to put the State workers in possession of all the knowledge that the bureau experts have gained from the investigations so far conducted, and correlate the work of the department and the State. The destruction of diseased trees, which will be one of the phases of the work, will be done by the State under the joint direction of the State and bureau officers.

Work can be taken up immediately with the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina.

The disease has spread so rapidly that efficient methods for its eradication or control have not yet been entirely worked out experimentally, and further laboratory work along these lines will be necessary. The experiments to date, however, indicate that general sanitary methods, such as the cutting out of advance infections, will prove efficient in restricting the disease to its present range.

In view of the immense value of the chestnut forests of the United States, estimated at from three hundred to four hundred millions, and the wide territory already affected by the disease, which has caused damage to the extent of at least $25,000,000, we believe that the amount proposed to be appropriated is none too large.

Amendment 178, to which the House agrees, appropriates the sum of $10,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the cultivation, acclimating, and development of the most nutritious and productive types of potatoes, and for the purpose of experimentation and development of American sugar-beet seed adapted to the irrigated lands of the arid West. Both projects are urgent and very important.

Amendment No. 179, to which the House agrees, provides as follows:

Hereafter so much of the act of May 26, 1910 (Thirty-sixth Statutes, p. 416), as requires the Secretary of Agriculture to transmit annually to the Secretary of the Treasury, for submission to Congress, detailed estimates for executive officers, clerks, and other employees in the various bureaus, offices, and divisions of the Department of Agriculture shall not apply to such employees in the meat-inspection service or employees engaged in the enforcement of the insecticide act of 1910.

Amendments not noted in this statement are either merely verbal or other minor corrections, necessary changes of totals and the like, and do not in any way alter the meaning of any of the original language or affect the amount of the appropriations.

The bill as passed the House carried	$15,933,366
As amended and passed the Senate it carried	18,111,976

A. F. LEVER,
G. N. HAUGEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the report.

The SPEAKER. All points of order on the report are reserved.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to make any further statement than the statement which will be read by my colleague if there is objection to any amendment, and if there is none I will move that the conference report be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. LAMB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express my dissatisfaction with the fact that the managers on the part of the House agreed to amendment No. 114, which strikes out the proviso that no part of the appropriation for the investigation of the Mediterranean fly shall be used on the Atlantic seaboard. In my judgment our managers have unwittingly allowed themselves to further the plans of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange.

The Mediterranean fly is an impalpable, invisible creature that is supposed to lurk beneath the skins of all the fruits which come into competition with the California fruit growers, but there is strong evidence that this fly lays its eggs in the fertile brains of California fruit growers rather than within these foreign fruits. When the appropriation of $35,000 was before the Committee of the Whole the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], at my request, inserted the proviso restricting the effect of this appropriation to the Pacific coast.

The Mediterranean fly is supposed to be exceedingly peripatetic. He started in the island of Malta, and after devastating and ruining that island moved to South Africa, destroyed that continent, moved to Hawaii and almost caused that island to sink beneath the waves; but nobody has had the temerity to suggest that there is any danger of the invasion of the Atlantic coast by this Mediterranean fly. Therefore, why was there any objection to limiting the effect of this appropriation to the Pacific coast? For some reason or other that was objectionable to the persons who were originally behind this appropriation. Now, I have received suggestions from time to time that agents of the California fruit growers, dissatisfied with the prospects of tariff reduction upon fruits which compete with those grown in that State, were attempting by other means to exclude the importations of fruit into the United States, and that they had been exceedingly busy with the Department of Agriculture, and particularly the Bureau of Entomology, from which the representations for this appropriation come.

I should hesitate to make any direct charges in this matter until I had had further opportunity to investigate the information that comes to me, but this move on the part of the Senate striking out this proviso, and certain provisions in the bill recently reported from the House Committee on Agriculture dealing with the importation of nursery stock, seem to me to be a part of a general scheme which, if put into effect, will make it even more impossible than the high tariff now makes it to import any fruit of any kind into the United States, excepting only those which do not compete with fruit grown upon our soil.

Mr. Speaker, I would not propose to hold up, if I could, a great conference report upon a single point of this nature; but the effect of this appropriation is to endure only for a year, and I serve notice, so far as I am able, upon the California fruit growers that there are some people in the United States who have the intention to investigate their activities in these matters.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I do not deem it necessary to defend the conferees on the part of the House, two of whom were Atlantic coast men; and inasmuch as there seems to be a controversy between the Atlantic coast and the Pacific, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] is incomprehensible and absurd. He wishes that this pest be permitted to invade the Atlantic seaboard, unrestricted by any quarantine regulations or any protective measures.

It is worse than foolish to belittle the danger that would come from the invasion of this fly. The Hawaiian Islands fruit crops are practically being destroyed. This fly lays its eggs in all fruits, not only citrous fruits but others. It has been found in beans, peas, cotton, and in some cases in bananas and pineapples, although it has not attacked the two latter in the Hawaiian Islands.

On the Pacific coast the State of California is waging a shotgun quarantine against the invasion of this pest. Time after time maggoty fruits full of the larvæ of this insect have been taken from passengers who were bringing them over in their baggage.

The State of California is, without direct legal authority, taking measures for its own protection. To imagine that resistance to an invasion of such a pestilence as this is due to the selfishness of fruit growers who desire to curtail the importing privileges of the constituents of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] is to see things at night. I can not understand a rational person having any objection to the elimination of any pestilence, whether it affects fruit or animals or human beings. It would be as ridiculous for the gentleman to protest against the prevention of the entrance of the bubonic plague on the Atlantic coast simply because the danger from it has usually been on the Pacific coast. At this time the danger seems on the Atlantic, and without taking up any more time of the House, I wish to say that from absolutely disinterested sources, and many of them, I have been urged over and over again to make the best fight I could here to secure such legislation as will protect this entire country from this pest. If the gentleman from New York wishes to have that and other pests permitted to land in his State, I think he will find that he differs with his own people and his own colleagues.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the bubonic plague, as well as many other plagues, has come to afflict the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to explain it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am surprised and almost startled at the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] that the Atlantic seaboard ought to be deprived of that measure of protection which is to be accorded the Pacific coast against a possible pestilence. When he says that no protest arises from the Atlantic seaboard or that no danger is feared from this pestilence, I can not agree with him, because when this bill was before the House I specifically made a protest against the Atlantic seaboard being excluded from the protection which it was proposed to afford to our friends on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Did the gentleman vote for the increased duty on lemons in the Payne-Aldrich law?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I voted for the Payne-Aldrich bill and for protection to the fruit growers of this country against foreign competition. I have nothing to take back on that score. But as to the danger from the Mediterranean fly, that is said to lurk on the Pacific coast and not on the Atlantic coast, I want to say that vessels are constantly receiving cargoes from the Pacific coast and from the islands of the Pacific by way of the Tehuantepec Railroad and across the Isthmus of Panama. These vessels carry the cargoes to the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and if they are in any way infected, it follows that one coast is in as much danger as the other. Surely a fly that may become a pestilence can start in a cargo that comes from an island of the Pacific or a port on the Pacific coast and eventually land in the congested centers of the East. Only last week the newspapers reported that an invasion of the bubonic plague was threatening both coasts. Infected rats were reported as escaping from a ship. They were caught and killed.

I have no desire to see a pestilence of any kind visit the Pacific coast, and much less to visit the Atlantic coast. What is fair for one section of the country is unquestionably fair for the other.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LAMB. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What evidence was there produced to identify the particular rats as rats that were supposed to have escaped from the ship?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We had expert information as to that. I do not know whether the particular rats had strawberry marks or not, but there was evidence of bacilli or germs which is supposed to convey the bubonic plague.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is aware of the fact that the bubonic plague seems to have been threatening the Atlantic seaboard ever since the Committee on Appropriations failed to give the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service as large an appropriation as it thought it should have. It had never been urged as dangerous to that part of the country before.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I doubt whether the gentleman from New York would want a surreptitious visit of this pest to the congested district he represents. I question whether he would want the Mediterranean fly to visit any of the suburbs of the community he represents. I question whether he would want any pestilence to visit his people, nor can I bring myself to believe the Representative of the great Empire State would stand on this floor and deny his own people in New York the protection he is willing to afford others on the Pacific coast.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no danger of that being done, and neither is there any danger of the gentleman from New York being stampeded by the preposterous demands of certain departments of the Government to coerce money that is not needed by the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, we have had two direct charges as to the animus behind this appropriation. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] intimates a great conspiracy, which proposes to deprive certain lemon shippers along the Atlantic seaboard of their rights, and he charges what is being done now by the Committee on Agriculture is being done in the interest of a combination that the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] earnestly defends. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] intimates that there is a conspiracy afoot which proposes that the Treasury of the United States shall be robbed by certain gentlemen of a scientific turn of mind who want to prevent the invasion of this pest. In matters of this kind I would rather take the judgment of the experts than of those who do not know the danger that confronts us. I do not know whether there is any danger, but if the Pacific coast is to be protected against pestilence, I want the Atlantic coast protected also.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested by a member of the minority, in whose judgment I have great confidence, that perhaps it would be well for the conferees to explain amendment No. 85 relating to the classification and segregation of lands within the national forests. Let me say that that was a Senate amendment, and the language employed in that paragraph did not meet with the approval of the House conferees, for the reason that they felt that it would afford an opportunity for a large number of acres of land—timberlands—to be transferred to the homestead. Therefore, as you will observe, the House receded with an amendment, as is stated in the report.

It is evident that this provision is highly beneficial and it helps to convert the agricultural lands in the national forests into homesteads more expeditiously than ever before. That is the purpose and aim of the amendment, to convert these lands into homesteads as rapidly as possible.

There is a small appropriation of $25,000 attached to make these surveys and thereby facilitate the transfer of these lands of the national forests suitable for agricultural purposes to the homestead. I think the amendment ought to meet, as I believe it will, with the approval of men on both sides of this Chamber, because it serves the great interests of the agricultural people of this country, and because it reduces the number of acres of land held under the national forests. I think the amendment is beneficial to everybody concerned, and I hope it will be satisfactory to the Members on both sides.

Mr. MANN. I would like to know if I have a correct understanding of this. The original Senate amendment would have opened all land in the national forest fit for agricultural purposes, regardless of whether it was more fit for agricultural purposes or for the raising of timber.

Mr. LAMB. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. The conferees first agreed on a proposition to throw open to settlement all lands that were chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes. I think that conference report was rejected.

Mr. LAMB. That was rejected in the Senate and everything was begun again de novo.

Mr. MANN. It looks to me as if the Senate, instead of getting nearer to the proposition, were a good deal further off from it by the conference report.

Mr. LAMB. I do not claim any credit for outgeneraling them.

Mr. MANN. This conference report does not throw open anything to homestead in a forest reserve that is not already thrown open in order to be classified and segregated.

Mr. LAMB. It is true in one sense, but it facilitates and hastens it by making surveys and giving the Secretary of Agriculture $25,000 with which to make the surveys.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but it does not throw open any new lands which would not have been thrown open under existing law.

Mr. HAUGEN. It leaves the law as it is to-day. The conferees on the part of the House objected to new legislation in this item as well as every other item. It leaves the law as it is to-day, but provides an appropriation of $25,000 to expedite the opening of the lands for settlement for those who want to take them.

Mr. LEGARE. I think the gentleman from Illinois has the print that uses the word "open."

Mr. MANN. I have both prints. The first conference report rejected by the Senate provided for the selection and classification and segregation of all lands in forest reserves chiefly valuable for agricultural purposes, and so forth, to be open to settlement. Now, this one provides for the classification of lands that may be opened to settlement and entry under the homestead laws applicable to forest reserves. It does not add any new land, except that which is now authorized to be opened to settlement.

Mr. LEVER. To be opened under the homestead law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the House conferees. The Senate rejected a conference report because it did not go far enough, and they have now accepted a conference report which does not go nearly as far as the one they rejected.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Illinois. Let me say to the gentleman that we had information that the adoption of the Senate proposition would have thrown into the hands of water-power companies, lumber companies, and the like of that, $67,000,000 of public property.

Mr. MANN. The original Senate amendment would have destroyed the national forests, which would not have been a very good thing to do.

Mr. LEVER. That is true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, Senate amendment No. 74 struck out an appropriation of $70,000 and inserted $80,000. The House has receded from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and compromised this difference between $70,000 and $80,000 by agreeing to an amendment appropriating $125,000. It provides for the establishment of an experimental farm, for the purchase of land, and equipment and construction of buildings, and takes away all limit which now is fixed by law upon the cost of buildings, and puts no limit at all upon the cost of this station eventually. As the conferees have no authority to make any such agreement, I should be pleased to have some explanation of it.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, that provision is a combination of two amendments. This proposition to create a station out in North Dakota was the subject of contention between the conferees of the Senate and the House for seven or eight days, the House conferees insisting that it was establishing a precedent that we did not feel authorized in doing. But after the Senate had yielded on some other propositions we finally, at the very last hour, agreed to this proposition as a compromise. You gentlemen who have been on conference committees know that these propositions between the conferees of the two Houses are always subject to compromise, and this was the best compromise under all of the circumstances that your House conferees could secure. It was represented to us that that country on the other side of the Missouri River had received very little in the way of benefits that come to the agricultural people; that they were in a land without trees or shrubs adapted to their locality; that the establishment of this station would help those people in the semiarid area of the Northwest to a degree; and, finally, under protest, as I have said, we agreed to this, and instead of putting it in a separate item we turned back to this page on which you find this amendment and added to it the $50,000 for the establishment of this experiment station there, to give this relief to those people who were sadly in need of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then this compromise includes the adjustment that was made on Senate amendment No. 73?

Mr. LAMB. Yes; that is the way it was. It is a combination of two amendments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish also to inquire of the gentleman the reason for the agreement to the establishment of two game reserves, amendments Nos. 117 and 121. One hundred and seventeen appropriates $26,000, I think the agreement is, to make the Wind Cave National Park, in South Dakota, for which the House in the sundry civil appropriation bill declined to make any provision, after investigation was made, a game reserve for a herd of buffalo. Amendment No. 121 is for the establishment of a winter game reserve in the State of Wyoming, and appropriates $45,000 to erect the necessary buildings and inclosures.

Mr. Speaker, in the State of Wyoming there is located the Yellowstone National Park, comprising an area, if I recall correctly, of about 1,750,000 acres of land. In addition to that, on three sides of the Yellowstone Park are large areas of the public domain, converted into national forest reserves. There is continual complaint from Representatives from the western country about the segregation of large areas of land, making them unavailable for settlement. In the Yellowstone Park at present there are a number of buffalo. It would seem somewhat extraordinary that anybody in that section of the country should be anxious to have additional land segregated for this purpose. I have very little sympathy with those from the more remote section of the country who have been urging these additional segregations for this specific purpose. Why could not all of these wild animals be placed either in the Yellowstone National Park or in some of the forest reserves in Wyoming, or in some of the adjacent States?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, in one instance disease would break out and kill them all. The people there made a very strong statement about that proposition and about the other, that the elk are being destroyed by starvation in winter. Something has to be done to preserve the elk, not only for that country, but for the whole country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They could have been provided for in some of the public domains now utilized for that purpose, could they not?

Mr. LAMB. The gentleman has no idea how many there are. You would have to turn in an army to kill them if you are going to destroy them. They come and eat everything the farmer has. You have to do one of two things—feed them or destroy them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know the South Dakota proposition. That is to permit a gentleman who became interested in the perpetuation of the big game in the United States and accumulated a very considerable number of buffalo, who is now weary of the burden of maintaining them, to shift that burden to the United States.

Mr. LAMB. He gives them away. People do not go to the trouble often of accumulating property and giving it away.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, yes. If the gentleman from Virginia and myself had a herd of elephants we would be very glad to give them to the United States Government. I simply wish to emphasize this fact, that those gentlemen from the western part of the country who are so vociferous in their denunciations of the attitude of the people of the United States when public lands are segregated for some beneficial purpose for the people of the United States, should not be so ready to complain when they not only acquiesce, but when they urge segregation of the public domain for the purpose of the character indicated in these amendments. I shall withdraw the points or order against the report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice in this Senate amendment with reference to winter game preserves, that it reads for the establishment of a winter game preserve with the words "elk" in parentheses, inserted between the word "game" and the word "preserves." Does that mean that this is for a winter game preserve for all kinds of game to which elk may be admitted, or is it confined to elk. Would it permit also the introduction of moose?

Mr. LAMB. It is to confine the elk, I will say; I do not think the bull moose will be allowed in it.

Mr. MANN. This only puts elk in parentheses?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and the gentleman would like to put the moose in parentheses.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman from New York will find they will have to put the moose in something tighter than parentheses.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We will have too many people to kill them off.

Mr. MANN. Not as many on our side as on the gentleman's side.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 24023, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1132).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendments numbered 511, 512, 513, and 514: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 511, 512, 513, and 514, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the entire text of the amended section insert the following:

"That the Commerce Court created and established by the act entitled 'An act to create a Commerce Court and to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended and for other purposes,' approved June 18, 1910, be and the same hereby is abolished and the jurisdiction vested in said Commerce Court by said act is hereby transferred to and vested in the several district courts of the United States.

"All cases pending and undisposed of in said Commerce Court are hereby transferred to and shall be deemed pending in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose, and the venue of all suits and proceedings hereafter brought by or against the Interstate Commerce Commission to enforce, set aside or modify the decrees and orders of the commission shall be in the district court of the judicial district in which the cause of action in the first instance arose.

"The venue in suits brought to enforce an order for the payment of money shall be in the district court of the judicial district in which the complainant resides. The procedure in the district court in respect to cases of which jurisdiction is conferred upon them by this act shall be the same as that heretofore prevailing in the said Commerce Court and the right of appeal from the district courts in such cases shall be the same as the right of appeal heretofore prevailing under existing law from the Commerce Court. No interlocutory injunction suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of any order made or entered by the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be issued or granted by any justice of the Supreme Court, or by any district court of the United States, or by any judge thereof, or by any circuit judge acting as district judge, unless the application for the same shall be presented to a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, or to a circuit or district judge, and shall be heard and determined by three judges, of whom at least one shall be a justice of the Supreme Court, or a circuit judge, and the other two may be either circuit or district judges, and unless a majority of said three judges shall concur in granting such application. When such application as aforesaid is presented to a justice of the Supreme Court, or to a judge, he shall immediately call to his assistance to hear and determine the application two other judges: Provided, however, That one of such three judges shall be a justice of the Supreme Court, or a circuit judge. Said application shall not be heard or determined before at least five days' notice of the hearing has been given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the Attorney General of the United States, and to such other persons as may be defendants in the suit: Provided, That if of opinion that irreparable loss or damage would result to the complainant unless a temporary restraining order is granted, any justice of the Supreme Court, or any circuit or district judge, may grant such temporary restraining order at any time before such hearing and determination of the application for an interlocutory injunction, but such temporary restraining order shall remain in force only until the hearing and determination of the application for an interlocutory injunction upon notice as aforesaid. The hearing upon such application for an interlocutory injunction shall be given precedence, and shall be in every way expedited and be assigned for a hearing at the earliest practicable day after the expiration of the notice hereinbefore provided for. An appeal may be taken direct to the Supreme Court of the United States from the order granting or denying, after notice and hearing, an interlocutory injunction in such case; and upon the final hearing of any suit brought to annul, enjoin, or restrain any order of said commission the same requirement as to judges and the same procedure as to appeal shall apply. The provisions of this section shall also apply to the issuing and granting of interlocutory injunctions suspending or restraining the enforcement, operation, or execution of orders made by any administrative board or commission created by and acting under the statute of a State. That in such case the notice required shall be served upon the defendants in the case, and upon the attorney general of the State. All cases pending in the Commerce Court at the date of the passage of this act shall be transferred forthwith to said district courts. Each of said cases and all the records, papers, and proceedings shall be transferred to the district court wherein it might have been filed at the time it was filed in the Commerce Court if this act had then been in effect, and if it might have been filed in any one of two or more district courts it shall be transferred to that one of said district courts which may be designated by the petitioner or petitioners in said case, or, upon failure of said petitioners to act in the premises within 10 days after the passage of this act, to such one of said district courts as may be designated by the judges of the Commerce Court. The judges of the Commerce Court shall have authority, and are hereby directed, to make any and all orders and to take any other action necessary to transfer as aforesaid the cases and all the records, papers, and proceedings then pending in the Commerce Court to said district courts."

And the Senate agree to the same.

On amendments Nos. 333, 334, 335, and 336: Strikes out the proposed increase in the salaries of the chief clerks of the Bureaus of Medicine and Surgery and Yards and Docks, respectively, from $2,000 to $2,200.

On amendments Nos. 337, 338, and 339: Appropriates $50,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $40,000, as proposed by the House, for additional services in the Bureau of Yards and Docks, to be paid from the various appropriations and allotments under that bureau.

On amendment No. 340: Increases the amount that may be expended for street-car tickets from $100 to $250 for the Navy Department.

On amendments Nos. 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, and 358, relating to the office of the Secretary of the Interior: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, for a confidential clerk to the Secretary at $1,800, 1 additional clerk at $1,800, and 1 additional clerk at $1,400; provides for 1 assistant multigraph operator at $720 and 1 additional telephone switchboard operator at $720; strikes out the proposed increase in the salary of 1 plumber from $900 to $1,100 and 1 electrician from $1,000 to $1,200; provides for 40 watchmen for the Interior Department Building, instead of 30, as proposed by the House, and 20 watchmen, instead of 15, as proposed by the House, for the old Post Office Building; strikes out the proposed increase in the salaries of 1 assistant attorney from $3,000 to $3,500 and 1 from $2,500 to $2,750; increases the per diem allowances to inspectors of the Interior Department from $3 to $4 each.

On amendments Nos. 359, 360, 361, 362, and 363, relating to the General Land Office: Increases the salary of the chief clerk from $2,500 to $2,750, as proposed by the Senate; provides for a chief of division at $2,400, as proposed by the House, instead of $2,750, as proposed by the Senate; and provides for 10 additional messenger boys at $600 each and 6 at $480 each, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 364 and 365: Appropriates $3,300, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $2,000, as proposed by the House, for separate State and Territorial maps.

On amendments Nos. 366, 367, and 368, relating to the Indian Office: Strikes out the increase in salaries of the first assistant commissioner from $3,500 to $3,750 and of the second assistant commissioner from $2,250 to $3,000.

On amendment No. 369: Strikes out the salary of the Second Deputy Commissioner of Pensions at $3,600, proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 370, 371, 372, and 373, relating to the Pension Office: Places the engineer and two firemen under the control of the chief clerk of the Interior Department.

On amendments Nos. 374, 375, 376, 377, and 378, relating to the Patent Office: Strikes out all of the increases in force, proposed by the Senate, and inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, to extend the investigation of questions of public use or sale of inventions to other questions arising in connection with applications for patent.

On amendments Nos. 380, 381, 382, and 383, relating to the contingent expenses of the Interior Department: Increases the amount that may be expended for street-car tickets for the Interior Department from $100 to $250; provides for traveling expenses; and strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, authorizing purchase of furniture for the Bureau of Mines to be used at the Pittsburgh Experiment Station.

On amendment No. 384: Strikes out the provision, proposed by the Senate, authorizing the use of appropriations for stationery and contingent expenses of the Interior Department for purchase and distribution of supplies for subordinate offices and Indian schools.

On amendment No. 385: Strikes out the proposed increase from $1,000 to $2,000 for books for the Interior Department.

On amendments Nos. 386 and 387: Appropriates $10,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $7,500, as proposed by the House, for rent of building for the Bureau of Mines.

On amendments Nos. 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, and 405, relating to surveyors general and their clerks: Appropriates for the salary of the surveyor general of Arizona and New Mexico at $3,000 each, as proposed by the Senate, and, in addition to the amounts provided by the House for clerks in the offices of the surveyors general, increases the amounts for Arizona from $15,500 to $16,000, for Idaho from $15,000 to $16,000, for Nevada from $7,000 to $8,000, for Utah from $12,000 to $14,000, for Wyoming from $15,000 to $17,000; continues the provision for the surveyor general's office in South Dakota, as proposed by the Senate, except the amount for clerks therein is reduced from $5,000 to $4,000; and increases the amount for contingent expenses in the surveyor general's office in Wyoming from $1,000 to $1,200.

On amendment No. 406: Increases the amount that may be used for street-car tickets for the Post Office Department from $100 to $200.

On amendments Nos. 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, and 429, relating to the office of the Attorney General: Provides for 1 Assistant Attorney General and 1 additional attorney at $5,000 each, 1 additional attorney at $2,500, 1 additional clerk at $1,400, 1 additional clerk at $1,200, and 1 additional clerk at $1,000 and 1 at $900; strikes out the provision for an additional attorney at $4,000, 1 law clerk at $2,500, 1 assistant superintendent of prisons at $2,000, 4 clerks at $2,000 each instead of $1,800 each, clerk in charge of stenographic division at $1,600, and 2 additional messengers at $840 each; restores to the bill the provision stricken out by the Senate requiring the administrative audit of expenditures of the Department of Justice to be made in the Division of Accounts; increases the amount that may be used for street-car tickets from $50 to $200; and increases the amount for rent of buildings from $31,580.40 to $32,200.

On amendments Nos. 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, and 439: Strikes out all of the increases proposed by the Senate in the office of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

On amendments Nos. 440 and 465: Transposes the appropriation of $60,000 to promote and develop the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States from a place in the bill following the Bureau of Corporations to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce.

On amendments Nos. 441, 442, and 443, relating to the Bureau of Labor: Strikes out the proposed increase from $3,000 to $3,250 in the salary of the chief statistician and limits to not exceeding $8 per day the compensation of persons employed from a lump appropriation under the bureau.

On amendments Nos. 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, and 449: Appropriates for the salaries in the Census Office, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 450 and 451, relating to appointments in the Census Office: Restores to the bill the provision, proposed by the House, requiring the Civil Service Commission to certify for appointment in the Census Office those who have had at least one year's experience in census work and strikes out of the bill the provision relating to such certifications inserted by the Senate; and with reference to temporary clerks, requires, as proposed by the Senate, that the employments shall be made from among those of the Thirteenth Census force.

On amendments Nos. 452, 453, and 454: Limits the pay of 5 special agents under the Census Office to not exceeding $8 per day each; increases the amount that may be expended for street-car tickets from $50 to $200; and appropriates $15,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $20,000, as proposed by the Senate, for contingent expenses of the Census Office.

On amendments Nos. 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, and 464, relating to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce: Substitutes the language proposed by the Senate instead of that proposed by the House consolidating the Bureau of Manufactures and the Bureau of Statistics in the Department of Commerce and Labor; restores the provision proposed by the House requiring investigations as to the comparative cost of living and the kind of living; strikes out the provision proposed by the Senate requiring that the chief of the bureaus shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; provides for a chief clerk at $2,250, as proposed by the Senate; and strikes out the additions of 1 chief of division of compilation at $2,000, 2 clerks at $1,600, 1 clerk at $1,400, and 1 clerk at $1,200, and the appropriation of $4,000 for payment of services of experts.

On amendment No. 466: Provides for janitor service under contingent expenses of the Steamboat-Inspection Service.

On amendments Nos. 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, and 472, relating to the Bureau of Navigation, Department of Commerce and Labor: Strikes out the increases in the force to the bureau, proposed by the Senate; provides for the salaries of shipping commissioners at places as proposed by the Senate, instead of the places proposed by the House; appropriates $35,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $37,000, as proposed by the Senate, for clerk hire in the offices of the shipping commissioners, and $1,000, proposed by the Senate, instead of $500, as proposed by the House, for tools and appliances for the measurement of vessels and counting of passengers.

On amendments Nos. 473, 474, 475, 476, and 477: Strikes out the increase, proposed by the Senate, in the force of the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization and in the Division of Naturalization.

On amendments Nos. 478, 479, and 480, relating to the Bureau of Standards: Provides for a physicist qualified in optics at $3,600 instead of $4,000, as proposed by the Senate, and increases the amount that may be expended for street-car tickets from $50 to $100.

On amendment No. 481: Appropriates for the salaries in the Children's Bureau, as proposed by the Senate, and authorized by the act of April 9, 1912.

On amendments Nos. 482, 483, and 484: Increases the amount that may be expended for street-car tickets in the Department of Commerce and Labor from $100 to $300, authorizes certain specific transfers from appropriations for bureaus under the Department of Commerce and Labor to the appropriations for contingent expenses in that department, and appropriates $50,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $55,000, proposed by the Senate, for rent of buildings.

On amendments Nos. 485, 486, and 487: Restores to the bill the provision proposed by the House prohibiting further appointments of circuit judges until the whole number thereof shall be reduced from 34 to 29 and strikes out of the bill the provision proposed by the Senate abolishing, in effect, 5 circuit judges.

On amendments Nos. 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, and 500, relating to judicial expenses: Makes the appropriation for retired judges also applicable to justices; strikes out the proposed increase in the salaries of the stenographers of the Court of Appeals, District of Columbia, from $1,200 to $1,500 each; inserts provisions requiring the clerks of the Court of Appeals and of the Supreme Court, District of Columbia, to deposit one-half their fees to the credit of the District of Columbia; strikes out the appropriation of $3,000 for salary of the clerk of the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois; makes the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses of the Court of Customs Appeals available for supplies and other specified purposes; strikes out the proposed increase in the salaries of the bailiffs from $1,500 to $1,800 and of 1 clerk from $1,200 to $1,500 of the Court of Claims; and makes the appropriation for contingent expenses of that court available for repairs to bicycles.

On amendment No. 501: Inserts a substitute for the provision, proposed by the Senate, limiting and restricting the use of lump appropriations for pay of personal services at compensation in excess of that paid for similar services during 1912 or to pay persons employed at specific salaries greater than such specific salaries.

On amendment No. 502: Strikes out of the bill, as proposed by the House, section 4, prohibiting the filling of vacancies occurring in the classified service of the departments at Washington.

On amendments Nos. 503 and 504: Restores to the bill section 5, proposed by the House, amended so as to extend the proposed tenure of office of persons in the classified service of the departments at Washington to seven years instead of five years; terminates the services of those heretofore employed within one year after they shall have served seven more years, and inserts as section 4 the provision, proposed by the Senate, establishing a system of efficiency ratings in the classified service in the departments at Washington.

On amendments Nos. 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, and 515: Restores to the bill section 9, stricken out by the Senate, requiring that publications of the Government for public distribution shall be mailed from the Government Printing Office, amended by providing that the section shall not apply to orders, instructions, directions, notices, or circulars of information printed for and used by the departments, or to public documents distributed by Senators and Members of the House, or to the folding rooms and document rooms of the Senate and House.

On amendments Nos. 511, 512, 513, and 514: Inserts a substitute for section 10 of the bill as it passed the House abolishing the Commerce Court, which substitute is set out in full in the accompanying conference report.

J. T. JOHNSON,
A. S. BURLESON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I hope I may be permitted to proceed without interruption until I explain the principal items in the report. At the conclusion of the explanation, if I have not touched upon any question in the mind of any gentleman, I shall be pleased to answer any question that may be asked me. This bill came back from the Senate with 515 amendments. After several days spent in conference the conferees came to a complete agreement upon all the amendments. The Senate yielded on amendments carrying $336,000; the House yielded on amendments carrying $357,000. The Senate yielded on items that had been stricken from the House bill amounting to $44,000. Thirty-five thousand dollars of this amount is to pay circuit judges which the Senate undertook to legislate out of office. The first 86 amendments to the House bill pertain to the Senate. The Senate has contended during the last quarter of a century, I am told, that it has a right, without question from the House of Representatives, to provide for such employees as it deems proper for its own comfort and for its own convenience.

I believe that the House of Representatives has never conceded that proposition, but as a matter of practical legislation they have generally yielded to the amendments that carried it into effect. We have yielded with some reluctance to practically all the amendments that related to the Senate. We have succeeded in getting the Senate to reduce its appropriations by $27,500. We further secured what I might call a gentleman's agreement that certain items of expenses to which we objected would not again be found in the legislative bill. On the amendment by which the Senate proposed to transfer the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds to the House and the Senate, the Senate yielded. As gentlemen know, Mr. Woods is under the Secretary of the Interior and the employees under Mr. Woods are in the classified service. If this force were transferred to the House and the Senate—as the Capitol police are now—they would become subjects of patronage. We prefer to let them remain in the classified service. In this connection I may say we earnestly insisted on reducing the number of Capitol police from 70 to 37, but the Senate insisted that it would never yield, and we were compelled to yield on that amendment. The first item in the bill, after passing from the House and the Senate, is the Congressional Library. The Senate increased the salaries of four employees in the general reading room. I know that all those cases were particularly meritorious, and the House yielded to the Senate. We also increased the force in the copyright office, it being represented that the work of that office is rapidly increasing, and the bill as it passed the House gave the same force for the current fiscal year that we gave for the last fiscal year. The Senate increased the force for the Civil Service Commission, and on part of this amendment the House conferees yielded. We had not increased the force in the Civil Service Commission, because the bill as we made it up contemplated that during this fiscal year no vacancies in the classified service should be filled. Believing that the vacancies would not be filled during the year, we felt that the force they had in 1912 would be amply sufficient for the force in 1913.

When the bill was before the House the Bureau of Manufactures and Bureau of Statistics were consolidated into the Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Commerce, and the Bureau of Trade Relations in the State Department was eliminated. The Senate restored to the bill the item for the Bureau of Trade Relations in the State Department, and they were particularly insistent that this should remain in the bill and we compromised with them by allowing the Bureau of Trade Relations in the State Department, but we insisted upon striking out something more than $30,000, a large proportion of which was for contingent matters. It is not good legislation to encourage unforeseen emergencies by providing lump-sum appropriations. We have placed in this bill a provision which will result in great saving to the Government.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the gentleman will allow me to ask at that point, before he passes from it——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I have asked that I be permitted to finish this statement before any questions were asked.

Mr. AUSTIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I did not know that he had requested not to be interrupted during his preliminary statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. We have inserted in this bill a provision that hereafter the Dockery law shall be observed in auditing accounts in the departments, and we believe that it will result in great saving to the Government. In the War Department gentlemen will remember that the original House bill provided for an arbitrary cut of 10 per cent of the clerical force of that department. That arbitrary cut was made because the Chief of Staff appeared before the committee and stated that that force was too large and that the clerical work was far in excess of what it ought to be. The Senate struck out that provision. In conference we agreed upon another provision very much less drastic in its terms, and yet, I think, beneficial in its results. We provide that no vacancies occurring in the War Department in the clerical force shall be filled until the whole number of vacancies shall equal 5 per cent of the entire force, and that thereafter those places shall be kept vacant. In that way, while we have not gone as far as the original bill contemplated, we have provided for a reduction of 5 per cent, but without legislating anybody out of office, simply by leaving the vacancies until the whole number of vacancies shall equal 5 per cent.

I may say that there are a great number of amendments in that same connection that we agreed to. The House had largely reduced the number of watchmen around the public buildings throughout the city. The Senate restored all of those. It was brought to the attention of the conferees that most of the watchmen around the buildings are old men; that the places are now all filled, and to adopt the House provision would have resulted in legislating them out of office; and in the circumstances the House conferees yielded. I believe that we ought to have had a provision something like the provision with respect to similar positions in the War Department, to the effect that these vacancies should not be filled; but, unfortunately, we have not been able to get that.

The Secretary of the Treasury had readjusted the force in all of the subtreasuries throughout the United States. The House passed the bill in some cases—not many—reducing salaries of persons who had been in these places for a long time. When the bill went to the Senate all of these salaries were restored, although some of them were in excess of the estimates. But as the whole amount involved in all the changes in the subtreasuries of the United States was only about $10,000, the House yielded upon practically all of the Senate amendments touching the subtreasuries, and even after yielding upon all of these amendments the subtreasuries will be conducted during the current year for many thousand dollars less than they have been costing hitherto.

In regard to the Census, the House provided that a number of people who are necessary to complete the work of the Thirteenth Census should be secured through the civil service. The Senate struck out those provisions and provided that these employees should be employed outside of the civil service, from those who have had census experience. In other words, the Senate made it a matter of patronage and the House made it a matter of civil-service employment. There were two sets of clerks provided for in the Census, and, as often happens in conference committees, the House yielded on one and the Senate yielded on the other. The permanent clerks are to be taken in through the civil service. But we agreed to the Senate amendment that such clerks as will be employed in the Census for this fiscal year only shall be selected from those having Census experience.

We allowed all the amendments on the shipping matters. The Senate yielded on a great many amendments to the bill, and we thought under the circumstances that we ought to yield on these.

This bill as it comes from conference carries $1,969,618.69 less than was appropriated for the last fiscal year. This is not a large saving, but when a train is moving with great momentum, it is something to stop it. Appropriations have been increasing with such regularity during the last 15 years that the committee deserves some credit for having withstood the pressure for an increase over last year, even if we have not succeeded in turning it back very far the other way.

There are only two more items that I wish to explain, unless some questions shall be asked. There is no difference between the two Houses as to the abolition of the Commerce Court. The House, however, believed that the circuit judges were appointed during good behavior. They are entitled to hold their offices during good behavior. They are not specifically judges of the Commerce Court, but they are circuit judges of the United States, designated for the time being to hold that court. So the House abolished the court, but appropriated for the judges, so that the Chief Justice may assign those gentlemen in such portions of the United States to hold courts as the work of the Department of Justice may require.

When the bill reached the Senate, the Senate agreed to the abolition of the court, but it undertook specifically to legislate out of office five circuit judges appointed under the act of 1910. I shall not undertake to enter upon the doubtful field of constitutional law, because it does raise a question of constitutionality. But even conceding the right of Congress which created the courts and created the judges to destroy them—the power that can make can destroy, ordinarily—conceding that power, we have believed that at least it was a question of doubtful propriety whether we ought to undertake to legislate these men out of office. We insisted upon that position, and the Senate yielded.

The only other matter is in regard to the civil service. As the bill passed the House it provided for a five-year tenure of office. As the bill came from conference it provided for a seven-year tenure. I shall not now discuss that feature.

I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman in regard to his explanation of the action of the House and Senate concerning the appropriation for the State Department in connection with the Bureau of Foreign Trade Relations, where a reduction of $30,000 was made. Does that in any way embarrass the administration of that bureau of the State Department?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; because $20,340 of the amount was a lump-sum appropriation for unforeseen contingencies. Seven thousand five hundred dollars was for an office which was designated as that of the resident consular officer, a position held by a Mr. Dawson, who recently died. The place was made for him, and it has not been filled. The remaining amount is accounted for by simply a reduction in the number of clerks, the Senate having overlooked the fact, in putting this amendment into the bill, that the House had increased the clerical force of the State Department when the bill left the House; and when that was called to their attention they took out the clerks they had put in. I do not think there will be the slightest embarrassment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then this amendment as it was agreed upon meets the approval of the State Department?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I can not say as to that, but it meets with the approval of the friends of the State Department who have talked to me about it, if I may use that expression.

Mr. AUSTIN. The State Department has made no particular complaint about this?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. No; not to me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman explain just what changes were made in the appropriation for the State Department in this conference report from the provisions in the bill as it originally passed the House?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not catch his question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to have the gentleman state for my information what changes were made by the conference report over the bill as it passed the House in reference to the State Department.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The only change was this: When we consolidated the Bureau of Manufactures and the Bureau of Statistics in the Department of Commerce and Labor we eliminated from the bill what was known as the Bureau of Trade Relations in the State Department. The Senate restored that item to the bill, and the House conferees have yielded, so that the Bureau of Trade Relations in the State Department remains.

The only reduction that we made in the appropriation was that we cut out $20,340 for unforeseen contingencies, three or four clerks that they readily conceded ought to come out when the matter was called to their attention, and one place that was vacant, the occupant having died and the place not having been filled.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I was not speaking of the reductions made by the conference report. I was speaking of the increases over the House bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The increases were probably something less than $100,000 for that bureau, and as the bill passes, it takes out a little over $30,000 of that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of what was put on by the Senate?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; but the bureau is intact.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The bureau is intact, and you have restored the position of counselor for the department.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that of the increases made by the Senate the only officer eliminated was the resident diplomatic agent.

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman will allow me, I think, inadvertently, he does not state the exact fact, because I do not think these officers who were reinstated by the Senate belong to the Bureau of Trade Relations. The counselor, for instance, does not belong to the Bureau of Trade Relations, and the heads of the far eastern and near eastern divisions, and so forth, are not in the Bureau of Trade Relations; but perhaps that is all immaterial.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. They are all included in this.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Generally speaking, as I understand it, the conference report increases the amount allowed to the State Department for officials, and otherwise, in the neighborhood of $75,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes. Everybody provided for in the Senate amendments is provided for here, except the lump-sum appropriation, three clerks, and one resident diplomatic agent. All the other appropriations are made.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the lump-sum appropriation was reduced about how much?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. A little over $20,000.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If I understand aright, this lump-sum appropriation which was eliminated merely relates to contingent expenses?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Yes; and they stated that they had not used it hitherto.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And the commercial agents now employed will be continued under the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Oh, yes; they are provided for under the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman spoke of the Capitol police. While the House bill reduced the Capitol police force largely, is it not a fact that the Democratic majority, without considering that fact, had turned out the old occupants of the places and had filled them entirely with new men, filling up the entire force, regardless of the reduction that we had made in this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. My information is that the places had been filled. I did not know that until we went into conference. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I did not sign this conference report. When the original bill was reported from the Committee on Appropriations to the House, the Republican minority of that committee felt obliged to take the unusual step of filing a minority report, because we thought the bill was inadequate. It seemed to me that the majority had proceeded on the theory that the Government departments in Washington were largely overpeopled; that the force was much larger than necessary, regardless of the fact—which they did not seem to take into consideration at all—that during this administration there had been an earnest and energetic and effectual attempt to cut down expenses in the various departments; that there has been for the first time in many years an apparently sincere effort to lop off the superfluous clerks and employees in the departments, to introduce modern economical methods, and to estimate only for what was necessary; and I thought, and still think, that the majority proceeded blindly and unreasonably in cutting down the force in the departments in Washington. At the same time the Senate has in some measure rectified these mistakes, and I think the Senate amendments in that respect improve the bill. I admit this the more readily, because it is the first time during many years in which I have been connected with this bill when I thought the Senate amendments had not been distinctly injurious.

But the reason for which I refused to sign this report was the clause about the tenure of office. This provides that in the future all employees in Washington shall hold office for seven years, and at the expiration of that seven years shall automatically lose their positions, with the privilege of reappointment. It seems to me that that is a vicious and harmful provision. I wish to say, however, that I gladly admit that my colleagues on the committee were not actuated by any desire to return to what is known as the spoils system, whatever may be the result.

I do not believe that is the reason for which they make the change. I believe that they recognize, as everybody who has studied the problem must recognize, that we are at present in an extremely unfortunate condition in the Government service; that there are in all the departments a great many men who have passed the age of usefulness, who, except for feelings of mercy and humanity, ought to be dropped, but who are kept on the rolls at full salaries, so that there is practically a pension list, in direct violation of law. I have no doubt that was the reason that actuated my colleagues in trying to terminate that condition in some way. I agree that that condition does exist. I agree that it is a problem which demands the serious and earnest attention of Congress, and that there are few matters of greater importance to which we ought to give our attention. There are, in my opinion, few questions of greater gravity than the retirement of employees and the reclassification of the civil service. But it seems to me the trouble with my friends is that they have chosen an entirely wrong remedy. Recognizing as I do the disease, I think there is another remedy infinitely better, and I believe that in going back to the old system of a fixed tenure of office they are doing more harm than good—harm both to the clerks and to the Government. A short tenure of office is associated in all our minds with the spoils system. The original tenure-of-office bill, which was passed nearly a century ago, we look back to as the fruitful source of that patronage system which the country has condemned and which we no longer allow. Therefore, any return to it is of itself offensive, just for that reason. Rotation in office has been tested and has been condemned. I believe that the people of the country have tired of that system, and, reflecting their opinion, Congress has abandoned it for good. I have no doubt that the country thoroughly believes in the merit system which has been established in its place.

Therefore I believe that the country will criticize any return to the old system which is associated in their minds with all the evils which we have in some measure abolished. The persons who believe in the old patronage system no longer dare to advocate it openly. Public opinion is too decidedly on the other side. But we know there are many who still long for it. A generation ago, in the days of Horace Greeley, when political debate was not characterized by the moderation and courtesy and forbearance which always illustrates it to-day, one of Horace Greeley's favorite statements was, "I will not say that every Democrat is a horse thief, but I will say that every horse thief is a Democrat." So I feel like saying about this proposition, that I will not say that everyone who favors the term-of-office system is a spoilsman, but I do believe that every spoilsman favors a short tenure of office. That of itself prejudices me in some measure against this change.

But the great, real, genuine reason I have against it is that I do not believe it would be effectual. I do not believe it will accomplish the results that its friends claim for it. Why should it? If a mere matter of law will prevent the keeping in of incapable clerks, we have that now. The law to-day—and we pass it every year in this very bill—says that all clerks incapacitated shall be dropped from their position, and we all know that the departments have many such clerks. When the heads of these departments come up from year to year before the Committee on Appropriations we ask them if they have such clerks and they say yes. They ask us if we expect them to turn out a clerk who has been all his life in office and who has saved nothing to live on, and the members of our committee never have the heart to tell him that he ought to do it.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that under that law it requires an act on the part of the Executive to separate the superannuated clerks from the rolls?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. While under this law the law itself separates the clerks.

Mr. GILLETT. No; that is the fallacy at the bottom of your theory. If by law we could make people good, if we could make them capable, then this would do it; but the trouble is that under this law, just as under the law to-day, there has got to be a positive act, because under this law the only way he can be dropped for inefficiency is by a rating below a certain standard, and then he could not be reappointed. But officers in the departments make the rating. They have to perform that positive act. Will not the officer in the department be as likely, when he knows that there is a faithful clerk who has become incapable and who if he rates him below 70 can not remain in the department, be liable to temptation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. McKELLAR). The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. I am using a good deal more time than I thought, and I think I shall have to have 10 minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts 10 minutes more.

Mr. GILLETT. The trouble is that the head of the department or the bureau or division who makes the rates, when he finds the rating is going to drop a clerk, will be tempted not to make the rating too low and to ease his conscience enough to rate him just high enough to keep him in. Unfortunately he will not only have this temptation, but it is fair to presume that every clerk who fears that he is getting on the verge of inefficiency, who knows from his own work that his rating is likely to be under the law, will go to his Representative in Congress or Senator, or both, and ask him to go to the department and urge on the chief of the bureau, or whoever makes the rates, that his rating should be kept up. No clerk is fully conscious of his inefficiency.

I am sure we have all had the experience of clerks coming to us and saying they deserved promotion and some one was promoted over their head by favoritism, and we find on examination that it was not favoritism but merit that caused the promotion. It is not natural for any of us to recognize our own weaknesses.

And so our constituents in the departments will all believe that they are entitled to be kept in. They will come to us and we will not dare refuse them and their friends at home who apply to us, but go to the head of the bureau and urge that they be so marked that they will not have to be dropped.

We will thus accentuate one of the fundamental evils of the whole patronage system, the exchange of favors between the legislative and administrative branches, one of the most vicious of all practices, and one which vitiates both legislation and administration. This measure, if it goes through, is sure to aggravate and increase that evil. So, as I say, the trouble, it seems to me, is that this provision will not accomplish the object sought, because if all you need is law, we have the law on the statute books to-day, which we all know is inoperative, and this law, although it makes it a little more difficult and a little more of a strain on the conscience of the executive, will not accomplish the end the gentleman seeks.

Moreover, I think it will have a bad effect on the whole clerical force, because even the clerks who know they are efficient, yet if they have before their eyes the fact that at the end of seven years their tenure of office ends, and that they may be dropped from the rolls from mere favoritism or partisanship, will be full of anxiety for fear that at the end of the seven years their terms of office will end.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is not the trouble now that inasmuch as he knows that it will not end, no matter how incompetent he may be, from the very moment he gets into the department he loses ambition?

Mr. GILLETT. I think there is something in that. The way to stop that is to make sure that the promotion comes by merit. I recognize in the Senate provision that there is a provision which tends to accomplish that and which is good. I recognize that it is one of the evils of the present civil-service system that superannuation naturally exists and there is not provided any way to be rid of it. Almost every good thing has some drawbacks, and that, I recognize, is the drawback to the present system. Under the old spoils system there was a clean sweep at every change of administration, and no one stayed long enough to become superannuated. I admit, too, that those who oppose this provision ought to offer something in its place, because certainly nothing is more demoralizing than the present condition where men are kept in office when everyone knows they ought to be out. It is demoralizing to the efficient, active young clerks to see men kept in places above them who they can see have outgrown their efficiency, who are blocking them from promotion, and who they know are kept there in flat defiance of law. It tends to check their activity and their ambition, because it constantly impresses on them that it is not efficiency and industry that gets the best places. It is also demoralizing to the service, because no one knows how long it will continue; the beneficiaries themselves are not certain but that at any time the ax may fall and the law be strictly enforced. It is really a pension system unrecognized by law, subsistent only on favoritism, and is the most expensive, demoralizing, and indefensible of any system that could be created. There is no subject that more urgently demands the immediate and thorough consideration of Congress.

I should probably not feel so decidedly on this subject if I had not studied it a great deal and had not a remedy of my own to offer. I believe there is a remedy infinitely better than this, and it may be considered my hobby, but it is the bill which was reported by the Civil Service Committee in the last Congress, a bill for a contributory pension law. It is not like the contributory measures which have been tried where everybody puts into a general fund and then those who need it draw it out, but under that bill each contributes for himself or for herself and simply gets his or her own savings. It is really a compulsory savings law. There is not time now for me to discuss that bill at length as I have before. The trouble with the bill, I think, and the difficulty in its passage, is that it provides, in order to put it in operation and to take care of the clerks now in office, that the Government shall expend about $2,000,000 a year for the next 25 years to take care of them, or fifty millions in all. That is not any more than our present illegal and unsatisfactory pension list is costing. But I appreciate that the great bulk of the membership of this House is opposed to any civil pension system, and so the Members of the House oppose that bill upon the ground that too much is paid out from the Government Treasury in inaugurating the system. On the other hand, the Government employees are opposed to it, because what they want is a flat pension to which they shall contribute nothing, and so between the opposition on the part of the House, because it is a pension, and the opposition on the part of the employees, because it is not enough of a pension, I recognize that the bill has little support. At the same time, it seems to me that the importance of this question demands some action by the House, and I believe if the Members would take the time to study that bill and also study a Senate document and a census document which discuss it, with figures which prove very elaborately what it will cost, they will find that that really is a fair solution of the question, and to my mind it is the best solution which has been brought forward. It is no invention of mine, so I have no private reason to be partial to it.

Believing that, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this proposition, although I recognize that its purpose is to accomplish the same result.

I believe this is a blow at the merit system which is founded on the security and permanency of tenure; it would be impotent to accomplish the results hoped from it; would leave the clerks in a condition of insecurity and anxiety which would prevent the most desirable from entering the service; would increase the pressure of Congressmen on the departments and the interchange of favors between the executive and legislative branches with damage to both; and would be injurious both to the efficient clerks whom it is intended to help and to the service which it is intended to elevate.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 16 minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be extended for 30 minutes beyond the time he now has.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from South Carolina be extended for 30 minutes beyond the time he now has. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, there is only one thing to do if the Members of this House believe that this seven-year tenure is wrong. That is to vote down the whole conference report, which will bring the question directly before the House for settlement just as if no conference had ever been held. It means a little delay, but it is an important question. It is well worth any little delay if the question can be properly settled. I have been told that this legislative proposition is the answer to the fact that the clerks through their counsel and organization have been pestering and threatening Members. They have not been pestering and threatening me, but that may perhaps be because I am of the minority. One of the incidents of power is to be pestered and threatened. Plenty of worse trouble than this is going to come to you gentlemen if you are successful in getting control of all branches of the Government.

I have no sympathy with the pestering and threatening of Members, and it ought to be answered, if it exists; but this is not a good answer. I take it that this provision for a seven-year tenure is based upon the assumption that superannuated and incompetent clerks ought to be eliminated from the Government service. I am not so sure that superannuated clerks ought to be eliminated from the Government service. No private employer would be so inhuman; but I am ready to say that all incompetent clerks should be eliminated, and that a way should be found to do it. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], my colleague, pointed out, we have had a law that incompetent clerks shall be put out of the Government service, but we found that administrative officers were not ready to perform that very disagreeable task. So some one has invented this device to take the place of the backbone that we think our administrative officers ought to have.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] seems to think, judging from what he said a moment ago, that it takes more courage to pull off your boot than it does to refuse to put it on. He thinks because he has transferred the burden of action from the administrative officer to the law that therefore the administrative officer will have sufficient backbone to carry out its provisions; but it will not be so. It takes just as much backbone to refuse to reappoint a man as it does to order a discharge.

I do not pretend that I am speaking out of any especial solicitude for the classified civil service. I am not going to pretend that I have always liked the classified civil service, and I am not talking for the classified civil service to-day. I am talking for ordinary decency to mankind. I say that this provision of law would inflict dire cruelty on the men and women who are in the Government service in Washington. Mr. Speaker, put yourself in the place of one of those clerks who has been there for five years since his last appointment. You have been sick, perhaps, a good deal of that time. You are aware that you have not been able to do your best work. Your wife may have been ill or your children may have been ill. Now, suppose that I am the particular place-proud superior officer who is making up the reports on your work on which your rating is going to be based. Why, if the last two years of your seven years' term your life would be a perfect hell. You would cater to me and offer to do me favors at every turn, because you dare not act otherwise, or because the health and happiness of your wife and family may depend upon my whim. After all, at the end of those two years you might find yourself thrown on the world, though I do not believe that would be the case, because you would go to your Senator or to your Representative. If they could not get you back in any other way, they would introduce special acts of Congress to put you back in the service on your own statement as to your own merits. This proposed law will accomplish nothing except to cause acute worry and distress to nearly everyone in the Government service in Washington.

One thing more. It is not so many years ago since we unearthed a scandal in one of the departments of the Government here in Washington. A superior officer was taking advantage of his position to borrow money from those whose promotion, under the merit system, would more or less depend upon his will. We have also heard rumors, though I do not wish to be sensational, of foremen in the service of this Government who have laid siege to the virtue of women under their orders, using as a lever the power to make or to mar those women's official records.

How much you will aggravate that situation if you intrust those foremen or leading clerks with the power to take away their subordinates' jobs. There is no tyranny like petty tyranny, the petty tyranny on which the limelight can not be thrown. That is the tyranny which you are encouraging. I do not wish to say a word against any foreman or any superior clerk of this Government other than to say that they are human like the rest of us. If you give them too much power, they will exercise too much power. There are bad men among them just as there are bad men in this Hall. Mr. Speaker, let us not put the livelihood of the rank and file of these clerks entirely at the mercy of their immediate superiors. I yield back the rest of my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois 20 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against agreeing to this conference report on account of two provisions to be found in it. It is not a great while ago, after a full discussion, we voted for the creation of a Commerce Court and provided five judges, circuit court, to be detailed by the Chief Justice for service on that court. They were appointed as circuit court judges and confirmed, and the Commerce Court was created for the purpose, as it was believed, of promptly disposing of that class of business that comes most nearly to the 90,000,000 of people in their daily life and business. I thought then and I have seen no good reason between that time and now to doubt the wisdom of the creation of that court, but almost before it starts it is to be destroyed. I think that when you come to throw the duties of that court upon the district judges that you will necessarily lead to delay, and from the number of district judges and the number of circuit judges who may be acting as district judges you tend in the beginning to beget a greater diversity of opinion in the enforcement of the law and throw a much larger burden upon the court of last resort, the Supreme Court, leading to great delay that this court—at least in theory—was designed in large part to obviate when we created the court. For that reason alone I shall vote against concurring in the conference report. But there is another provision to which the gentleman from South Carolina and the two gentlemen from Massachusetts called attention, and that is the seven-year tenure of office for the clerical force in the executive departments. What is the excuse for it? Oh, they say, there is so much deadwood, so many senile clerks who have not anything, and that it would be cruel to turn them out, and therefore those charged with the administration of the law have not obeyed the law.

Now, my observation and my belief is that the number of senile clerks has been greatly overstated, and for two reasons: Those who have less salaries grumble because there is some fellow older than they are who receives more than they do and they kick, and the kicks are noted in the newspapers. My experience is, after many years as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, that whenever the head of a department, following the desire of a head of a bureau—originating very frequently with a chief of a division, which finally results in estimates for an increase in clerical force—it is their practice to say, "Oh, we must have that increase; we have got so much deadwood." That has been the stock argument for, lo, these many years. I apprehend that if a census was taken of the clerks who are senile on account of age that you will find that it has been increased for argument, not based upon facts, at least tenfold. Then, again, it has been used very industriously for the purpose of having retired pay for clerks at a certain age. Well, I am not in favor of that; I am not in favor of a civil pension for the great army of these clerks, 35,000 in number, there being 600,000 employees in the civil service of the United States—I do not mean the classified civil service, but on the pay roll—and that does not count the 140,000 plus of those in the Army and Navy—making in all three quarters of a million, at least, of employees of the Government. Now, what is the fact? The fact is that those who hold Government positions, clerical and otherwise, get at least one-third more pay than those who perform similar services in private employment. Now, nobody will dispute that. There is one argument in favor of their getting more pay, and that is, especially when they come to the seat of government, they drop out at home, and after they have been here five or seven years the tendency is that a great many of them realize that they have become strangers at their former homes, out of touch with the ordinary business of the country, lose their friends at home, and, to some extent, lose their competency to compete with the other 90,000,000 people who are paying the taxes.

Now, I indorse the recommendation of the committee on conference; they did well when they agreed to the Senate amendment that there should be no further appointments in the War Department until the force had been decreased 5 per cent—a little bit of resignation, now and then a death, but in the main it will be a decrease of those who have lived over three score years. Now, if it be true that they are senile, the places need not be filled. Perhaps that might be carried further in other departments.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman made a suggestion just a moment ago which struck me as being of considerable interest, and that is, that the employees of the Government are paid about a third more than those engaged in similar employment in private life. I would like to know just upon what the gentleman bases that statement.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it has been stated by those who have investigated, and I do not think I could present you the census list; but take it in the gentleman's own country, take it in my own State and throughout the country, the average pay of a bookkeeper in a retail or wholesale business or in a bank begins at about $400. When they get up to a cashiership it will not average over $2,000, very frequently not over $1,500. It is many a long year for him who begins employment in a dry goods store, wholesale or retail, or in a countinghouse, starting at a very small wage, before he gets up to $1,500.

Now, they do have civil pensions in Great Britain, as I understand. I investigated the matter some years ago. But they commence at a very low rate, and retire at the age of 62 at less pay than that with which they begin in the United States. I am not saying that we ought to adopt the scale of wages in Great Britain—and they are larger in Great Britain than anywhere else except in the United States. I do not at all say so. But if there is a retirement on half pay or three-quarters pay, or whatever it may be, at a given age, the increase in salary should be gradual.

Something was said about the pressure for increase of salaries and for employment. The pressure is pretty strong. I suppose every Member of Congress understands that. While no longer is the recommendation of a Member of Congress good for admission to the classified service, it being prohibited by law, I do not complain. There are many good things connected with the classified service. Upon the whole, I doubt if we should go back to the old system. I am inclined to think that we should not. And yet—and yet—at times this pressure becomes strenuous. I would not debar by law a Government employee from asking for a betterment of his condition by an increase of salary. However, it is liable to abuse. If from 600,000 to 700,000 people, scattered throughout the length and breadth of the country, can organize and demand an increase of salary, I think it would be a serious matter, inasmuch as we have elections every two years and every four years. I have seen some indication in the House of Representatives, and once in a while slight sign in the Senate, to yield, from the standpoint of strenuous urgency, or possibly, rather, from the standpoint of all the people of the United States. I believe we have modified by law a regulation or Executive order that was made. I think that modification was wise. An American citizen, a cosovereign, should, I think, have the right of petition. That is all right. But I am merely speaking of the conditions.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I would like to ask him a question. Do I understand the gentleman to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand the gentleman correctly to say that there are three-quarters of a million persons in the employ of the Government, not counting the Army and the Navy?

Mr. CANNON. No; I said 600,000 plus, not counting the Army and the Navy.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is pretty sure of those figures?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It is a larger number than I supposed was the fact.

Mr. CANNON. I have not made a close count myself, but in order to verify my impressions about it I consulted a gentleman who, I think, is more familiar, perhaps, than any other man of my acquaintance with the facts touching the number of employees in the Government service.

Mr. OLMSTED. That includes rural carriers and letter carriers in the cities?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Who are paid directly by the Government?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I am unalterably opposed to that clause in the conference report which abolishes the present tenure of office held by civil service employees and substitutes in its place a seven-year term. The effect of this provision will be to shatter our civil service system and to reestablish on its ruins the old, discarded, and justly condemned spoils system. Gentlemen may attempt to deny the soundness of this assertion, but it requires a very little amount of reflection to prove its correctness.

At present the employees of the Government in the classified civil service hold their positions during good behavior and efficiency. This is the policy followed by practically every successful business enterprise. It is the policy, for instance, of the railroads of the country and of other great business concerns. It is the policy followed by every civilized nation in the world. Its effect is to create and maintain among the employees a higher standard of efficiency and industry. The substitution of the seven-year period of employment would injure the efficiency of the service by keeping the employees in a state of fear and unrest. There is also the grave danger to be apprehended from the adoption of this seven-year provision, and that is the danger of bringing back the old spoils system, which the merit system has so happily and successfully eradicated.

Nobody can well deny that where the reemployment of civil servants after the expiration of seven years is left in the discretion of the heads of the executive departments, as this bill leaves it, that political considerations will unavoidably figure in making the selections. This opens the door to the employment of persons whose fitness for the places they receive is determined by the amount and kind of their political activities rather than by their ability to discharge the duties of the places to which they are assigned. This is a backward step and is wholly out of accord with the progressive trend of the times. To find a parallel to it in our legislative history we go back to 1820. On May 15 of that year Congress passed what was called "the tenure of office act," providing that all district attorneys and certain other officers "shall be appointed for a term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure." Mr. Jefferson, in writing to Mr. Madison about this law, stigmatizes it in the following words:

> It will keep in constant excitement all the hungry cormorants for office, render them, as well as those in place, sycophants to their Senators, engage these in eternal intrigue to turn out one and put in another, in cabals to swap work, and make of them what all executive directories become, mere sinks of corruption and faction.

Henry Clay, in a speech delivered in the Senate in 1832 on the spoils system, thus refers to it:

> It is a detestable system, drawn from the worst period of the Roman Republic; and if it were to be perpetuated, and if the offices, honors, and dignities of the people were to be put up to a scramble to be decided by the result of every presidential election, our Government and institutions becoming intolerable, would finally end in a despotism as inexorable as that at Constantinople.

The merit system belongs essentially to a republican government like ours. The positions are open to every respectable citizen within certain limitations of age. It is thus removed from political influences, and the person, man or woman, as the case may be, showing the greatest amount of fitness is accorded the position. Outside of any injustice which would be done to the employee, it would be decidedly injurious to the interests of the Government to allow dismissal from the civil service on any score other than that of inefficiency. This system would, moreover, discourage persons of ability from considering the civil service as a life career, and the offices would be open only to those who could not make much success in private enterprises. That this would be a great loss to our Government is easy to understand when we consider that every day the public business is becoming more complicated and that it requires for its proper transaction the possession of expert knowledge which can only be acquired by those who feel that their thorough study of the needs and requirements of Government business will be rewarded by a tenure resting on good behavior and efficiency.

This provision is, of course, distasteful, and justly so, to the employees affected by it, and in proof of this statement I wish to present to the House a memorial from the National Council of Postal Associations, authenticated over the signatures of the president, the secretary, and the treasurer of the council.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF POSTAL ASSOCIATIONS,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C.

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas the conference committee of the two Houses of Congress on the disagreeing votes on the amendments to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, H. R. 24023, have recommended to their respective Houses a compromise to section 5 containing a proviso which limits the tenure of office to seven years of all persons in the classified service of the executive departments within the District of Columbia; and

Whereas we are of the opinion that if this legislation should be enacted it would be the means of destroying the basic principles of the civil-service law; and

Whereas the enactment of such legislation will cause all employees in the classified service to view with alarm the security of their tenure, believing that such tenure would no longer be dependent so much upon merit and efficiency as upon the favor and influence that might be exerted on the officer in charge of appointments and reappointments; and

Whereas the employees of the postal service are disturbed over the possibility of the extension of this principle to the entire classified service; and

Whereas this condition is creating a feeling of uncertainty seriously militating against the rendering of the most efficient service and may result in the most capable seeking positions elsewhere where there is a greater degree of certainty of continued employment, and may also discourage the most desirable eligibles from entering the service; and

Whereas we believe that the enactment of this legislation would be regarded as the entering wedge for a return to the old "spoils" system, with its attendant evils, which past experience has condemned as unsuited to the efficient conduct of the public business: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Council of Postal Associations respectfully petition the Congress to preserve the well-defined principles of the civil service that the tenure of office shall be based upon merit, efficiency, and good behavior to insure the best possible results to the Government, it being generally recognized that this can best be secured by the assurance to the employee that his tenure of office shall not be subject to recommendations that might be influenced by personal or political motives at the end of a limited tenure, but shall depend entirely upon the continued merit and efficiency of the employee.

WILLIAM E. KELLY, President.
FRANK T. ROGERS, Secretary.
P. J. SCHARDT, Treasurer.

Mr. Speaker, why is this legislation which is so momentous, revolutionary, and far-reaching in importance brought before this House by tacking it onto an appropriation bill? Why is not the proposition it embodies submitted in the form of an independent bill and referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, which will properly and carefully consider it? That would be the right and sensible course to pursue, especially since there are other bills looking to the betterment of the civil service now pending before the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. There is an unwise and unnecessary haste in hurrying this provision through as a rider to an appropriation bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I expect to vote for the conference report, although I do not wish anyone to understand by that that I thereby promise to vote for the passage of the bill over the presidential veto.

I am not going to take the time of the House to discuss the Commerce Court proposition, but I want to say a word about this proposition with reference to the clerks, which has excited so much attention.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has pointed out to the House, we have carried in this bill for many years a provision that no portion of the money appropriated should be paid to clerks who are incapacitated for the performance of their duty. I think that on one or two occasions I have had that provision stricken out of the bill in the House on a point of order, because I objected to the legislative branch declining to exercise its courage and dispose of the question of superannuation and endeavoring to impose it upon the executive branch in a way that it knew would not be exercised. I thought, and still think, it is somewhat fraudulent upon Congress to say to the executive departments, "You shall pay no portion of this money for clerks who are incapacitated," when we do not mean it, and when, if they should discharge the clerks, we would object to it.

I do not believe the provision in this bill will accomplish the purpose desired by the gentlemen who favor it. I do not believe it will discharge a single clerk in the employ of the Government. But I think it is quite likely that it will make the clerks, as the time comes toward the end of their seven-year terms, give a little better labor than they do when there is no such provision in the law. I have noticed that Members of Congress who desire renomination and reelection are much more anxious to have their names appear on the roll call than those who have decided to leave Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I am not afraid to meet what seems to me to be an inevitable condition. I do not agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] in regard to his retirement bill. So far as my reading leads me to believe, I am of the opinion that in no place in the world where there is a provision for retirement does it work satisfactorily. I think it is inevitable that the Government comes to a civil pension list, and that the sooner we do it the better it will be for us, for the Treasury, and for the public service. If we wait until the Government employees themselves shall dictate the form and amount to be provided in the civil pension list, it will be a large amount, given on slight provocation; but if we should write into the law now a provision making a pension for those who are required to leave the service when they become incapacitated in the public service, we could write the law ourselves upon our best judgment, and provide a moderate amount to be paid to the persons monthly, instead of in the end providing what will be demanded, one-half or three-quarters pay.

I am perfectly willing to be declared in favor of a civil pension and of enacting a proper provision into law. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, at the outset I desire to state that there is in this body no more sincere, earnest advocate of the merit system in the civil service than I am; and, notwithstanding the fact that the party to which I belong is about to come into power, if I had my way and could control his action, I to-morrow would have the President of the United States issue an order bringing every employee of this Government under the classified service. I am for this provision because I do believe in the merit system in our civil service; because I feel absolutely sure that unless some such action as is proposed in the paragraph under consideration is taken, the civil service, as now organized, will soon break down of its own cumbersome inefficiency.

I have been on the Appropriations Committee for a number of years, and over and over again have I heard bureau chiefs ask for additional clerks, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], because of the number of superannuated clerks in their bureaus, and when the attention of these officials is called to the law as it is written in this bill, that the responsibility rests upon them to discharge these clerks, they candidly state to the committee that they have not the heart to do it, and when they attempt to do it they are importuned by Senators and by Members of the House and finally yield to such importunities.

Mr. Speaker, for years the sentiment in the Committee on Appropriations, or, I should say, in the subcommittee, chargeable with the responsibility of making up this bill, has been in favor of a fixed tenure for Government employees. And, furthermore, I will state that, in my opinion, if you could get at the real sentiment of responsible bureau chiefs, that nine out of ten of them would tell you that it is absolutely necessary to take such action, or we should, as was urged by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], enact a civil pension list. I assure the Members of this House that no such consideration as was suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] moved us to embody this paragraph in this bill. We have received no threat, at least I have not, from any department clerk. I have not been pestered by the clerks. This paragraph goes into this bill because we believe it is in the interest of the public service, in the interest of the Treasury, and in the interest of the department employees themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I have been here nearly 14 years, and never has there been a paragraph carried in an appropriation bill that has been so distorted and misrepresented and about which so many misstatements have been made as have been made about the paragraph under discussion. I will not say that these misrepresentations have been purposely made, but on that I have very decided views, and I will say that there is a coterie of gentlemen in this town who constantly play upon the credulity and fears of these unfortunate employees, all of whom are anxious to receive and many of whom are ready to believe that these influential gentlemen can secure for them the benefits of a civil-pension act. We all know here that these hopes are baseless; that we are not going to pass any such pension bill. We know that there are not 50 men on this floor who would line up with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and record themselves in favor of a flat pension for civil employees of this Government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire very briefly to discuss this proposition upon its merits. I want to let the Members of the House know exactly what this paragraph means. It has been said in the newspapers—and of course the four newspapers here are all earnest advocates of what they think the Government employees want in this matter; it is perfectly natural for them to cater to their subscribers, and I do not blame them for it, but surely they ought to adhere fairly well to the truth—the statement has been made that these clerks are all going to be thrown out forthwith and that this wholesale slaughter is in the interest of spoils; that this movement means a reversion to the old spoils system long since abandoned. Now, what is the fact? A casual reading of the paragraph will disclose that under the terms of this paragraph no person now in the classified service can be removed before September 1, 1919. Again and again the members of the Civil Service Commission have brought it to our attention that approximately 15 per cent of the employees in these departments go out each year as a result of resignations, deaths, and removals. Consequently at the end of the seven-year period there will be approximately 20, 25, or at most 30 per cent of the clerks who are now in office who will be subject to removal under this item if same becomes law. Can there be any gainsaying that proposition? If you doubt it, turn now to the paragraph and read it. It states in plain unequivocal terms that no employee is to be removed before September 1, 1919.

Again the statement has been frequently published in the local newspapers that when these clerks are separated from the service, the end of the tenure being reached, that having led cloistered lives and not having attempted to prepare themselves to compete with recent university or college graduates, they will be at a great disadvantage when they come to be reexamined for admission into the civil service. The truth is the paragraph says in plain terms that any employee having reached the separation period who comes up to a fair standard of efficiency may be reappointed by the head of his department without reexamination. Mr. Speaker, I want to read some of the gross misrepresentations of the effect of this paragraph that have been published in the local newspapers. Here is an editorial from one of the leading evening papers. I read only one short excerpt therefrom:

> Any fixing of the tenure serves notice upon the Government workers that they are only serving on probation, and that their retention in office does not depend necessarily upon their performances, their loyalty, or zeal, or peculiar aptitude or special qualifications, but rather upon their personal relations with their superiors or their ability after a lapse of years to maintain themselves in competition with men fresh from the schools better qualified to meet the tests.

Here the intimation is plain that they must compete by examination with recent college graduates for their places. I read again from the same editorial:

> There can be no possible objection to the dropping of a man who can not maintain a certain standard of daily efficiency after a reasonable trial. But this is totally different from the wholesale discharge of everybody at a fixed interval in order to reappoint those who manage to pass a new academic examination, or who can bring sufficient political influence to bear to secure special consideration.

And yet the proposed law is plain that the employee is to be reappointed without examination if he is up to a fair standard of efficiency, and this standard is to be prescribed by the Civil Service Commission. The editorial says that no possible objection to dropping a man who can not do this can be made.

Mr. AUSTIN. I think the gentleman ought to give us the name of the evening paper.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not care to particularize; the editorial is here, and the gentleman may see it for himself.

Again, Dr. Washburn, a member of the Civil Service Commission, is quoted as saying—I do not believe he said it, because he knows what is in this paragraph, and I feel sure he would not make a willful misrepresentation even to please the newspaper or the clerks:

> At the end of seven years, if the conferees' plan is adopted, the clerks will all be dropped. It is provided that if they have proved efficient and if they pass successfully an examination they may be reappointed for another term of seven years.

These clerks, if they are efficient under rules to be fixed by Dr. Washburn's Civil Service Commission, may be reappointed without reexamination. If you doubt this, turn to your bill and read for yourself.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman think that the provision would have been very much stronger if it had read "and shall, in the discretion of the head of the executive department, be reappointed," and so forth?

Mr. BURLESON. What is the difference between "shall in his discretion" and "may in his discretion"?

Mr. KAHN. Well, strike out the "discretion."

Mr. BURLESON. Then what becomes of the constitutional provision that vests the Executive with the power of appointing and removal of these employees? I want to say to the gentleman that we did not put this paragraph in this bill without carefully considering it from all angles.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. I will.

Mr. WEEKS. Does not the gentleman think it is an unfortunate time to have this provision in the bill go into effect—September, 1919? That is a presidential year. Does he not think it ought to be fixed at some other time?

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman going to change the tenure of office of the President?

Mr. BURLESON. The House first tried to make the tenure five years. I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts has in mind a belief that this is a spoils measure. Permit me to say to the gentleman that he is laboring under a grave misapprehension.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I also desire to direct the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact that our presidential contests take place in even numbered years and not in odd years, as he seems to think.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; but the paragraph continues it through the next year from September 1, 1919, through until September 1, 1920, and 1920 is a presidential year.

Mr. BURLESON. But 1919 is not.

Mr. WEEKS. It may take place any time in 1920 up to September 1.

Mr. BURLESON. Surely the gentleman can not believe that any purpose of spoils was in mind when he realizes that four years of the next presidential term and three years of the term succeeding will elapse before this paragraph becomes operative, as far as employees now in the service are concerned.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. BURLESON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this creates no hardship on the clerks?

Mr. BURLESON. I certainly do; and, on the contrary, I think it would be immensely for the benefit of the clerks.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If so, why do you except honorably discharged soldiers and sailors?

Mr. BURLESON. In order to catch the timid Member who might be afraid to vote for it if it did not carry that exception [laughter and applause]; and the gentleman from Massachusetts knows by the experience we have had during this session of Congress with pension legislation that it is wise to make this exception. The gentleman remembers the experience we had just the other day when $300,000 was added to an appropriation bill that was not asked for by the chief of the Bureau of Pensions, and in utter disregard of the recommendations of the Civil Service Commission and which item carrying this vast sum disregarded all the rules and regulations of our Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MANN. We are glad to have the Democrats opposed to it.

Mr. BURLESON. It was one of the most vicious provisions in reference to pension legislation, and in utter disregard of the merit system, that we have had for years, and I regret that our friend from Massachusetts, who is now so solicitous for the civil service, gave his vote for that proposition.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] spoke about the bad effect on the clerks that this proposition would have. The gentleman overlooks the fact that under the civil-service rules there is a probationary period of 6 or 12 months, that every clerk must serve before he becomes a permanent employee. And strange to say, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois a moment ago, human nature is human nature wherever you find it. The same feeling that moves a Member of Congress who is about to come up for reelection to be most assiduous in the discharge of his duties during that period moves the clerk who is efficient, if he has the capacity to be efficient, during this probationary period, and it is a rare exception if when he enters upon the probationary period he fails to be retained in the Government service because he always does his best. If we have a tenure of seven years, instead of having a probationary period of only one year, we will have a probationary period of seven years and have seven years of efficient service instead of one year.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. BOWMAN. Does not the gentleman believe that as Representatives we owe as much responsibility to Government employees as we would as individuals owe to our employees?

Mr. BURLESON. I think our responsibility to Government employees is greater as Representatives than it would be if we were private citizens.

Mr. BOWMAN. Well, after the clerk has served faithfully many years, do you not think he ought to be taken care of for the good service that he has rendered? I do.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman will find himself very much alone in this body if by that he means to declare for civil pensions.

Mr. BOWMAN. I am not afraid of being alone in that position.

Mr. BURLESON. Let me further answer the gentleman. The clerk entering the classified service receives from the Government a salary from 25 to 40 per cent in excess of what he would for performing similar service in private employment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] stated a moment ago that it was 33⅓ per cent, and he reached that conclusion from information gathered by him from years of experience on the Committee on Appropriations. I stand here to assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that clerks employed by the Government are receiving from 25 to 40 per cent more than they would receive if they were discharging the same duties in private employments. There are thousands of young men in the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania who would be anxious and glad to receive one of these Government appointments even for the term of seven years. And, moreover, not only are Government employees favored in this particular way, but they work only seven and one-half hours a day, they have 30 days' annual leave, they have 30 days' sick leave—and many of them take it all and nearly all of them take part of it—and in addition they have innumerable holidays. And yet, holding these favored positions to the exclusion of thousands on the outside who would be glad to have them at a certain period in their lives, the Government employee seeks to shoulder the burden of his support after he is no account onto those who would be glad to have had his position by making them pay him a pension.

This gentleman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I admit his conscientiousness, may have the courage to vote for the pension, but there are not 49 others on this floor, however much they may desire to do so, who will vote for it.

Mr. BOWMAN. There is one more who will be with him.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am always in advance of the rest of the crowd. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. I do not know how long the gentleman from Pennsylvania has been here, but I do know that if he persists in such conduct he will not be here long.

Mr. BOWMAN. Oh, I will have something to do if I am not here. I have had up to the present time. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if there is any good reason why this should apply to Government employees in the District of Columbia and not to employees in other parts of the country?

Mr. BURLESON. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that you must crawl before you walk. If this paragraph proves as efficacious as I feel sure it will, the gentleman will be gratified within the next year or two to see it extended to a few beyond the limits of the District of Columbia.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, how can he tell whether it will be efficacious in the next year or two if it does not give any tangible result for seven years?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, but it does. The gentleman from California is very unfortunate to-day. He evidently has not his usually clear-thinking apparatus with him.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, immediately this paragraph goes into effect every employee entering the classified service comes in with a fixed tenure of seven years, and, as I have said, 15 per cent go out each year, and when the seven years will have rolled around there will only be about 20 or 25 per cent of employees who are now in the service who will be affected by the removal provision of this paragraph.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I merely desire to ask the gentleman if the members of the Civil Service Commission have expressed themselves upon this propositon?

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that at least one member of the Civil Service Commission, the chairman of the commission, believes in a fixed tenure, and I will read you one line from what he says in a letter he wrote on the subject.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am speaking of an official recommendation one way or the other. Have they expressed themselves officially?

Mr. BURLESON. No; and for the same reason that controls others who are advocates of the civil service upon this floor who really believe in the efficacy of this provision but who feel they are impelled, because of their attitude heretofore, to oppose it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether the members of the Civil Service Commission obtained the proper leave under the President's order to lobby for and against this proposition—mainly against?

Mr. BURLESON. I am not advised upon that point.

Mr. MANN. Some time ago a man was discharged from the public service for writing a letter.

Mr. BURLESON. I read from the letter of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission in response to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]:

I have not thought it well to go into an argument in regard to these changes. If made they will give, it seems to me, every employee a fair chance, an opportunity for reappointment, a natural term, if I may so call it, of service, and above all else, the two amendments, if made, will do away with almost every need, seemingly, for the enactment of the civil-pension law.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is that from Gen. Black?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes. The other two gentlemen are in favor of a pension law of some kind, and every man on this floor knows they favor it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Where have they stated that?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know that.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. I prefer to occupy my own time, Mr. Speaker. I let my statement stand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I want to read one more extract from a newspaper, and I read from the statement of a gentleman who has interested himself, a philanthropic gentleman. I do not charge that he has received a dollar or a dollar and a half or two dollars a month from these unfortunate, inefficient, superannuated clerks who are seeking pensions. I will not charge that, for evidently he is a philanthropic gentleman who enters upon this field for the public good and for no other purpose. He says:

The seven-year tenure law is simply the plan of professional politicians and not statesmen. The professional politician would use the 400,000 Government clerks as a bank, so to speak, against which they could draw checks with which to pay political debts.

Draw a check, indeed, a check that is not going to be paid for seven years. How many men within the sound of my voice expect to be here seven years from to-day? [Laughter.] Who knows? Only one gentleman raises his hand, and, in my opinion, he occupies the most insecure position of any man on the floor of the House. Blessed is he who expecteth nothing, for he shall not be disappointed. [Laughter.]

I read further from the same newspaper in another article:

The limitation of tenure of office of civil-service employees to seven years is restricted to those in the departments at Washington and not outside the Capital.

The paragraph affects only the employees within the District of Columbia, and instead of there being 400,000, the number who will be affected will be between 30,000 and 35,000. To continue:

Republican Senators who opposed the provision have asserted privately that it was insisted upon by the Democratic conferees, because they hoped for a change of administration, and this plan would enable them to get rid of thousands of Republican employees. The provision provides for the dismissal of those found to be inefficient, but makes no provision for the retention in the service of those whose records show their efficiency.

And yet, gentlemen, in this very bill there is carried another provision that says an efficiency record shall be kept, and that it shall be kept by the heads of departments, based on standards fixed by the Civil Service Commission, and that such record shall be transmitted to the Civil Service Commission and become a record of the records of their office, which shall control, and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the question of legislating so as to eliminate incompetent employees from the departmental service has occupied Congress during my entire service here. Various remedies have been suggested. There is considerable agitation for legislation to provide a civil pension list for governmental employees. My experience has been that the great mass of the Members of the House do not favor such legislation. My experience as a member of the Committee on Appropriations leads me to believe the repeated statements by various heads of departments that if the employees in the various departments of the Government were up to the standard of efficiency required at least 25 per cent less employees would be sufficient to do the work now done by the present force and do it more efficiently. The objections made to this provision, which has been worked out with some care, seem to be that it is striking down the civil-service system now in force. I should be inclined to consider that argument, Mr. Speaker, and to weigh its force if it were not for the fact that those who urge it most strongly were numbered among the gentlemen who within the last few days voted for the most vicious piece of spoils legislation enacted by this Congress during the past 40 years, a provision against which the Civil Service Commission protested, a provision against which the National Reform Civil Service Association protested, a provision pointed out by the Civil Service Commission as one that would result in the employment of a large number of employees who would not expedite the business for which they were appointed, but would be a hindrance and a burden placed upon the Pension Office. These gentlemen now appear to be alarmed at what will happen in 1919 as a result of this proposed legislation. They are worrying that at the end of seven years some Government official in a department will be so much out of sympathy with civil-service reform that employees who should be reappointed will not be appointed, for political reasons, and yet they hasten to force upon a department of the Government $300,000 for the appointment of clerks without regard to the civil-service law, and which I pointed out would be utilized and taken advantage of for purely partisan purposes. It may be that gentlemen expect that political appointments made from now until the 4th of March will be made by the administration with which they are in sympathy, and that at no time from the 4th of March, 1913, until this provision goes into effect in 1919 will any administration with which they are in sympathy be in power in this Government. It is impossible for men who are anxious to do what is best in these matters, who are looking for full information upon such matters, to place very great confidence in an argument urged against a provision of this character by the men who not only did not lift their voices against the legislation to which I have called attention, but who went on record in favor of it. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the conditions in the District of Columbia and in the departmental service in the District of Columbia are at all similar to the conditions existing in the governmental service outside of the District. There are peculiar conditions here, and this legislation is designed to cure many defects in the departmental service in the District of Columbia which do not exist elsewhere. It is not believed that such legislation will ever be necessary for service outside of the District. Whenever conditions are at all similar, it will be time enough to consider the matter. No such conditions, however, are likely, for many reasons.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I desire to ask at this time if it is in order to move a concurrent resolution to recommit this conference report to the committee on conference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order to recommit the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the gentleman from South Carolina has demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does that shut out a motion to recommit by a concurrent resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman can not make a motion to recommit a conference report against the previous question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. My point is this, that the other House, having discharged its conferees——

Mr. FITZGERALD. No, that is not——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from New York will let me state my point. I believe that a simple motion to recommit to the conferees is not in order; but it is in order by a concurrent resolution to move to recommit the bill to the conferees. That question has been decided more than once, and therefore after the previous question is ordered under the general principles under which motions to recommit are made in this House, I shall ask for a ruling of the Chair on my concurrent resolution to recommit this bill to the committee on conference.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the concurrent resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order——

The SPEAKER. It will not do any harm to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That House bill 24023 be recommitted to the committee on conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution, being a concurrent resolution, can only be introduced, except by unanimous consent, through the basket, as it is not a privileged resolution. The rule is well established——

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I admit that the gentleman has made the right point of order. I hoped that he would not think quite so quickly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to inquire if the Senate has agreed to this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but the gentleman concedes the point of order.

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman said the gentleman from New York got it wrong.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; that he was right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That the gentleman made the right point of order.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order the House can not recommit a bill to a conference committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. There is no authority anywhere to do so. The House does not have control over a conference committee. All the House does is to have its own conferees, and it can not recommit a bill to them; the House has no authority.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As long as the gentleman concedes the point of order it seems to me that is sufficient.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I conceded it to the extent that the concurrent resolution is not privileged. That is the point of order which I said was sound.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the point of order I made.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The resolution is permissible under the rules; but if the gentleman claims that it is not privileged, I think he is right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is enough.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is well taken. The Chair investigated this matter two or three days ago, not in anticipation of any trouble connected with this bill, but in connection with another bill, and certainly this resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is not privileged. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from New York. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. GILLETT. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 49.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. One moment. On this vote the ayes are 78 and the noes are 49, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present, and the Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the adoption of the conference report will, when their names are called, vote "yea"; those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 79, answered "present" 9, not voting 161, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum being present, the Doorkeeper will open the doors, and further proceedings under the call are dispensed with.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7407. An act increasing the limit of cost of the post-office building at Atlanta, Ga.; and

S. 3258. An act to acquire a site and erect buildings for a school for the Indians of Robeson County, N. C., and for other purposes.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 18985) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Missouri if all the amendments have not been disposed of, except Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 10, and 11?

Mr. BORLAND. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. And amendments Nos. 2, 3, and 4 have been agreed to with an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House amendments to Senate amendments 2, 3, and 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 2 and agrees to the same with amendments, as follows:

Omit the matter inserted by said amendment and in lieu of the paragraph stricken out insert:

"For salaries of 18 agents, for the payment of pensions, at the rate of $4,000 per annum each, during the first half of the fiscal year 1913, $36,000.

"For salary of one agent for the payment of pensions, at the rate of $4,000 per annum for the last half of the fiscal year 1913, $2,000; and from and after the 31st day of December, 1912, there shall be only one agent for the payment of pensions, to be appointed in the manner now provided by law, and who shall receive a salary at the rate of $4,000 per annum; and section 4780 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the appointment of agents for the payment of pensions is repealed to take effect from and after December 31, 1912."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter inserted by said amendment and restore the matter stricken out amended to read as follows:

"For clerk hire, and other services, at 18 pension agencies during the first half of the fiscal year 1913 and at one pension agency during the last half of the fiscal year 1913 and including not exceeding $10,000 for expenses of consolidating and removing records and equipment of pension agencies, $350,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That estimate in detail shall be submitted for the fiscal year 1914 and annually thereafter for clerks and others employed in the pension agency, and the amounts to be paid to each."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert: "$2,125."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report Senate amendments Nos. 5, 9, 10, and 11.

The Clerk read as follows:

(5) Page 3, after line 2, insert:

"For examination and inspection of pension agencies, as provided by the final provision of the act of August 8, 1882, amending section 4766, Revised Statutes, $1,500."

(9) Page 4, strike out lines 14 to 19, inclusive.
(10) Page 4, strike out lines 20 to 24, inclusive.
(11) Page 5, strike out lines 1 to 3, inclusive.
(12) Page 5, change SEC. 6 to SEC. 5.

Mr. MANN. What is the provision stricken out by these Senate amendments?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has to do with the giving of the bond by the one agent.

[Mr. BORLAND addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BORLAND. When the House provided for that plan, which has been recommended and worked out in detail by the Commissioner of Pensions, it provided that the provisions should go into operation immediately, but the Senate put on an amendment that it should not take effect during the first six months of the fiscal year. The reason was that many of the vouchers and checks had already been provided and were in the hands of the pension agents. Some agencies pay in one season, some in another month, and some in the third, so that we agreed to the Senate amendment that this change from voucher to voucher check should go into force by Executive order between now and December 31, 1913. At the same time we provided for the abolishment of the pension agents, and that that should go into force and effect during the same six months, so that as fast as a voucher check goes into force, covered by a particular agency, that agency can pass out of existence.

That proposition was before the Senate conferees and the House conferees for more than 60 days. The Senate conferees proposed that it should be left to the Executive order after the 4th of March, and the House conferees declined that provision, in view of the sentiment of the House. I have moved to adhere to the amendments providing for the appropriation up to December 31 for these agencies, so that they may pass out concurrent with the introduction of the voucher system. No better time can be had than right now. It has been the sentiment of the House for five or six terms of Congress that these agencies must go out at a certain time and proper time. The proper time is now. There is nothing for the conferees to confer about. We have agreed to every possible change the conferees have made except the principle of the final abolition of the pension agent. We have moved to adhere to the determination of the House for the abolition of the pension agent, and I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were 135 ayes and 4 noes.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Stuart, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 25.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be instructed in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 24023) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, to strike out all of the second paragraph of Senate amendments 511, 512, 513, and 514, as agreed to in conference and concurred in by the two Houses, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"All cases pending and undisposed of in said Commerce Court are hereby transferred to and shall be deemed pending in the district court of any of the judicial districts within which the original cause of action brought before the Interstate Commerce Commission arose, such district to be designated by the complainant; and the venue of all suits and proceedings hereafter brought to enforce, set aside, annul, or modify any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be in any of the judicial districts within which the original cause of action brought before the commission arose."

RADIO COMMUNICATION.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill S. 6412 for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 6412) to regulate radio communication.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Of course the bill will have to be read at some time. Why does not the gentleman ask to have the bill read under the five-minute rule so that amendments can be offered section by section?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I will modify my request and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be read under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to read this bill under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read and Members will understand that this bill is now being read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a person, company, or corporation within the jurisdiction of the United States shall not use or operate any apparatus for radio communication as a means of commercial intercourse among the several States, or with foreign nations, or upon any vessel of the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, or for the receipt or transmission of radiograms or signals the effect of which extends beyond the exclusive jurisdiction of the State or Territory in which the same are made, or where interference would be caused thereby with the receipt of messages or signals from beyond the jurisdiction of the said State or Territory, except under and in accordance with a license, revocable for cause, in that behalf granted by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon application therefor; but nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to the transmission and exchange of radiograms or signals between points situated in the same State: Provided, That the effect thereof shall not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the said State or interfere with the reception of radiograms or signals from beyond said jurisdiction; and a license shall not be required for the transmission or exchange of radiograms or signals by or on behalf of the Government of the United States, but every Government station on land or sea shall have special call letters designated and published in the list of radio stations of the United States by the Department of Commerce and Labor. Any person, company, or corporation that shall use or operate any apparatus for radio communication in violation of this section, or knowingly aid or abet another person, company, or corporation in so doing, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, and the apparatus or device so unlawfully used and operated may be adjudged forfeited to the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

On page 1, line 8, strike out the words "receipt or."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 8, by striking out the words "receipt or."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the amendment is to meet the objections urged against the bill by the experimenters and those who are engaged as amateurs in this art. Many of these stations are equipped to receive messages, but are not equipped to transmit messages. They claim that if their stations are only equipped to receive messages they can not interfere with the transmission of messages, and hence there is no occasion for their having a license from the Government. We have conceded that contention and will relieve these stations equipped alone for the purpose of receiving radio communications from taking out a license as provided by section 1.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, page 1, line 9, before the word "signals," by inserting the word "radio."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 9, by inserting before the word "signals" the word "radio."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the amendment should be adopted or not, but I want a statement from the gentleman in charge of the bill whether it is intended that these signals mentioned in the bill mean radio signals or any signals which might be entirely apart from wireless signals.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The only reason for using the word "radio" or "signals" is that heretofore distress signals or messages have been denominated signals, and hence that language, I think, is used throughout the bill to differentiate between the messages and the signals.

Mr. MANN. But these signals, as the gentleman understands, refer to radio signals. Of course, while the bill is entitled "A bill to regulate radio communication," the title of the bill does not necessarily control, and when you say radiogram and then, in the alternative, signals, I want it clearly stated by the gentleman in charge that that does not mean signals such as wigwagging or a thousand other ways of making signals, but only is intended to cover radio signals.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his amendment.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the word "exclusive" in line 10, page 1.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That every such license shall be in such form as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall determine, and shall contain the restrictions, pursuant to this act, on and subject to which the license is granted; that every such license shall be issued only to citizens of the United States or to a company incorporated under the laws of some State of the United States, and shall specify the ownership and location of the station in which said apparatus shall be used and other particulars for its identification and to enable its range to be estimated; shall state the purpose of the station, and, in case of a station in actual operation at the date of passage of this act, shall contain the statement that satisfactory proof has been furnished that it was actually operating on the above-mentioned date; shall state the wave length or the wave lengths authorized for use by the station for the prevention of interference and the hours for which the station is licensed for work; and shall not be construed to authorize the use of any apparatus for radio communication in any other station than that specified. Every such license shall be subject to the regulations contained herein and such regulations as may be established from time to time by authority of this act or subsequent acts and treaties of the United States. Every such license shall provide that the President of the United States in time of war or public peril may cause the closing of any station for radio communication and the removal therefrom of all radio apparatus, or may authorize the use or control of any such station or apparatus by any department of the Government, upon just compensation to the owners.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in line 5, page 3, by inserting after the words "United States" the words "or Porto Rico."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 5, by inserting after the words "United States" the words "or Porto Rico."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SIMS). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 6, by inserting after the word "State" the words "or Territory."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I also offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 7, by inserting after the words "United States" the words "or Porto Rico."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, page 3, commencing in line 5, by striking out the following language:

Shall be issued only to citizens of the United States or to a company incorporated under the laws of some State of the United States—with the amendments which have already been agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by striking out all of line 5 after the word "license," all of line 6 and line 7, up to and including the word "and" where it appears the first time, together with the amendments already adopted to this section.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill, which was prepared, I suppose, by the Commissioner of Navigation, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and various other officials of the Government, as originally prepared and passed by the Senate would not have authorized a citizen of Porto Rico to have a license for a radio station issued to him in Porto Rico, and would not have authorized one there without a license; would not have authorized a radio station in the Philippine Islands except as issued to a citizen of the United States, and would not have authorized a radio station in Alaska except as issued to some citizen who was not a citizen of Alaska. The gentleman in charge of the bill has very kindly corrected a portion of these words, and intends to correct the one with reference to the Philippines. I only call attention to this in order to call attention to the fact that in the preparation of a bill in this regard the gentlemen who prepared it did not use very great care. The provision of the bill as it stands requires that the license for a radio station shall only be issued to a citizen of the United States or to a company incorporated under the laws of some State or Territory of the United States. I have heard no good reason given for that restriction. In time of war the President is authorized to seize all of these stations in any event. We may as well say that no railroad in the United States should be allowed to operate unless it is owned by a citizen of the United States, and so forth. It makes a difference on the borders of Canada. We want permission over there to operate radio stations. Why should we say they should not have permission here?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman want an answer to that?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. I want to know any good reason.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The reason for this provision, and I think it is a wise one, is that these stations erected on American soil should be owned or controlled only by American citizens or corporations incorporated under the laws of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it does not allow a corporation incorporated under the laws of the United States to operate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It says that a license shall be issued only to citizens of the United States or to a company incorporated under the laws of some State or of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not some State or, but some State of, the United States. A company incorporated in the District of Columbia can not operate a radio station.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman's criticism of the language there is well taken, but it can very easily be modified by amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman's position in the matter is well taken. It provides that a company must be incorporated under the laws of some State, but it does not require that it shall be incorporated under the laws of the States where the station is located.

Mr. MANN. No one said that it did.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to say that in the District of Columbia there could not be a station.

Mr. MANN. The District of Columbia is not a State.

Mr. CULLOP. It could have a station which was organized under the laws of some other State.

Mr. MANN. What I said was that a corporation of the District of Columbia could not obtain a license.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think that is correct under the language of the bill.

Mr. CULLOP. That is correct.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That could be fixed by inserting language to the effect that it shall be issued to a corporation organized under the laws of some State or Territory or of the United States. By inserting "or" before "United States" would remedy it.

Mr. MANN. What is the real need, when we are seeking in this world to obtain close interchange between nations and peoples, to enlarge commerce and make the ocean narrower, of saying that so far as commerce is concerned we will not permit foreigners to come on our shores? We do not want them to say that we shall not go on their shores, and this bill itself provides that in time of danger or war the President can seize every radio station and close it up if he desires. What good is there in saying that a foreign company or a foreign citizen can not be permitted to own a radio station or to operate a radio instrument?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. If we insert the word "or" after the word "State" in line 6, will not that meet the objection—"under the laws of some State or of the United States"? That would let in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. But there has already been an amendment inserted there of the words "or Territory," so that that would not be sufficient. That part of it is easily remedied. I made that as a superficial criticism. It is not so important as the rest. The main proposition is whether we are to take the narrow position that in commerce we want to go abroad, but will not permit people from abroad to come to our shores. A radio instrument is necessarily operated to transmit messages a long distance over water or land. We say that they can not operate a radio station in the United States, from the United States to Cuba, unless there be a license to a citizen of the United States in the United States, and if Cuba says the same thing the same company can not send and receive a radiogram at all.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a meritorious proposition. I do not believe that we should permit citizens of foreign countries to come in here and erect radio stations. I think they should be under the control and ownership of citizens of the United States, or of corporations organized under the laws of the United States, or of some State or Territory. The gentleman says there is a provision in this bill that the Government may take over these stations in time of war. He is correct in that. The bill does provide that the Government may take over these stations in time of war, and exercise absolute control over them, and it can be readily seen that if these stations belonged to foreign governments or citizens of foreign countries it might, and doubtless would, lead to serious complications in the event of war, and I do not know of any other country that extends to us the privilege of erecting radio stations on her own soil, and is retaining absolute control of them, and I think the same is true of Germany; and I think it is a wise national policy that we should retain the control of these stations by limiting the issue of licenses to erect stations to citizens of the United States, or of her Territories, or of Porto Rico.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN), there were—ayes 15, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I move, in line 6, after the word "State," to insert the words "Territory or."

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the word "Territory" has aleady been placed in the bill by an amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. Then, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that, after the word "Territory" in the bill as amended, there be inserted the word "or."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Territory" insert the word "or."

Mr. HARDY. Before offering that amendment, will the gentleman let me make a suggestion which I think will improve this phraseology? Instead of the amendment of the word "or," offered by the gentleman, in line 6, I believe it would read better to say "to a company incorporated under the laws of the United States or of some State or Territory thereof."

Mr. CULLOP. The other, I think, is equally as good as that. It will read, then, "under the laws of some State, Territory, or of the United States."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] if, in line 24, page 3, after the word "peril," we should not add the words "or disaster." The purpose of the bill is to prevent interference in radio communication, and I think it is very largely the result of the Titanic disaster. Now, in line 23, the paragraph reads:

Every such license shall provide that the President of the United States, in time of war or public peril, may cause the closing of any station for radio communication, etc.

That would seem to imply that this measure was intended only to enable the President to close up the stations in the event of war or in the event of peril due to the interference of some foreign nation. The President should also have authority to close radio stations which interfere with messages transmitted as a result of some disaster at sea, as in the case of the Titanic.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I do not see that the language is material, but I do not object to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 24, after the word "peril," by inserting the words "or disaster."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That every such apparatus shall at all times while in use and operation as aforesaid be in charge or under the supervision of a person or persons licensed for that purpose by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Every person so licensed for the operation of any radio apparatus on shore shall be a citizen of the United States. Every person so licensed who in the operation of any radio apparatus shall fail to observe and obey regulations contained in or made pursuant to this act or subsequent acts or treaties of the United States, or any one of them, in addition to the punishments and penalties herein prescribed, upon conviction shall suffer the suspension of the said license, and the same shall not be renewed for a period of one year from and after the date of his conviction of any such failure. It shall be unlawful to employ any unlicensed person or for any unlicensed person to serve in charge of the use and operation of such apparatus, and any person violating this provision shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $100 or imprisonment for not more than two months, or both, in the discretion of the court, for each and every such offense: Provided, That in case of emergency the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may authorize a collector of customs to issue a temporary permit, in lieu of a license, to the operator on a vessel subject to the radio ship act of June 24, 1910.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer three amendments which have been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. We agree that they are meritorious amendments, and should be agreed to. The first is on page 4, line 8, beginning with the word "every," down to and including the word "States," in line 10. It now reads:

Every person so licensed for the operation of any radio apparatus on shore shall be a citizen of the United States.

The amendment, I say, was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 4, lines 8, 9, and 10, by striking out, beginning with the word "every," in line 8, down to and including the word "States," in line 10.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 4, line 14, by inserting after the word "them" the words "or who shall fail to perform or enforce obedience thereto by an unlicensed person while serving under his supervision."

Mr. ALEXANDER. That amendment was also suggested by the gentleman from Illinois and agreed to by the committee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I also offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, lines 15 and 16, substitute for the words "upon conviction shall" the word "may" and strike out the word "and" at the end of line 16. Lines 17 and 18, substitute the words "for a period to be fixed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, not exceeding one year," for the words "the same shall not be renewed for a period of one year from and after the date of his conviction of any such failure." Line 20, after the word "charge," insert the words "or in supervision."

Mr. MURRAY. May I ask to have the amended section reported as it would read if the amendment is adopted? Simply that sentence; I do not care to have the whole section read again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the part of the section as amended.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It may be difficult for the Clerk to put the language together, and I have it here and I will read it:

Or any one of them, or who shall fail to perform or enforce obedience thereto by an unlicensed person while serving under his supervision, in addition to the punishments and penalties herein prescribed may suffer the suspension of the said license for a period to be fixed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, not exceeding one year. It shall be unlawful to employ any unlicensed person or for any unlicensed person to serve in charge or in supervision of the use and operation of such apparatus.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of preventing or minimizing interference with communication between stations in which such apparatus is operated, to facilitate radio communication, and to further the prompt receipt of distress signals, said private and commercial stations shall be subject to the regulations of this section. These regulations shall be enforced by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor through the collectors of customs and other officers of the Government as other regulations herein provided for.

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor may, in his discretion, waive the provisions of any or all of these regulations when no interference of the character above mentioned can ensue.

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor may grant special temporary licenses to stations actually engaged in conducting experiments for the development of the science of radio communication, or the apparatus pertaining thereto, to carry on special tests, using any amount of power or any wave lengths, at such hours and under such conditions as will insure the least interference with the sending or receipt of commercial or Government radiograms, of distress signals and radiograms, or with the work of other stations.

In these regulations the naval and military stations shall be understood to be stations on land.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know just where the Clerk is reading. I thought the gentleman was going to offer an amendment on page 6, line 14. Where is the Clerk reading?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That section has not yet been finished.

Mr. MANN. There are many paragraphs in that section. Are they to be read as a full section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The whole section has not been read.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that section 4 be read by paragraphs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And amendments offered?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; by paragraphs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that will be done.

The Clerk read as follows:

REGULATIONS.

NORMAL WAVE LENGTH.

First. Every station shall be required to designate a certain definite wave length as the normal sending and receiving wave length of the station. This wave length shall not exceed 600 meters or it shall exceed 1,600 meters. Every coastal station open to general public service shall at all times be ready to receive messages of such wave lengths as are required by the Berlin convention.

OTHER WAVE LENGTHS.

Second. In addition to the normal sending wave length all stations, except as provided hereinafter in these regulations, may use other sending wave lengths: Provided, That they do not exceed 600 meters or that they do exceed 1,600 meters: Provided further, That the character of the waves emitted conforms to the requirements of regulations third and fourth following.

USE OF A "PURE WAVE."

Third. At all stations if the sending apparatus, to be referred to hereinafter as the "transmitter," is of such a character that the energy is radiated in two or more wave lengths, more or less sharply defined, as indicated by a sensitive wave meter, the energy in no one of the lesser waves shall exceed 10 per cent of that in the greatest.

USE OF A "SHARP WAVE."

Fourth. At all stations the logarithmic decrement per complete oscillation in the wave trains emitted by the transmitter shall not exceed two-tenths, except when sending distress signals or signals and messages relating thereto.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, line 14, add at the end of regulation first:
"Every ship station, except as hereinafter provided, and every coast station open to the general public service shall be prepared to use two sounding wave lengths, one of 300 meters and one of 600 meters, as required by the international convention in force."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the international convention held at Berne prescribed a wave length of 300 meters. The recent convention held in London prescribes 300 and 600 meters, and this amendment is to conform to the regulation adopted at that convention.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES] offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 6, as a proviso to the first regulation as amended, add the following:
"Provided, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may, in his discretion, change the limit of wave-length reservation made by regulations 1 and 2 to accord with any international agreement to which the United States is a party."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, where does that amendment come in?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On page 6, as a proviso to the first regulation as amended by the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, Mr. ALEXANDER.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The purpose of the amendment, I will explain to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], is to authorize the Secretary of Commerce and Labor hereafter to change this regulation, if the regulations as to wave lengths are hereafter changed by the International Convention, without compelling other legislation by Congress. For instance, if they change the wave length, he may change the regulation to conform to the international agreement.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The amendment, I think, is in the present tense, however. I suggest that it be made to conform to future requirements.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read the amendment again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be read again by the Clerk.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MANN. That is right. I think that covers it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. MURRAY. May I ask the gentleman, before that amendment is voted on, as to the language of the first proviso and the second regulation at line 18, on page 6?

Mr. ALEXANDER. We have not gotten to that yet in the way of amendments.

Mr. MURRAY. I know; but I am afraid we will pass that if we do not attend to it now. It reads:

Provided, That they do not exceed 600 meters or that they do exceed 1,600 meters.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Berlin convention has provided that wave lengths shall be reserved up to and including 600 meters for ships. From 600 meters to 1,600 meters they are reserved by all the nations which are parties to the agreement for the use of their Governments. Wave lengths in excess of 1,600 meters as well as those up to 600 meters may be used for commercial purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 14, page 5, by striking out the final "d" in the word "provided."

Mr. ALEXANDER. Where is that amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Line 14, page 5.

Mr. MANN. What is the object in that?

Mr. STEPHENS of California. I do not think it reads right in the bill. It should read "provide" instead of "provided."

Mr. MANN. It says, "other regulations herein provided for." Many regulations are provided for.

Mr. STEPHENS of California. All right. I withdraw the amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California withdraws his amendment. The clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

USE OF "STANDARD DISTRESS WAVE."

Fifth. For the purpose of sending signals of distress every station on shipboard shall be so adjusted, except on vessels of small tonnage unable to have plants insuring that wave length, as to permit these signals to be sent with a wave length of approximately 300 meters.

Mr. BURLESON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, for the purpose of placing in the RECORD some notable speeches delivered at Seagirt yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, substitute the following for the fifth regulation:
"Fifth. Every station on shipboard shall be prepared to send distress calls on the normal wave length designated by the international convention in force, except on vessels of small tonnage unable to have plants insuring that wave length."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERCOMMUNICATION.

Eleventh. Each shore station open to general public service between the coast and vessels at sea shall be bound to exchange radiograms with any similar shore station and with any ship station without distinction of the radio systems adopted by such stations, respectively, and each station on shipboard shall be bound to exchange radiograms with any other station on shipboard without distinction of the radio systems adopted by each station, respectively.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. AYRES] offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, after line 4, add the following as a separate paragraph:
"It shall be the duty of each such shore station, during the hours it is in operation, to listen in at intervals of not less than 15 minutes for a period of not less than 2 minutes, with the receiver tuned to receive messages of 300-meter wave lengths."

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose of this? This is an entirely new proposition. Where did this plan come from, that proposes to waste eight minutes in every hour?

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, the recent London conference, which has just adjourned, has decided to suggest to the signatory nations that they use 10 minutes of each hour for listening in. That regulation has not yet been adopted by the signatory nations, but it doubtless will be. As a matter of fact, the probable reason why no more news has been heard from disasters at sea between the hours of 10 and 12 at night is because it has been the custom of the company which sends messages from Wellfleet to the trans-Atlantic boats to send continuously from 10 to 12. They do not listen in at all during that time, and that is very unsafe, because it practically precludes the possibility of receiving distress signals during that time. It seems to me this is a very important restriction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT STATIONS TO OBSERVE DIVISIONS OF TIME.

Thirteenth. The naval or military stations for which the above-mentioned division of time may be established shall transmit signals or radiograms only during the first 15 minutes of each hour, local standard time, except in case of signals or radiograms relating to vessels in distress, as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman knows that the House meets to-night. It is quite evident that we can not finish this bill this afternoon. I think there will be some debate on these items that are coming.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Suppose we finish all but the eighteenth regulation.

Mr. MANN. The fifteenth and the eighteenth will take some time. Those that will not take much time will take no more time on some other day.

Mr. ALEXANDER. To the fifteenth there are just two amendments, one suggested by the gentleman from Illinois and one suggested by the amateurs, that are acceptable to the committee.

Mr. MANN. I think there will be some other discussion there. Unless I change my mind, I expect to offer an amendment that was not accepted.

Mr. HARDY. Will we be likely to go on with this to-morrow?

Mr. MANN. That will depend upon you gentlemen. I shall not object.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I suggest that we proceed for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that there is a night session at 8 o'clock to-night.

Mr. MANN. Three hours to-night and five and one-half hours this afternoon represent a pretty good day's work.

The SPEAKER. It takes some time for Members to go home and get their dinners and get back here. [Applause.]

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, out of the enthusiasm and impulse for the success of a particular ticket there is that higher impulse and element in American citizenship that demands of any successful party, whatever the result may be, that this Government of ours shall be in the hands of its strongest and best men. Every party should approach the business of "President making" with a supreme sense of its great responsibility to the country. Out of the crucible of warring factions and ambitions the party should emerge with its ablest representative. So long as that doctrine shall continue to receive recognition personal liberty of the citizen will be safe. The millions and millions of American voters and that other larger number of millions of American citizens who are not voters have no interest in party quarrels or personal ambitions; what they want is good government, and that party is secure in their hands that heeds this well-considered demand of American citizenship. The conditions that have developed in 15 years seem to point to no other result in the approaching election than Democratic success. Under a vicious and extreme system of government, projected by the Republican policy of protection, fully evolved, the country presents a most complex political situation. On one hand, the stoicism of the standpatter, battling not for supremacy, not for success, not that they be permitted to remain in charge of the Government, but simply begging that it may exist and continue to be the custodian of the leadership and the traditions of his party. On the other hand, is the Democratic Party—the impersonation of conservative progress, a wise, thoughtful progress—battling for substantial justice to the masses against rampant radicalism in the Republican Party and the tides of discontent behind which is a revolutionary socialism making war on sound, economic, and social doctrines. The Democratic Party in this confusion is in sympathy with the democratic progressive movement of the times. The party speaks through its selection of candidates and the declaration of its principles the aspirations of twentieth-century progressive politics. It approaches the solution of the intricate problems of government without the purpose to annoy any interest, but to lead along lines of stable development, with justice to all—every industry that makes for impartial prosperity and happiness. Our opportunity is not due to the strife and differences in the Republican Party.

It is due to the virile force of Democratic doctrine, an honest purpose to carry out that doctrine that the country recognizes and believes in. Our philosophy of government is the refuge for that patriotic citizenship that loves country more than it does party. The difficulty with the Republican Party is not, primarily, that it is rent into warring factions, each claiming regularity, but because its economic theory of civil government is wrong and the fallacy of it is being discovered by the people. A party whose only hope rests in an unequal and unjust system of Federal taxation can not expect to continue as a vital force in this Government. A party that finds the ultimate perfection of its policy in the power to develop specialized privileged conditions through favoritism in legislation, that seeks a reciprocity with these classes, fortressed by the prostitution of the taxing power of the Government, conditioned that that party in return shall be kept in power by these classes, must eventually expect to be repudiated. A party whose economic theory—not principles—written into law inaugurates conditions that destroy all incentive to individual initiative; a party that is willing to turn over to a few men all the great agencies for production, transportation, and distribution and leave room for nothing else save a body of efficient subordinates to fit into the grooves of these self-oiling, ball-bearing monopolies, and remit the people to the despotism of a financial oligarchy, must expect in a Republic like this to be sent to the political scrap heap. This is the condition against which the people rebel. The Republican Party offers no solution for these present-day problems. Under its doctrine it has a right, by disguising legislation, to so manipulate the taxing powers that great corporations are exclusively benefited and these immense concerns permitted to write into the law their own rates of taxation against the people. The Carnegies, the Garys, and the Perkinses, who have availed themselves of this license, give us nothing to elect except complete submission and a cringing servitude to them and their methods in the Nation's commercial and economic life, or a recourse to state socialism controlling production, performing the duties of a common carrier, and the distribution of commodities. As against conditions known and felt by all classes, the Democratic Party offers you the vitalizing force of all democracy, "equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

In that doctrine will the right truly divine of self-government, the sovereign rule and dominion of the people be proclaimed, vindicated, justified, and glorified in all the governments of the world that adopt it. We stand for the principle that legal restriction against individual advancement or the opportunity to advance will not be tolerated. That government has no delegated power to exercise functions that create favoritism in legislation. Organized society looks to the law to protect it. The protection of the weak against the physical violence of the strong is no more a function of government than the protection of those who can not protect themselves is against the greed and avarice of the powerful. The public conscience has always demanded this intervention, and it always will. When a government fails to do this it loses its real purpose and fails to perform its real duties to organized society. The chief controlling thought in all civil governments, not only as expressed in their constitutions, but in the execution of the law, is the protection of its weakest citizen in the equal enjoyment of opportunity with its most influential. Not only are vast combinations of wealth, whose interests can not possibly be with the great masses of citizens, but squarely antagonistic to their interests, developed as a natural product of Republican doctrine, but the party as a party has encouraged their growth and influence. It gave these institutions power that in return they might give the party power. Both have discharged their obligations under the contract. The progressiveness of American politics to-day is the people's protest against corporate control of all the great commercial lines of industry. This protest on the part of a substantial portion of the citizenship of the country has developed into a hatred of the party—the men and the methods that made this condition possible. The incomparable extent and concentration of wealth, the idiotic and senseless display of it by its idle possessors, their relentless and crushing power that brooks no interference with their business methods by rivals, has stirred a spirit of anarchy against big business. The country is against autocratic capitalistic socialism, as well as against communistic socialism, and will have none of it. The history of predatory wealth in this country has no parallel to it in all the annals of human government. We are not opposed to capital. We are opposed to some of its methods and opposed to the party that condones its offenses against society and government; and we shall continue this hostility to that capital that is criminal in its conduct until there is release from its injustice and oppression, and until it ceases to be a menace to free institutions.

The intimidating threat of the privileged classes that the Democratic Party wants to injure business in its attack upon its methods is the merest cant and hypocrisy. Certain classes of "big business" say they want to be let alone. Of course they do. What felon and highwayman does not want to be let alone? It is only the business that is crooked, the business that violates the law and believes it has power enough to successfully resist prosecution that is demanding to be let alone. Honest corporations and honest business that is zealous to respect the law is not condemning either the courts or restrictive legislation. Such business will be protected in all of its legitimate rights by legislation. Big business injures itself because through secret legislative channels it creates a condition that forfeits public confidence and public respect in securing legal rights that do not equitably belong to it and the exercise of which rights is in opposition to the interest of the ordinary citizen. Some big business does not want to learn how to obey the law, but wants to learn how it can violate the law and get something by doing so and escape punishment for it. Business that is honest will prosper because it deserves to prosper. Corporations can take care of themselves. They have frequently demonstrated their ability to do so. The unquestionable fact is that for the last 15 years the interests and rights of the individual citizen have been lost sight of in Federal legislation in the frantic effort of the Republican Party to do something for the corporations of the country. What the masses of the people want is a common ground, not submerged by selfishness, where equality shall be established. On that theory are constructed not only all the States, but the federation of States, and in that equality of rights all are ambitious in the common struggle with a common hope to a common destiny.

The Democratic Party has faith in its progressive character and in its ability and power to respond to changed conditions within the limits of constitutional authority. To grow to perfect an applied system is its purpose, that government shall be an organism to help and develop and not an agency to restrict and encompass. The birthright of the Republic is in its sovereignty. The struggle on this continent for free government was cast in national sovereignty, molded within a Constitution ordained under the most impressive and solemn conditions ever experienced by any people.

It became the peculiar province of the American Nation to illustrate to the world one principle—that of self-government—so anchored within the doctrine of personal liberty as to reflect and preserve the rights of all classes and conditions of society; to protect the people in the enjoyment of their inherent rights against the tyranny of individual absolutism on the one hand and the destructive forces of anarchy and unorganized society on the other: To establish by constitutional checks and balances that sure guaranty of life and property and the peaceful enjoyment of the same in perpetuity. There have always been leaders who were seditious against any kind of delegated power and advocates of the other extremes in favor of unrestrained license. The American Constitution is the heritage of the philosophy of governmental experience from Plato to Jefferson. Whihle the Constitution is the chart of a great Government it is still the instrument of a people who may change it if they find it necessary to meet a demand for a larger limitation of power. A government of the people is as absolutely impossible of existence without the organic law of a constitution as are the organized forces of nature impossible without law.

No party can receive the favor of the people that does not recognize the binding force of constitutional power. The one continually vitalizing element of a democracy lies in the fact that it is embedded in a constitution and refuses to be either divorced from it or to permit in any way its nullification. The Constitution is democracy's perpetual protest against change, against unrestrained impulse, against political suicide, and the repudiation of delegated power. It is a bulwark against frenzied and unreasoned passion, against the turbulence of mob hysteria and unthought violence. It is alike the safeguard of personal liberty, of organized society. It is the great magnet that confines parties, at least theoretically, to its provision. Within the Constitution of the American Republic all parties find room for construction to sustain their individual theories. The Republican Party believes that in the "general-welfare clause" it is fortified to levy a protective tariff and that the Constitution may be construed to authorize anything it does not specifically prohibit. The Democratic Party believes that no power to raise taxes exists under the Constitution, except for the discharge of the General Government's obligations, and that only legislation is warranted that is expressly provided for in the authority delegated. Democracy believes in arming every man in his personal and property rights with the ægis of constitutional guaranty, and above all State rights and all Federal rights sacred to him are those individual rights that he did not delegate to either the State or the Nation.

Personal liberty and human rights are defined by organized society, but always under law. When the law has not defined human rights personal liberty has not endured. The great Democratic Party would have no right to exist if it did not revere and protect the Constitution. This is essentially an age of constitutional government. The Democratic Party has always contended for close construction of constitutional provisions. Right in its conceptions, strong in its growth, and brilliant in its history of constitutional interpretation, it will meet with fortitude and ability, so long as it cherishes its history, all those issues lying in the unrevealed future of the country's destiny.

We believe in Democracy's progressive character. We are not an autonomy. We sometimes believe that the Nation governs itself. Our Government is automatic only as the citizenship of the country demonstrates its capacity for self-government. Out of the long contest for representative government has come the concrete fact that the very essence of Democracy rests in the ability of the whole people to govern themselves within the limits of constitutional authority and who do govern themselves.

What is the source of all the present unrest? You ought to understand that abnormal and extreme conditions that we are face to face with to-day are due to legislation or to want of legislation, and because of that fact the conditions are directly chargeable to the party in power. Yesterday you expressed no interest in railway regulation; to-day you are interested in the overcapitalization of railways and their consolidation and their unrestrained control of the transportation of commerce. To-day you are complaining, and justly so, because manufacturers have consolidated and these immense concerns have crushed all competition, divided the consumers into groups and each man in his respective line has taken his group to the exclusion of all others. Yesterday the people had no interest in the public domain, but now when the Weyerhausers and the Guggenheims have gathered up all the standing timber, the coal beds, copper and zinc mines, and water-power sites you cry out for Federal aid and conservation. You want the Government to own telegraph, telephone lines, and express companies and operate them directly as great public utilities. You demand the enforcement of the Sherman law against the Steel Trust, the Meat Trust, the Banking Trust, and all the rest of these related children of an inefficient Government. You are wild about the high cost of living, and like a sinking man, grasp at every fad and fancy for its solution, while the grip grows tighter and stronger, that this devilish system of protection has forged about us. What shall we do with these questions which are interstate in scope and national in importance and influence?

Do you feel that the Republican Party, that in four succeeding administrations has produced this confused situation, is the proper agency to meet the situation now? Has it exhibited any evidence that it is willing to respond to public sentiment with reform legislation that will relieve the people? As to whether it may be safe to intrust it further in the solution of important questions that the people are demanding shall have attention I submit the testimony of the Washington Times of July 8, 1912. a recognized Republican authority on the character, profession, and performances of that party.

WHY CAMP IN A GRAVEYARD?

What have those progressives who would stay within the pale of the Republican Party to hope? Since those who now control that party came into power has there been any moment when they showed a desire to be progressive?

Elected upon a progressive platform, pledged to progressive legislation, inheriting a progressive administration and the tremendous popularity that it had earned, has there been a moment in the history of the present administration that has not witnessed its retrogression, its betrayal of pledges, its disregard of party platform, its defiance of public sentiment, its contempt for the people?

If the Republican Party lacked the wisdom to read the meaning of the elections in 1910, and if it lacked the wisdom to read the meanings of the presidential primaries this year, how can it be reasonably expected to acquire wisdom between now and November?

If the Republican Party lacked the honesty to seat delegates honestly selected by the masses of its party, but nominated the candidate for the greatest office within the gift of the people by fraud and naked theft, where is there any hope that it can or will acquire honesty between now and election or after election, if successful?

If the desire to do right or the fear to do wrong has no effect upon the Republican Party, what hope is there in it for those who are animated by either motive? "They also serve who only stand and wait," was not written of those who would camp in a graveyard and expect to keep pace with the world.

I note that Chairman Hilles, of the Republican national committee, in his "keynote" for the presidential conflict, uses the following language:

Real progress is not a theory but an achievement. No American should be deceived in an exchange of his birthright for a vision. The progress of the Nation toward better things does not come from denunciation but from actual results. More has been accomplished in the last three years under the administration of President Taft than was ever before accomplished by any American President in the same period of time.

This is a bit of biting sarcasm read in connection with the Republican indorsement the President has received from the Washington Times, just quoted.

I propose to submit the Republican Party to the "acid test" of the performance of what it said it was in favor of when it had both the House and the Executive, during the Sixty-first Congress, whether it has not exchanged its "birthright for a vision," and discern, if possible, what it has accomplished in the last three years under President Taft's administration, and compare its record with what the Democratic Party said it would do if given power and what it did do in the Sixty-second Congress.

I shall quote material planks in the Democratic and Republican platforms of 1908 to show their respective pledges to the people and how far those pledges have been redeemed, respectively, when the representatives of the party had an opportunity to redeem them.

Important planks in Democratic platform of 1908.	What a Democratic House did to redeem its promises.
ARBITRARY POWER—THE SPEAKER.
The House of Representatives was designed by the fathers of the Constitution to be the popular branch of our Government, responsive of the public will. The House of Representatives, as controlled in recent years by the Republican Party, has ceased to be a deliberative and legislative body, responsive to the will of the majority of its Members, but has come under the absolute domination of the Speaker, who has entire control of its deliberations and powers of legislation. We have observed with amazement the popular branch of our Federal Government helpless to obtain either the consideration or enactment of measures desired by a majority of its Members. Legislative control becomes a failure when one Member in the person of the Speaker is more powerful than the entire body. We demand that the House of Representatives shall again become a deliberative body, controlled by a majority of the people's representatives, and not by the Speaker, and we pledge ourselves to adopt such rules and regulations to govern the House of Representatives as will enable a majority of its Members to direct its deliberations and control legislation.	A Democratic House took the Speaker off the Rules Committee and took from him the power to appoint committees and elected the committees from the floor of the House and restored to every Member of the House his right to participate in legislation.
MISUSE OF PATRONAGE.
We condemn as a violation of the spirit of our institutions the action of the present Chief Executive in using the patronage of his high office to secure the nomination for the Presidency of one of his Cabinet officers. A forced succession in the Presidency is scarcely less repugnant to public sentiment than is life tenure in that office. No good intention on the part of the Executive, and no virtue in the one selected, can justfy the establishment of a dynasty. The right of the people to freely select their officials is inalienable and can not be delegated.	President Taft owes not only his nomination in 1908, but his renomination in 1912 to the misuse of official patronage in the South.
POPULAR ELECTION OF SENATORS.
We favor the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, and regard this reform as the gateway to other national reforms.	A Democratic Congress, April 13, 1911, passed House joint resolution No. 39 for direct election of United States Senators by a solid Democratic vote.
TARIFF.
We welcome the belated promise of tariff reform, now offered by the Republican Party, as a tardy recognition of the righteousness of the Democratic position on this question; but the people can not safely intrust the execution of this important work to a party which is so deeply obligated to the highly protected interests as is the Republican Party. We call attention to the significant fact that the promised relief is postponed until after the coming election—an election to succeed in which the Republican Party must have that same support from the beneficiaries of the high protective tariff as it has always heretofore received from them; and to the further fact that during years of uninterrupted power no action whatever has been taken by the Republican Congress as to correct the admittedly existing tariff iniquities. We favor immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties. Articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list; material reductions should be made in the tariff upon the necessaries of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home; and gradual reductions should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis. Existing duties have given the manufacturers of paper a shelter behind which they have organized combinations to raise the price of pulp and of paper, thus imposing a tax upon the spread of knowledge. We demand the immediate repeal of the tariff on wood pulp, print paper, lumber, timber, and logs, and that those articles be placed upon the free list.	Passed farmers' free-list bill May 5, 1911, solid Democratic vote, placing agricultural implements on the free list. Vetoed by the President. Passed woolen schedule, reducing tariff on clothing, June 20, 1911. Vetoed by the President. Passed the cotton schedule, reducing the duty on cotton clothing, August 3, 1911. Vetoed by the President. Passed the metal schedule January 29, 1911, reducing duties on steel and iron. Passed chemical schedule, reducing duty on paints, oils, etc., February 21, 1912. March 15, 1912, we took the tariff off of sugar.
INCOME TAX.
We favor an income tax as part of our revenue system, and we urge the submission of a constitutional amendment specifically authorizing Congress to levy and collect a tax upon individual and corporate incomes, to the end that wealth may bear its proportionate share of the burdens of the Federal Government.	Senate joint resolution No. 40 passed House July 12, 1909, every Democrat voting for it. In addition, we passed an excise tax on March 19, 1912, by a solid Democratic vote, laying a tax on all net incomes over $5,000 a year, and this excise tax was passed by the Senate June 26, 1912.
PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.
We demand Federal legislation forever terminating the partnership which has existed between corporations of the country and the Republican Party under the expressed or implied agreement that in return for the contribution of great sums of money wherewith to purchase elections they should be allowed to continue substantially unmolested in their efforts to encroach upon the rights of the people. Any reasonable doubt as to the existence of this relation has been dispelled by the sworn testimony of witnesses examined in the insurance investigation in New York, and the open admission of a single individual—unchallenged by the Republican national committee—that he himself, at the personal request of the then Republican candidate for the Presidency, raised over a quarter of a million of dollars to be used in a single State during the closing hours of the last campaign. In order that this practice shall be stopped for all time we demand the passage of a statute punishing by imprisonment any officer of a corporation who shall either contribute on behalf of, or consent to the contribution by, a corporation of any money or thing of value to be used in furthering the election of a President or Vice President of the United States or any Member of the Congress thereof. We denounce the Republican Party, having complete control of the Federal Government, for its failure to pass the bill introduced in the last Congress to compel the publication of the names of contributors and the amounts contributed toward campaign funds, and point to the evidence of the sincerity of Republican leaders when they sought, by an absolutely irrelevant and impossible amendment, to defeat the passage of the bill. As a further evidence of their intention to conduct their campaign in the coming contest with vast sums of money wrested from favor-seeking corporations we call attention to the fact that the recent Republican national convention at Chicago refused, when the issue was presented to it, to declare against such practices. We pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law prohibiting any corporation from contributing to a campaign fund and any individual from contributing any amount above a reasonable maximum, and providing for the publication, before election, of all such contributions above a reasonable maximum.	On April 14, 1911, Congress passed a bill requiring publicity of campaign contributions, both before and after elections, so that the people might know what forces were behind candidates for the Presidency and Members of Congress and thereby discern the motive under which the contributions were made.

POPULAR ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

The Republican convention in Chicago in 1908 voted down a plank giving the people the right to elect United States Senators by a direct vote of the people by a convention vote of 866 to 114.

TARIFF REVISION PROMISED.

The Republican Party declares unequivocally for a revision of the tariff by a special session of the Congress immediately following the inauguration of the next President, and commends the steps already taken to this end in the work assigned to the appropriate committees of Congress, which are now investigating the operation and effect of these schedules. In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries. We favor the establishment of a maximum and minimum rate to be administered by the President under limitations fixed by the law, the maximum to be available to meet the discrimination by foreign countries against American goods entering our markets, and the minimum representing the normal measure of protection at home, the aim and the purpose of Republican policy being not only to preserve without excessive duties the security against foreign competition to which American manufacturers, farmers, and producers are entitled, but also to maintain the high standard of living of the wageworkers of this country, who are the most direct beneficiaries of the protective system.

Result.—The Payne-Aldrich-Smoot tariff bill increasing rates 1.71 per cent. A complete violation of party promises.

INCOME TAX.

No action taken by the Republican Party at Chicago on this subject in its platform.

PUBLICITY OF CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. COOPER, a delegate to the Chicago convention from Wisconsin and a Member of Congress, brought in a minority report at the Chicago convention declaring for the publicity of campaign contributions, and it was voted down by 880 against and 94 for. In 1908.

TRUSTS.
A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable. We therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal law against guilty trust magnates and officials and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States. Among the additional remedies we specify three: First, a law preventing a duplication of directors among competing corporations; second, a license system which will, without abridging the right of each State to create corporations, or its right to regulate as it will foreign corporations doing business within its limits, make it necessary for a manufacturing or trading corporation engaged in interstate commerce to take out a Federal license before it shall be permitted to control as much as 25 per cent of the products in which it deals, the license to protect the public from watered stock and to prohibit the control by such corporation of more than 50 per cent of the total amount of any product consumed in the United States; and, third, a law compelling such licensed corporations to sell to all purchasers in all parts of the country on the same terms, after making the allowance for the cost of transportation.	There has been no legislation on this great question. Democratic House passed resolution 148, May 28, 1911, to investigate the United States Steel Corporation, and it has filed its report. On May 9, 1911, it passed resolution 157, to investigate the American Sugar Refining Co. The report is on file. On February 24, Congress passed resolution 429, to investigate the Money Trust. To investigate strike at Lawrence, Mass. (American Woolen Co.), passed, March 2 and 7, resolutions 409 and 433.
LABOR AND INJUNCTIONS.
The courts of justice are the bulwark of our liberties, and we yield to none in our purpose to maintain their dignity. Our party has given to the bench a long line of distinguished justices, who have added to the respect and confidence in which this department must be jealously maintained. We resent the attempt of the Republican Party to raise a false issue respecting the judiciary. It is unjust reflection upon a great body of our citizens to assume that they lack respect for the courts. It is the function of the courts to interpret the laws which the people create, and if the laws appear to work economic, social, or political injustice, it is our duty to change them. The only basis upon which the integrity of our courts can stand is that of unswerving justice and protection of life, personal liberty, and property. If judicial processes may be abused, we should guard them against abuse. Experience has proven the necessity of a modification of the present law relating to injunctions, and we reiterate the pledge of our national platforms of 1896 and 1904 in favor of the measure which passed the United States Senate in 1896, but which a Republican Congress has ever since refused to enact, relating to contempts in Federal courts and providing for trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt. Questions of judicial practice have arisen, especially in connection with industrial disputes. We believe that the parties to all judicial proceedings shall be treated with rigid impartiality, and that injunctions should not be issued in any cases in which injunctions would not issue if no industrial dispute were involved. The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgment of the right of wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the improvement of labor conditions, to the end that such labor organizations and their members should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade. We favor the eight-hour day on all Government work. We pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law by Congress, as far as the Federal jurisdiction extends, for a general employers' liability act covering injury to body or loss of life or property. We pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law creating a department of labor represented separately in the President's Cabinet, in which department shall be included the subject of mines and mining.	We passed— A bill restricting the power of Federal judges in issuing injunctions. A bill providing for a trial by jury in cases of indirect contempt. A bill giving labor a seat in the President's Cabinet. A bill providing for an eight-hour law on all Government work. A bill increasing the scope of the Bureau of Mines. A bill creating a Child Labor Bureau. A bill taxing out of existence white-phosphorus match production. A bill to abolish involuntary servitude of seamen. A bill creating an industrial commission to settle labor disputes. A bill to pay injured Government employees.
PENSIONS.
We favor a generous pension policy, both as a matter of justice to the surviving veterans and their dependents, and because it tends to relieve the country of the necessity of maintaining a large standing Army.	We passed the Sherwood pension bill, very largely increasing pensions to the old soldier, after he had waited for 15 years for the Republicans to do justice to the soldier as they had promised to do in their platform.
ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.
The National Democratic Party has for the last 16 years labored for the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as separate States of the Union, and recognizing that each possesses every qualification successfully to maintain separate State governments, we favor the immediate admission of these Territories as separate States.	May 27, 1911, we admitted Arizona and New Mexico as separate States by a solid Democratic vote.
ALASKA AND PORTO RICO.
We demand for the people of Alaska and Porto Rico the full enjoyment of the rights and privileges of a Territorial form of government, and that the officials appointed to administer the government of all our Territories and the District of Columbia should be thoroughly qualified by previous bona fide residence.	We gave Alaska a Territorial form of government.
POST ROADS.
We favor Federal aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.	We put a provision in the Post Office appropriation bill extending Federal aid to 1,000,000 miles of highway used for rural free delivery, which was cut out by a Republican Senate.
PROTECTION OF AMERICAN CITIZENS.
We pledge ourselves to insist upon the just and lawful protection of our citizens at home and abroad, and to use all proper methods to secure for them, whether native born or naturalized, and without distinction of race or creed, the equal protection of the law and enjoyment of all rights and privileges open to them under our treaties; and if, under existing treaties, the right of travel and sojourn is denied to American citizens, or recognition is withheld from American passports by any countries on the ground of race or creed, we favor prompt negotiations with the Governments of such countries to secure the removal of these unjust discriminations. We demand that all over the world a duly authenticated passport issued by the Government of the United States to an American citizen shall be proof of the fact that he is an American citizen and shall entitle him to the treatment due him as such.	We passed a resolution revoking our treaty with Russia for failing to recognize American passports and discriminating against our citizens.
POSTAL SAVINGS.
We favor a postal savings bank if the guaranteed bank can not be secured, and believe that it should be so constituted as to keep the deposited money in the communities where the depositors live. But we condemn the policy of the Republican Party in proposing postal savings banks under a plan of conduct by which they will aggregate the deposits of the rural communities and deposit the same while under Government charge in the banks of Wall Street, thus depleting the circulating medium of the producing regions and unjustly favoring the speculative markets.	The Democrats in the Sixty-first Congress tried to pass a postal savings law to keep the money in the community where it was earned and saved to promote the business and advancement of that community, but the combined vote of the Republicans defeated it.

TRUSTS.
The Republican Party passed the Sherman antitrust law over Democratic opposition and enforced it after Democratic dereliction. It has been a wholesome instrument for good in the hands of a wise and fearless administration; but experience has shown that its effectiveness can be strengthened and its real objects better obtained by such amendment as will give the Federal Government greater supervision and control over and greater publicity in the management of that class of corporations engaged in interstate commerce having power and opportunity to effect monopolies.	Nothing done to seriously restrict the trusts.
LABOR AND INJUNCTIONS.
The Republican Party recognizes the special needs of wage earners generally for their well-being and the well-being of all. The Republican Party will uphold at all times the authority and the integrity of the courts, State and Federal, and will ever insist that their power to enforce their process and to protect life, liberty, and property shall be preserved inviolate. We believe, however, that the rules of procedure in the Federal courts with respect to the issuance of the writ of injunctions should be more accurately defined by statute, and that no injunction or temporary restraining order should be issued without notice, except where irreparable injury would result from delay, in which case a speedy hearing should be granted thereafter. The wise policy which has induced the Republican Party to maintain protection to American labor, to establish the eight-hour day in the construction of all public work, to increase the list of employees who shall have preferred claims for wages under the bankruptcy law, to adopt a child-labor statute for the District of Columbia, to direct the investigation into the condition of the working women and children, and later of the employees of telephone and telegraph companies engaged in interstate business, to appropriate $150,000 at the recent session of Congress in order to secure a thorough inquiry into the causes of loss of life in the mines, and to amend and strengthen the law prohibiting the importation of contract labor will be pursued in every legitimate direction in Federal authority to lighten the burdens and increase the opportunity for happiness and the advancement of all who toil.	The Republicans usually joined in Democratic measures when public sentiment was strong for them. The Republicans of the House voted against the "Hughes amendment" offered June 23, 1909, providing that no part of an appropriation the House was then making should be used to prosecute labor unions. The vote stood 154 for the amendment and 105 against it—all Republicans.
PENSIONS.
Another Republican policy which must be ever maintained is that of generous appreciation for those who have fought the country's battles and for the widows and orphans of those who have fallen. We commend the increase in the widows' pension made by the present Congress and declare for a liberal administration of all pension laws, to the end that the people's gratitude may grow deeper as the memories of the heroic sacrifices grow more sacred with the passing years.	It must be said in fairness that the Republicans gave hearty support to the Sherwood bill. A Republican Senate defeated the Sulloway pension bill in March, 1911, and reduced the rate for the soldier in the Sherwood bill fully one-half.

POSTAL SAVINGS.
We favor the establishment of a postal savings bank system for the convenience of the people and the encouragement of thrift.	The present postal savings law takes 35 per cent of every dollar deposited, representing the economy and thrift of the community, out of the community where it was earned and congests it in the Wall Street money center.

I have purposely omitted from both platforms the planks on "Civil Service," "Health Bureau," "Railroad Regulation," "Merchant Marine," "Waterways," and "Banking." There has been no legislation on any of these subjects, except on the subject of railway regulation. A railroad regulation bill, prepared by a group of railroad presidents and the Attorney General, Mr. Wickersham, was sent to the Sixty-first Congress by the President, that contained some of the most objectionable features ever presented to Congress in any bill, and demanded that Congress pass the bill just as it was sent to it. The President and Attorney General were severely criticized by Republican Members of the Senate for the part they had taken in attempting to secure legislation so favorable to the railroads. Very many important and valuable amendments were made to the bill in relation to the "long-and-short-haul" clause, submission of the rate schedules to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the time and manner of their taking effect, and the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission greatly enlarged. The administration is entitled to no credit for these changes. They were made by the united strength, both in the House and Senate, by the Democrats and Insurgent Republicans and over the determined opposition of Mr. Taft's standpat crowd.

The Taft administration will not be permitted to take credit for any legislation indicated in the comparison of promises redeemed in the platforms. It did participate to some extent in the passage of these meritorious measures, but not until a Democratic Congress took the introductory steps and after a long lease of power by the Republican Party in both Houses, and that, too, when within four years it contemptuously refused to recognize the necessity for some of these measures in its national platform, to wit: Election of United States Senators by a popular vote, an income-tax amendment, publicity of contributions to campaign funds both before and after election. The Republican Party joined in these reforms when prompted by a consciousness that its safety was endangered unless it responded to the overwhelming force of public sentiment. I shall include an appendix with my remarks showing on most of these measures the date of the vote, the number of Republicans and Democrats supporting the measures, and voting against the measures, that I consider progressive legislation. I note also the names of the Republicans, as a rule, voting with us. Your attention is directed in scanning these votes, to the uniform solidity of the Democratic vote on all these reform measures, indicating the universal progressive sentiment prevailing in the party.

We are confronted to-day with a condition the equal of which has not occurred in generations. A political sea of turmoil and confusion, the turbulence of unrest, a storm in the sea of politics has given birth to a new so-called new nationalism, a so-called Republican progressive policy in that party. Now, what produced this revolution in the Republican Party called progressive politics? Let me answer that question.

First. The fact that the Republican Party repudiated its promise to the people to revise the tariff downward and increased the rates in the Payne-Aldrich-Smoot bill over those in the obnoxious Dingley law and in favor of the special interests.

Second. The fact that the Republican Party permitted and encouraged the Steel Trust, the Harvester Trust, the Beef Trust, the railroads, and many other great corporate bodies to destroy all competition in trade, secure absolute dominion over production, transportation, and distribution in all lines of commerce.

Third. The fact that the Republican Party permitted the great railroad lines of this country to enter into traffic pools, treble, in many instances, the capital expressed in its stocks and bonds that did not represent a dollar of investment actually paid, and permitted those roads to collect freight and passenger rates from the people for dividends on bogus stock as well as on actual cash investment and thereby burden both the producer and the consumer.

Fourth. The fact that the Republican Party permitted express companies and telegraph companies, necessary instruments to the commerce of the common people, to issue and reissue bonds and other interest-bearing securities that do not represent a bona fide investment, and permitted these concerns to collect unjust and oppressive and unnecessary rates.

Fifth. The fact that the Republican Party refused to compel a physical valuation of railroad, express, and telegraph property so as to establish a fair basis on which to fix rates to pay dividends on property actually invested.

Sixth. The fact that the Republican Party has fought for years the proposition to submit to the people an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote, that the people may have a fair chance with the corporations for representation in the Senate.

Seventh. The fact that the Republican Party refused to support an income-tax amendment, so that great private fortunes like those of Carnegie and Rockefeller, those most able to pay, may be required to bear their fair share of the burdens of the Government.

Eighth. The fact that the Republican Party gives financial aid and comfort to the great Wall Street banks in stock gambling, and the further fact that the financiers of Wall Street so control money and credit that no great industrial undertaking can be negotiated without their consent.

Ninth. The fact that the high cost of living involves every one of these propositions in which the Republican Party does not pretend by legislation to give any relief.

These are some of the reasons lying deep in economic and business relations of the Government that have worked a revolution in the politics of the Republican Party.

It is proper at this juncture to inquire who are the real Progressives, the actual representatives of real progressive politics. I call your attention to the fact that the Democracy of this country for decades "opposed, denounced, and unmasked" in Congress and on the hustings the very wrongs against which the so-called Progressive Republicans now insurge. Before progressive republicanism was heard of, the Democratic Party, in legislative halls, in the press, and on the stump, denounced the ends of protection, the viciousness of class legislation, and the dangers of the unrestricted authority of the Speaker. Not a protest against bossism, against Cannonism, or a declaration against the control of the people's legislative machinery by special interests; not an argument against the centralization of wealth and political power; not a cry against excessive taxation and a failure to reduce expenditures, that has been made the theme of so-called progressive republicanism, but what was made by the Democratic Party before progressive republicanism had an existence. After 50 years of Republican rule, with the inevitable and disastrous consequences of its policy, the people sent a Democratic majority into the lower House of Congress two years ago preliminary to the election of a Democratic President of the United States this year, to show the people who wanted a real reform how they could get it.

I want to call your attention to the redemption of the promises the party made you when it asked you to return it to power, so far as the House is concerned, and show you by the acts of the party who the real progressive party is.

The first act of the Democratic Party was to reform the injustices of the Payne-Aldrich-Smoot tariff bill. The most indefensible of which was the wool schedule, under which the American Woolen Co. has enjoyed a monopoly for years in fixing the price on the clothing of millions of American citizens. No man now has the hardihood to defend the exactions in the way of tariff rates that the Woolen Trust controls. The party promised the people, if given a majority in the Sixty-second Congress, to reduce the rate and take a part of the unjust burden from the back of every man, woman, and child that this trust imposes. No one disputes the statement that for the support that the Woolen Trust has given the Republican Party in its campaigns the trust has been permitted to write its own prohibitory rates into tariff bills. It did it in the McKinley bill, in the Dingley Act, and in the present Payne-Aldrich-Smoot law. Mr. Taft confessed that the woolen schedule was indefensible. Believing that he was sincere in this declaration, the Democrats in Congress, on June 20, 1911, passed the wool bill, giving substantial reductions in wool and woolen manufactures, by a vote of 220 to 100. It went to the Senate and, with amendment, passed that body by 48 to 32. After the bill came out of conference the House again passed it by 205 to 90, showing the strong support the bill had in both Houses. The President vetoed the bill on August 17, 1911. In the present session, April 1, 1912, the House again undertook to reduce the revenue rate in the woolen schedule, and the bill passed by 190 to 92, 19 Republicans voting with the Democrats. On August 5 the Senate passed the conference report, identically the same bill the President vetoed August 17, 1911. It now remains to be seen whether he will heed a second mandate from the Representatives of 95,000,000 people to give them cheaper clothing, or whether he will attempt to force Congress to follow the "nonpartisan Tariff Board" that did not pretend to find the difference in the cost of production except on yarn, raw wool, and tops.

You were informed that the International Harvester Trust, Mr. Perkins's trust, had for years sold farm machinery and farm implements in Canada and other countries for less money than they were selling the same articles to our farmers at home. Every well-informed man knows that the Harvester Trust has a complete monopoly in the sale of plows, harrows, binders, mowing machines, hay rakes, cultivators, cotton gins, farm wagons, and all classes of agricultural implements, and that this trust sold abroad last year in competition with the world $27,000,000 worth of its product. The Harvester Trust has an absolutely prohibitive tariff that protected it against any competition whatever from abroad.

We sought also to relieve the farmer and the American people from the Leather Trust by putting leather, boots and shoes, saddlery and harness on the free list, together with fencing and wire fencing. We attempted to take the American people from the grip of the Beef Trust by putting beef, veal, lamb, pork, bacon, and hams, and other products of meat coming from any country with which we had reciprocal relations on the free list. We included in this bill sewing machines, lumber, lath, shingles, cement, and salt. We passed this bill on May 5, 1911, by a vote of 235 to 109, 210 Democrats and 25 Republicans voting for the farmer and the people and 109 Republicans voting with Mr. Perkins and the Beef Trust. Mr. Taft vetoed this bill on August 18, 1911.

On August 3, 1911, Congress voted on a bill previously introduced to reduce the duties on the cotton schedule, and thereby lower the cost of clothing that the shopgirl, laboring man, housewife, and every other citizen of the country must use. Every Democrat, 173, and 23 Republicans voted to get cheaper clothing, and 90 Republicans voted to perpetuate the tariff schedule that makes you pay a high protective rate for clothing and compel you to contribute, as you have done for years, to the New England cotton mills. President Taft refused to sign this bill, passed in the interests of the whole people, and sent it back to the House on August 27, 1911, with his veto.

I propose to discuss in connection with these three bills that were vetoed by the President at this point the limitation originally understood and under which the veto power was adopted as a constitutional provision.

The veto power is a remnant of the extensive legislative prerogative once exercised by the English kings. When the legislative power was wholly transferred to Parliament the exercise of this power was suspended. It was engrafted into our Constitution for the purpose of protecting the Executive and the judiciary from any encroachment upon their respective rights by the legislative department of the Government. The unlimited and autocratic use of this royal prerogative over the Colonies made the new Republic suspicious of the danger in its unrestrained use, and for a long time no definite plan was decided upon for its retention. It was finally lodged in the Executive, but guarded by a two-thirds vote in the two Houses that made the exercise of it nugatory. During the entire existence of the Republic, with the exception of President Johnson, and that in an unimportant exception, no President has attempted to exercise the veto to defeat Congress in framing a purely revenue measure.

The exercise of the veto power by the Executive in a purely revenue-tariff measure is, in the light of history, a most unwarranted assumption. It never was the intention of the fathers that the veto should constitute a weapon with which either to override the voice of Congress in its proper constitutional function or force it into submission. The veto power was placed in the hands of the Executive to prevent the enactment into law of unconstitutional measures and protect the people against legislation, even though technically constitutional, yet, in the opinion of the President, vital to the welfare of the people. The legal right to exercise the veto power is not restricted, but that does not constitute it the authority to override the will of the people lawfully exercised or to force Congress to assist the President in shaping some fiscal or economic policy of his own. The Constitution does not make the Executive with the veto a correlative legislative body in our system of government over which the people must ride with a two-thirds vote before it could write into law its proposed legislation.

In 1867 Congress increased the tariff rates on copper to aid the Michigan copper mines and President Johnson vetoed the bill. Congress, apparently to rebuke the Executive for this interference with their proper legislative function, as it believed it was justified in performing, considering the whole history of the veto power and the purpose of its adoption, very quickly passed the bill over the President's veto. The other two instances occurred in 1842, when the Whigs passed two tariff bills, each with a rider directing the distribution of money derived from the sale of public lands. President Tyler vetoed both bills, and assigned as his reason that their approval would be a violation of the compromise tariff act of 1833. There were only two possible grounds open to the President for the exercise of the veto power, an extraordinary power not exercised by the English Government from which we took it for more than 100 years—against the wool bill, the free-list bill, and the cotton bill, both of which he assigns—one that the bill was loosely and improperly drawn, and the other that the Tariff Board had not reported the result of its investigations on the respective subjects. I shall herein inquire into the past and present attitude of the President with reference to the so-called nonpartisan Tariff Board. Before the passage of the Payne-Aldrich-Smoot bill in 1909, the President was importuned to wait for the report of a tariff board or a tariff commission before he called Congress in extraordinary session in March, 1909. This is his reply:

> The only advantage of appointing a commission with power to revise schedules would be that it would postpone action, thus giving the country time to fully recover from the effects of the recent depression. On the other hand, the existence of such a commission would keep the business of the community on the tenterhooks all the time and be a perpetual disturbing cause. Better have the matter up before Congress in extra session to settle it, and settle it one way or the other for a term of years. (New York Herald, Feb. 27, 1909.)

Quoting from the President's reasons for returning the wool bill to the House in his message of August 17, 1911, in which he refused to sign the bill before he had a report from his Tariff Board, he uses this language:

> When I have the correct information which justifies such action I shall recommend to Congress as great a reduction in Schedule K as the measure of protection already stated will permit. The failure of the present bill therefore should not be regarded as taking away the only chance for a reduction by Congress.

This concession to Congress on the part of the Executive is a very gracious one. It seems that the President did not need the advice and knowledge of a tariff board to keep the indefensible rates in the Payne bill, which had been written in the McKinley bill, the Dingley law, and had been the source of comfort to the Woolen Trust for more than 40 years, but a report of a "nonpartisan tariff board" was absolutely necessary when the representatives of the people wanted to remove a part of the burden of this oppression. We have written tariff bills for more than a hundred years without the thought of a tariff board, but for the purpose of protracting these outrageous rates for the benefit of the Woolen Trust and other tariff beneficiaries, the miserable subterfuge of a "nonpartisan tariff board" must be invoked when we want to relieve the people. In connection with this veto I shall include a comparison of the rates on wool and woolens that the man who runs may see the justice of our cause for a reduction. The following are the rates in the present Payne bill, the Underwood bill that passed the House, the Senate bill, and the agreement on rates in conference that were adopted by a vote in both Houses:

The above was the proposition that we put up to the President, to which he applied his veto. What kind of reasoning does he ask the American people to indorse? For more than two score of years the patient public has endured the woolen rates above indicated under the column marked "Payne law," that the people's Representatives, fresh from their homes, asked him to reduce. He refuses because he does not know whether the conference rates are correct. Why not let the Woolen Trust take the chances of this rate still being high enough to give it all the shelter it ought to have instead of asking the public to take all the chances? Congress undertook to pass the woolen revision, known as the conference bill, over the veto on the 18th of August, 1911—and I mean by the conference rates those in the last column of the table—but the vote disclosed 13 less than the necessary two-thirds. We tried on the same day to pass the free-list bill over the President's veto but lacked 11 votes of the necessary two-thirds. The President proclaimed over and over again his adherence to the theory of protection, and asked Congress to give him a "nonpartisan board" to inquire into the difference of the cost of production at home and abroad as a basis upon which to fix recommendation to Congress to regulate the duties on imports. Let it first be understood, once and for all, that there is not now, nor can there be, such a thing as a "nonpartisan tariff board" so long as parties differ on the constitutional powers of taxation and so long as the theory of protection is arrayed against the doctrine of a tariff for revenue only, with the protectionists in power. Is anyone so completely devoid of reason as to suppose that a President of a great party, a leader of his party, whose absolute existence depends upon the maintenance of a protective policy, would appoint a tariff board that would not sustain that policy and protect it under any and all circumstances?

But to return to the discussion of what the Democratic Congress has accomplished:

For many years the veterans of the Civil War of a half century ago have asked the Republicans to increase their rates of pension, to which they are so fully entitled. Whenever the Republican Party met in convention it passed a resolution in "favor of liberal pensions." The party never intended to increase by general law the soldiers' pension. It believed that it owned the soldier; it treated him as a voting asset in their business; that he would not desert the party, regardless of their treatment and unredeemed pledges. When the Democrats came into power that grand old Union general, ISAAC SHERWOOD, presented a service-pension bill to Congress, and we passed it, giving the soldier substantial increase in pension. We sent it to the Republican Senate, that cut its rate in two. We accepted it, because it was the best we could get from a Republican Senate that undoubtedly represented the party's attitude on the question. We have reason to believe that the soldiers of the country will remember their real benefactors.

Your interest as citizens of the common country is in the policy of the country and not so much in the administration of the law under the policy. If the administration is not right, it can easily be corrected if the policy is right. The way to inaugurate a policy is to elect to positions men who stand for the policy you espouse and whom you charge with the responsibility of initiating it into the functions of the Government. For that reason you are in favor of a strict accountability of public service. I am opposed to the intermediate electorate, because it diminishes the responsibility to the people and lodges that responsibility in the intermediate agent who elects the servant, and such election thereby takes the office out of the spot light of public scrutiny. When you delegate the elective power to some one between you and the office finally chosen you lose control over the officer to a certain extent and he ceases to be your direct agent, and to that degree your government ceases to be democratic. We, as a party, are in favor of removing, wherever possible, from the high prerogative of the people any restriction preventing them from reflecting in the law their needs, aims, and aspirations. Illegitimate tendencies in our system adverse to the interests of the masses can be best averted by increasing popular representation in the Federal Legislature. Let the people by the ballot move up nearer to the fountainhead of legislation. If the House of Representatives is now known and to be known as the "popular branch," because it comes directly from the voter, make both branches "popular" by bringing the Government agencies of this Republic back to the real sources of power—back to the people. That is the reason why we are in favor of the direct election of United States Senators. It is the officer that believes that he is not directly responsible that degenerates into a political boss. The election of United States Senators being one of the things that the Democratic Party stands for, on April 13, 1911, we passed House joint resolution No. 39, to elect United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. We had declared for that proposition in three successive national platforms, the Republican Party having rejected it in its last Chicago convention by a vote of more than seven to one. On the passage of that resolution 193 Democrats and 101 Republicans voted for it, while 15 Republicans were in favor of giving the Lorimers and Stephensons another chance.

On January 12, this year, we undertook to reduce the metal schedule and break away from the grip of the Carnegies, the Schwabs, and the Garys, who hold the steel and iron market by virtue of the assistance of the Republican Party in the hollow of their hand—189 Democrats voted for the bill and 106 Republicans and 4 Democrats voted against it.

On February 21 we voted to reduce the chemical schedule. We wanted to reduce the cost of medicines, paints, lead and zinc ores, and so forth. One hundred and seventy-seven Democrats and one Republican voted to reduce the tariff on these necessities of life. One hundred and twenty-six Republicans wanted the Guggenheims to be protected in their zinc and lead trust and refused to support the bill.

On March 15, this year, we voted on the question as to whether the Sugar Trust, that had confessed to stealing millions from the Government through false weights, and more from the people, should continue to have a gratuity of $1.90 per hundred pounds, and that, too, applied to sugar imported from the Philippines free of duty to the extent of 300,000 tons a year. One hundred and seventy-four Democrats and 23 Republicans stood for cheaper sugar. Five Democrats and 98 Republicans were opposed to taking away from the American Sugar Refining Co. the advantage it now enjoys by special legislation to take unearned money out of the pockets of every man, woman, and child in the Republic.

On March 19, this year, still following out the oft-declared Democratic policy of compelling those who are best able to pay taxes to assist in the support of the Government, we passed an excise-tax bill laying a small amount upon all net incomes of more than $5,000 a year. One hundred and seventy-two Democrats and 79 Republicans voted for this bill. Forty Republicans declared in their opposition to the bill that they were in favor of the vast fortunes of private wealth in this country being permitted to continue to avoid contributing their fair share to the support of the Government.

Knowing that the will of the voter as he attempted to express it at the polls was frequently corrupted with the use of money, we passed the campaign publicity bill, requiring candidates to publish before and after election the amount of their cash contributions and the names of the parties that contributed the same, that the people might know what power it was behind candidates for office and in whose favor the election was being conducted. One hundred and eighty-four Democrats and 122 Republicans voted for the bill, and not a man against it, although at the last presidential election and the one preceding it the foremost characters in Republican politics were not only violently opposed to the publication of campaign contributions before elections, but used immense sums to corrupt and debauch the electorate of the country. I want you to remember that it was a Democratic measure, introduced in a Democratic House, and passed by that House after 14 years of Republican opportunity.

On May 23, 1911, we passed the statehood bill admitting Arizona and New Mexico to the sisterhood of States, as we had promised to do regardless of the political effect it might have on either branch of Congress and for which reason both Territories had been kept out of the Union for years by Republican majorities in both Houses. Against this bill 58 Republicans cast their vote.

We had long condemned the unwarranted autocratic power exercised by Federal judges in the reckless use of injunctions to defeat a just cause frequently of organized labor and which injunctive processes were used to restrict them in the enjoyment of their lawful rights. We promised in our platform to reform the exercise of that procedure. On the 14th day of May, this year, a Democratic House submitted the question for a vote. One hundred and sixty-six Democrats and 75 Republicans voted against the further continuance of that usurpation. As against the rights of the laboring man to have his case fairly and squarely presented and notice given him that he might appear and protect his rights there were 31 Republican votes.

The Democratic Party, having in view the well-being of the youth of the land, introduced a bill to establish under the Department of Commerce and Labor a Children's Bureau, which it charged to investigate and report upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of children and child life among all classes of our people and shall especially investigate the question of infant mortality, the birth rate, orphanage, juvenile court, desertions, dangerous occupations, accidents, diseases of children in the several States and Territories. This is another illustration of Democratic legislation for the "benefit of the whole people." This very meritorious bill was passed in the House April 2, 1912, by a vote of 178 for it and only 17 against it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4421.)

The Democratic Party, recognizing the relative importance of the millions of laborers to the country's prosperity, with interests not only great in scope, but vital to the whole people, introduced a bill establishing a Department of Labor, with a Secretary of Labor, who shall be the head thereof and a member of the President's Cabinet. This bill is known as House bill 22913. It was passed unanimously on July 17, 1912. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 9698.)

Now, I propose to call attention to another bill known as the Commission on Industrial Relations. This bill has for its purpose the investigation of the industrial relationship existing between employees and employers wherever any conflict occurs throughout the entire country. It will consist of nine persons, so chosen that a fair, impartial investigation is had in all cases. Three of the nine men on the commission are to be employers of labor, three the representatives of organized labor, and three from the citizenship at large. There is no walk in life that is not more or less affected by any disturbance of industrial conditions. Strikes and lockouts are expensive to all classes. A complete friendly cooperation of capital and labor is as necessary to the commercial strength of this country as the cessation of military hostilities would be to the peace of the country. It is the particular province of this law to inquire into all the causes for industrial unrest, antagonism between labor and capital, and restore to a mutual and pacific basis both of these necessary elements to the country's happiness. The response of the Democratic Party with this bill to mediate the conditions that constantly arise in the interest of all parties is a wise and timely action.

When the present Democratic House of Representatives convened the regular committees were elected from the floor of the House. Among these committees were what are called the Expenditure Committees. These committees inquired into the methods of administration and the amount of money expended in the several departments of the Government. They have been holding hearings and making reports, respectively, and I include herewith a list of these committees and the chairman of each, so that any person desiring copies of reports can have the same by addressing the chairman, at Washington, D. C. These committees are designated as follows:

Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, Hon. COURTNEY W. HAMLIN, chairman.
Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, Hon. WILLIAM E. COX, chairman.
Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, Hon. HARVEY HELM, chairman.
Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, Hon. WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK, chairman.
Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, Hon. JAMES M. GRAHAM, chairman.
Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, Hon. JACK BEALL, chairman.
Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, Hon. RALPH W. MOSS, chairman.
Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, Hon. JOHN H. ROTHERMEL, chairman.
Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings, Hon. CYRUS CLINE, chairman.

In addition to the Expenditure Committees and the regular committees of the House, the following special committees were appointed:

Investigation of the United States Steel Corporation, Hon. AUGUSTUS O. STANLEY, chairman.
Investigation of American Sugar Refining Co., Hon. THOMAS W. HARDWICK, chairman.
Investigation of the Lawrence strike, Hon. ROBERT L. HENRY, chairman.

The Republican Party and Republican press is not in sympathy with the idea of having the methods and the business of the Republican administration, that have been in complete control of the Government for the last 15 years, examined. All efforts of that kind have been discounted by studied misrepresentation of the amounts expended by Congress to accomplish these investigations, coupled with the statement that no results had obtained. Much valuable information has resulted from both the steel and sugar investigations, and equally good results will obtain from the reports of the other committees.

I call attention to the result of the investigation of the United States Steel Corporation as disclosed by the report of the committee, filed August 2. It finds, among other facts, the following (see pp. 209, 210, and 211):

A corporation speaks and acts through its officers, and the character and scope of its influence are to a great extent determined by the personnel of its directorate. Where two or more great corporations are owned and operated by the same group of individuals, their interests will be identical, and in a great measure the strength of one is the combined strength of all. This is true to a degree where the directorate interlock. This record is replete with instances of the pernicious effect, sometimes upon the Steel Corporation itself and more often upon the public generally, of this interlocking directorate.

The Steel Corporation is capitalized at $7,745,724,284.49, but this sum, huge as it is, in no degree determines its actual power. The influence of this consolidation is measured only by the combined strength and resources of the 24 directors who control its resources and direct operations. One or more of the directors of the Steel Corporation are also directors in terminal, steamship, express, and telegraph companies, having a total capitalization of $1,271,778,890. In industrial corporations the capitalization of $2,803,509,348 and in banks and trust companies having a capital and surplus and undivided profits aggregating $3,314,811,178. Of the $18,417,132,238 invested in the railways of the United States, directors of the Steel Corporation have a voice in the directorate or act as executive officers of railroad companies with a total capitalization and bonded indebtedness of $10,365,771,833.

The United States Steel Corporation, utilizing to the utmost the opportunity for consolidation offered by a holding company and supported and sustained by its allies, financial and industrial, has secured an unquestioned and an absolute dominance over the production, manufacture, and transportation of its product.

The report further shows that the earnings of the Steel Corporation since December 31, 1910, upon its sales to outside customers has given a net profit of 40 per cent on the actual cost of production.

The legislation suggested as a result of the investigation is as follows:

To prohibit concerns engaged in interstate commerce from acquiring stock in other companies.
Or having stock held by others.
Or buying or selling their own stock.
To prevent overcapitalization.
To forbid ore holdings.
To forbid the operation of common carriers by industrials under heavy fines and imprisonment.

No man can view without alarm the unlimited ramifications of the United States Steel Corporation. Its power, developed through its 24 directors, interlocking with those of subsidiary companies, invades every line of commercial activity. Its dominion seems complete. It has thereby been able to well-nigh possess itself of all the valuable natural products that enter largely as raw material into commerce. It owns vast ore beds, mountains of coal, great tracts of timberland, banks, railroads, express companies, steamship lines, and the finest harbors on both shores of the continent.

Industrial conditions in which the United States Steel seems to be the master demand the most serious consideration of Congress.

The investigation of the American Sugar Refining Co. found in their report the following facts:

First. Original overcapitalization of great industrial corporations resulting in increased cost of production, if a profit is to be made on the inflated capitalization, and higher prices for the product to the consuming public.
Second. The temptation of the person who organizes and controls these organizations to earn dividends on watered stock as soon as possible so that such stock may be unloaded in the open market upon the investing public. These dividends can rarely, if ever, be made without increasing prices to the consumer.
Third. The exploitation, not only of the consuming public and of the investing public as already set out, but also of the corporations themselves by their officers, directors, and trustees, who do not hesitate to overburden the consumer, to deceive the investor, and to take advantage of the corporation that has trusted them whenever it will line the pockets of such individual trustees.

The committee, after finding the foregoing facts, recommend that the Sherman law ought to be rigidly enforced.

These several committees have already introduced bills in Congress to correct the evils and abuses that these corporations with their allied institutions have been inflicting upon the general public. There can be no question but what Congress will pass the necessary legislation to relieve the people from the burden of overcapitalization and the excessive cost of production.

In conclusion, I invite your attention to an observation or two on the address of the President at the time he was notified of his renomination for the Presidency. Referring to the accomplishments of his administration he makes no defense for his party that it failed to redeem most of its important promises to the people in the platform of 1908. He had nothing to say about the currency plank or the one relating to wage earners, court procedure, rights of the negro, natural resources, protection to American citizens abroad, arbitration at The Hague, merchant marine, civil service, or the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as States. He makes slight apology for the enactment of the Payne bill.

Speaking of the pension question, he uses this language:

The passage of time has brought the burdens of helplessness of old age to many of those veterans of the Civil War who exposed their lives in the extreme struggle to save the Nation, and recognizing this, Congress added to previous provisions which patriotic gratitude had prompted a substantial allowance, which may be properly characterized as an old-man's pension.

The fact must have been fresh in the President's recollection that the old veterans had knocked at the door of Congress for 14 long years while his party was in full control of the departments of the Government for enough to keep them out of charitable institutions, but received no response. The Democratic Party at its first opportunity passed the Sherwood bill, prepared by a Democratic Union general, for the benefit of the men who saved the Union at the period of its greatest peril. We sent it to the Republican Senate, that cut it in two and sent it back to us, and it was accepted as the best we could get from it. The President ought not to attempt to deprive the Democratic Party of this distinctive merit that it forced from him and his Senate.

The President casts a longing eye to labor in this language:

Congress has sought to encourage the movement toward eight hours a day for manual labor by the recent enactment of a new law on the subject more stringent in its provisions regarding work on a Government contract.

The eight-hour act was a Democratic act, born in a Democratic House, and the credit belongs to us. The President made no reference to the restriction we placed upon Federal judges in issuing injunctions, and the act awarding a trial by jury in the cases of indirect contempt. The President in his address also discloses what he believes the future has in store for him and his party. He uses this language in reference to the Democratic Party:

We would not have to wait for actual legislation on this subject—the tariff. The very prospect of Democratic success when its policy toward our great protected industries became understood would postpone indefinitely the coming of prosperity and tend to give us a recurrence of the hard times that we had in the decade between 1890 and 1897. * * * It ought to be brought home to the people as clearly as possible that a change of economic policy such as that which is deliberately proposed in the Democratic platform would halt many of our manufacturing enterprises and throw many wage earners out of employment, would injure much the home markets which the farmers now enjoy for their products, and produce a condition of suffering among the people that no reforming legislation could neutralize or mitigate.

These statements are unworthy of the dignity of the President of the United States. There is nothing to be gained by an attempted appeal to prejudice. The President refers to the depression of 1890 to 1897, a portion of the time during which the Democratic Party was in power. The impartial historian in less than two decades from that time has written large the viciousness of the Republican slander that the induction of the Democratic Party into power was the cause of commercial reverses. The survival of the Democratic Party, after half a century of reverses, can be attributed to no other cause except to the indestructibility of its doctrine of government. No other party could have survived them. The millions of intelligent American citizens will not be swerved from their purpose by the language of the President. The laborer in the street, the shop, behind the counter, propose to relieve themselves from the present despotism of the privileged classes. They would be tories to their families and their country if they did not do so.

The certainty of Democratic success this year has been apparent for months. In the face of that conceded fact, the production of pig iron, the sure barometer of commercial activity and confidence, increased more than 2,000,000 tons in the first half of 1912 over the amount produced in the first half of 1911. Our exports of manufactured merchandise is greater to-day than at any time in the history of the country. In every section of the South capital is being invested in new cotton mills for the absorption of that great product. Every line of commercial industry is a complete impeachment of the pessimistic and unfounded utterance of the President that it is dangerous to elevate the Democratic Party to power.

I have a right to say that the Democratic Party has demonstrated itself to be the party of progressive legislation; the party to be trusted with safe and sane reformation within constitutional limits that is now demanded. It has demonstrated its sincerity in many instances by unanimous vote on the bills that I have called your attention to. No Democrat has any ground for desertion from the Democratic Party on the theory that the party is not progressive and does not respond to the demands of the country for progressive legislation, and I am confident that the coming November will witness the greatest political revolution in favor of the Democratic Party that history has ever recorded in a free government.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE AT EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] to preside at the evening session.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the committee report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3258. An act to acquire a site and erect buildings for a school for the Indians of Robeson County, N. C., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 7409. An act to constitute a commission to investigate the purchase of American-grown tobacco by the Governments of foreign countries; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 7407. An act increasing the limit of cost of the post-office building at Atlanta, Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 129. Joint resolution to provide transportation for American citizens fleeing from threatened danger in the Republic of Mexico.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock by Mr. CLINE, the Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 669.

Resolved, That there be evening sessions of the House of Representatives on Thursday, August 8, 1912, and Friday, August 9, 1912, beginning at 8 o'clock p. m. and continuing until 11 o'clock p. m. on each day, during which time it shall only be in order to discuss the report of the special committee appointed under House resolution 148, to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]; that on said days it shall be in order, when the business of the House is disposed of, to move to take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will inquire if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] is ready to proceed?

Mr. JACKSON. No; I do not care to speak until the discussion is open.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] ready to proceed?

Mr. STERLING. I had not intended to use any time now. I supposed that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] would begin the discussion, and I think it is his intention to open the discussion. I think he will be here very soon.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas moves that the House take a recess for 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly, at 8 o'clock and 8 minutes, the House was in recess until 8 o'clock and 18 minutes.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore.

STEEL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, the United States Steel Corporation was organized not to obtain but to retain a monopoly already secured. For years before the thought of this colossal consolidation ever entered into the mind of J. Pierpont Morgan and his confrères the consumer of finished steel was as absolutely at the mercy of the manufacturer as he is to-day.

It was to maintain that status, it was to prevent the recurrence of competition, that this tremendous assembling of iron and steel plants was ordained. A brief review of the history of the companies prior to their consolidation as subsidiaries of the United States Steel Corporation is essential to a clear apprehension of the character and operation of this concern and of the purposes of those who created it.

When iron and steel were manufactured by isolated and unrelated units—that is, when the furnacemen made pig iron and the operator of the Bessemer converter and rolling mill produced steel in its cruder or semifinished forms—and when men of comparatively moderate means devoted themselves exclusively to the manufacture of finished materials such as nails, horseshoes, tin plate, tubes, structural shapes, and so forth—at that time the makers of specific articles formed themselves into associations called "pools," and, as a rule, entered into ironclad agreements by which output was limited and prices determined. There was the plate pool, and the pig-iron pool, and the rail pool, and the shafting pool, and the nail and wire pool.

The parties to these secret contracts or "pools" would elect a commissioner. His place of business was known only to those high in authority and immediately concerned. To this commissioner they reported in detail their output, their capacity, and their outstanding orders. He was the "father confessor," in an industrial way, to each one of the various manufacturing concerns affected by the agreement. He was clothed with extraordinary and plenary power. He could impose fines and penalties on men who dared to keep the law more excessive than have ever been imposed by any court upon the same men for violating the law.

If a company exceeded its output, the excess could be distributed among the parties to the pool. If for any reason it was necessary to pay some plant to keep out of the business, it could close its doors and receive pro rata from the earnings of the rest.

At one time this was an almost universal custom in the iron and steel business. It was the most natural thing in the world that steel makers should have entered into such agreements. The foreign market was excluded by highly protective or prohibitive duties. The home market when once cornered by these nefarious schemes was secure.

At last, in 1896, an association of pipe works found themselves in the clutches of the law. A suit was brought in the Federal court for the dissolution of this association and the seizure of its goods in transit. The whole complicated plan and policy was laid bare for the first time, so far as I know, in a court of justice, and every defense that has ever been offered for monopoly and for combinations in restraint of trade was made by learned and astute counsel in that case. The presiding judge, now President of the United States, in the Addyston Pipe case held that no combination of the kind, no matter how grievous and suicidal the competition might be, no matter how reasonable the arrangement might be, could be countenanced by the law, that it was in the teeth of the common law, and that it was contrary to the express provisions of the Sherman Act.

From that time on there was no excuse for the entering into such contracts by the iron and steel makers in the United States. They knew full well from the decision in the Addyson Pipe case the naked illegality of such conduct. No man knew this better than Charles M. Schwab and Mr. Bope, the general sales agent of the Carnegie Steel Co., of whom I shall speak later, for these men understood every detail in the organization of these pools, every device by which output was curtailed and prices enhanced.

Of such arrangements Mr. Schwab says:

> No man has a clearer appreciation than myself of the evil that lurked in the trust scheme. * * *
> It was founded upon misconception and prompted along the lines of self-destruction. Its fundamental principles were the restraint of trade, increase of price, and the throttling of competition—a trinity that would wreck any proposition, business, political or social.

Finding that such arrangements were dangerous as well as illegal, for a short time and to a certain extent iron and steel manufacturers began to sell their commodities in the open market after the fashion of the farmer, "the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker." There was a measure of competition, and that competition was instantly reflected in falling prices.

To prevent this cheapening of their products, to prevent this competition that they no longer dared throttle by secret pooling agreements, they summoned to their aid the most astute counsel; they commanded the unlimited resources of the masters of high finance, and after years of planning and plotting they evolved a scheme that exceeded the wildest dreams of the most avaricious steel maker. It was along the lines of the old pooling agreement, but instead of pooling their prices, instead of agreeing upon a limitation of their output, they pooled their plants, they placed their stocks in the hands of a trustee with the sole and exclusive power of prorating the profits among a great number of manufacturers.

This pernicious device is known as "the holding company." Ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, mills incorporate themselves, if they are not incorporated before, and then they exchange their stocks for the stocks of this holding concern, which is itself not an operating company at all. Its business is simply to pro rate profits according to capacity and output. Its only purpose is to prevent competition between the various so-called subsidiary companies comprising it. In the Northern Securities case it is unequivocally held that the holding of the stocks of two or more corporations where the plain purpose is to prevent competition and to maintain prices is not an institution that deserves the respect of the law, but a pernicious device designed for the violation of the law.

In a recent address to the American Bar Association, its president, Edgar H. Farrar, declared:

> To my mind, the most vicious of all the provisions in the statutes above enumerated is that authorizing one corporation to own and vote stock in another. This provision is the mother of the holding company and the trust. It provides a method for combining under one management and control corporations from one end of the Nation to the other. Before these statutes were passed, the courts of the country had held with great unanimity that it is against public policy for one corporation to hold and vote stock in another, and the general ground of the doctrine is that such stockholding tends to restrain trade and to foster monopoly. That this doctrine is true has been demonstrated by the fact that most of the great trusts have clothed themselves in the form of holding companies.

In a short time after the decision in the Addyston Pipe case, the greater proportion of all steel mills in the country were controlled and operated by holding companies.

Two great banking houses, or two groups of bankers, known as the "Moore Group" and the "Morgan Group," went into the business of making monopolies while you wait.

The operations of J. P. Morgan & Co. and of the Moores will fill the most startling pages in the history of high finance.

Take the case of the Federal Tube Co., formed by the consolidation of 90 per cent of the companies engaged in the manufacture of tubes in the United States. There was the most active competition in this business. The engineer who inspected these plants describes it as a "buyers' market" and admits that it was to stop that sort of thing, to destroy this "buyers' market," that the National Tube Co. was organized. These plants were inspected, visited, appraised by Julian Kennedy, the greatest engineer in the Western World, who had built rolling mills, had constructed Bessemer converters, blast and open-hearth furnaces, who thoroughly understood the operation and the construction of iron and steel plants in this country, in Asia, and in Europe. He spent months visiting these various tube mills, and then he reported to J. P. Morgan & Co. that they were worth not to exceed $19,000,000, everything included. J. P. Morgan & Co. organized them into the National Tube Co., with a capitalization of $80,000,000, and received for services rendered stock of the par value of $20,000,000, or $1,000,000 more than the whole business was worth. The American Tin Plate Co., the Federal Steel Co., the National Steel Co., the American Bridge Co., the Steel Hoop Co., and the Sheet

Steel Co. were all organized by the same system of inordinate stock inflation by these powerful syndicates. Judge Moore admitted before the Industrial Commission that the plan adopted by his syndicate was perfectly simple; that there was absolutely nothing behind any of the common stock; that they simply purchased the various sheet mills and tin mills all over the United States; that if the owner demanded cash for his mill, he was paid for it.

If he accepted stock in the new consolidation, they issued preferred stock at par, and for every dollar of preferred stock they gave him an equal amount of common stock as a bonus. There is no question about these transactions, they are frankly admitted.

J. P. Morgan & Co. formed what was known as the American Bridge Co., capitalized at $60,000,000, $30,000,000 preferred and $30,000,000 common stock—$15,000,000 of which went to the promoters, and $15,000,000 was distributed among the stockholders. The plants were worth $12,500,000, and J. P. Morgan & Co. received in stock over $2,000,000 more than all the plants were worth for organizing them into a consolidation created for the sole purpose of evading the law of the land. J. P. Morgan, Elbert H. Gary, Robert Bacon, and others, the same group of high financiers who afterwards organized the Steel Corporation, formed what is known as the Federal Steel Co. I have in the report from this committee, in the hearings before you, in the report of the accountant, Mr. McRae, an itemized and detailed statement of every piece of ore property, of every mile of railroad, every mill and furnace held by the company, and the entire property, of every character and description, was worth less than $33,000,000 based upon a liberal physical valuation or by taking a high average of its own stock quotations. And yet on that slender base of actual tangible property, J. P. Morgan & Co. authorized the issue of $200,000,000 of stock, $100,000,000 of which was actually issued. The limited time does not permit a detailed statement of the actual value of each of the constituent companies of the Steel Corporation, or of the extent of their overcapitalization. The following table shows that the actual value of these properties is less than $300,000,000:

American Steel & Wire Co		$40,000,000.00
National Steel Co		18,000,000.00
American Tin Plate Co		13,825,000.00
American Steel Hoop Co		11,000,000.00
National Tube Co		19,000,000.00
American Bridge Co		12,670,000.00
American Sheet Steel Co		17,000,000.00
Federal Steel Co		32,741,455.00
H. C. Frick Coke Co	$36,750,000.00
Carnegie Co	75,610,104.06
		112,360,104.06
Oliver Iron Mining Co. (½ interest)		421,700.00
Lake Superior Consolidated Iron Mines		25,000,000.00
Total		269,276,804.06

The committee, in stating the value of the corporation's properties, has, in my opinion, made too liberal an estimate.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but does the gentleman remember what Mr. Herbert Knox Smith's valuation of these properties was?

Mr. STANLEY. About six hundred million. I quote Herbert Knox Smith a great deal, not that I regard him as an especially reliable authority, but because his statements should, under all the circumstances, be taken as "admissions" whenever they are in any way critical of the methods or organization of the steel corporation. Whenever Mr. Smith admits anything against the Steel Trust it is apt to be true, with this proviso: I do not accept as absolutely accurate his estimates or conclusions. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] will examine Mr. Smith's report thoroughly, he will find statements like this all the way through it. He says of the American Bridge Co.:

> Of the $14,500,000 total cash capital provided, approximately $12,600,000 was expended for plants and working capital, this amount including the $5,500,000 paid the promoter. This left a cash balance on hand of $1,832,000.

And yet, when he gives you in his table the valuation of the American Bridge Co., he far exceeds that figure.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the gentleman at all. I remember this discussion. I do not want to say that the gentleman has made an overstatement. I myself came to the conclusion that 50 per cent of the capitalization of the United States Steel Corporation was water. I want to point out that on a very careful system of tabulations, gotten up in three different ways, the conclusions of the Commissioner of Corporations were that the actual value of the property at that time or organization was about $675,000,000.

Mr. STANLEY. There is no difficulty, as I say, with the data before us in ascertaining the value of these concerns. They are right here; they are visible. Their railroads have had their stocks listed on the stock exchange. They have made a statement in the Hodge suit, before courts and other tribunals, and there is no difficulty in determining the value of these properties. My estimates and the estimates of a majority of this committee are made upon the sworn statement of men who examined the plants and mills and mines and said what they are worth. If the gentleman, for instance, will take the reports of the Industrial Commission, he will find in the case of tin-plate mills the owners of these plants stated that they were worth about $40,000 apiece, and all the mills in the American Tin Plate Co. could be built for $12,000,000. Now, in view of that statement, what is the value of Herbert Knox Smith's unsworn estimate that they were worth $18,325,000? Mr. Smith practically admitted before the committee that he permitted the steel corporation to investigate themselves; he simply transmitted to the President his conclusions upon information furnished by the corporation. Neither the commissioner nor any agent or employee of his bureau ever saw the inside of any of the books or records of this concern. He simply reports on what the steel corporation's representatives were pleased to tell him.

To get back to the matter under discussion, these various concerns—the National Tube Co., the Tin Plate Co., the Sheet Steel Co., and the rest of them—acquired a monopoly—a perfect monopoly—an iron-clad hold upon the ultimate consumer. Under this new and skillfully devised artifice, output could be limited and prices maintained or advanced with absolute and autocratic power.

There arose at this time a complication which the syndicate managers had not contemplated, and which threatened the whole elaborate system. When these steel companies were independent concerns owned by Tom, Dick, and Harry, a tin-plate mill worth $40,000, or a tube mill worth $200,000, could not produce its own raw material, because it takes ten, fifteen, or twenty million dollars to successfully manufacture steel billets, the ore reserve, costly blast furnaces, converters, and rolling mills included. These isolated companies were therefore of necessity forced to buy their raw materials from the larger concerns like the Carnegie, or Jones & Laughlin, or the Bethlehem Steel Co.

After the National Tube Co. had amalgamated 90 per cent of the tube mills into one concern and was making 70 per cent on the actual cost of its properties, "appetite grew with what it fed on" and the National Tube Co. determined that it would appropriate to itself all the profits incident to the manufacture of steel tubes and began the erection of its own blast and steel furnaces and rolling mills. Up to that time it had purchased its enormous requirement of billets from the Carnegie Co. The tin-plate people and the rest of them endeavored to do the same thing.

Carnegie was quick to see the effect upon his business of this effort at "integration" on the part of his former customers. They were attempting to establish their business from the ground up and to retain all the profits obtainable from the business by reproducing all the plants and processes necessary to the manufacture of finished steel products from the crude ore to the marketable material.

Carnegie, acting with celerity and decision, prepared for the anticipated contest with the strategy of a general and the confidence of a conqueror. He instantly prepared for war all along the line, making the most elaborate preparations for the production and sale in the open market, especially of those forms of finished material of which the Morgan concerns then held a practical monopoly. He unhesitatingly entered the industrial arena single handed against the combined capital and resources of the Moore and Morgan interests.

Never for one moment did the firm of Carnegie & Co., until recently a simple partnership, show the slightest concern or the slightest fear of the $500,000,000 consolidation that menaced it. Morgan and the Moores, with their banks and their billions, did not disturb one single, solitary ironmaster who paid more attention to making billets than to issuing bonds. He was a skilled blacksmith, I may say, and not a high-class stock jobber. His stocks were issued in thousand-dollar shares to keep them off the stock exchange. It did not matter to him whether they went up or down.

He has characterized gamblers on the stock exchange—selling stocks they did not own and purchasing securities they did not expect to receive as "parasites feeding upon values but creating none." He secured from the Goulds a contract by which the Wabash Terminal Railroad was to be extended to Toledo; he threatened to parallel the Pennsylvania Railroad, and secured control of the Bessemer & Lake Erie, by this means bringing his ore from the Lakes to Pittsburgh, at the same time securing a back haul on coke for his proposed tube mill at Conneaut.

This single tube mill was designed to duplicate the output of all Mr. Morgan's 17 plants, 6 of which had been demolished because they were worthless, and with an expenditure of $12,000,000 he swears to this committee he was prepared to produce tubes $10 a ton less than they actually cost his competitors. There was fright and terror among the millionaires who had thrown together overnight these huge and mushroom monopolies, organized not to cheapen production but to limit output and enhance prices.

You tell me that these great combinations have come to stay; that we used to have no trusts at all, and then we had the good trusts and bad trusts and at last we have the inevitable trust—the necessary trust—that we must treat them as established institutions, and make laws to suit them; that the holding company is a natural and inevitable evolution in big business; and that Congress dare not now prohibit the further operation of this naked instrument of lawless extortion.

The history of the Carnegie Co. shows how false and flimsy is such a claim. Andrew Carnegie maintained before this committee that a simple firm was more efficient than a corporation. At the head of a mere partnership, and later of a corporation, he forced every one of those steel manufacturers and the banking syndicates behind them to their knees, and they came suppliant and helpless—these huge, inert, and inflated instruments of extortion—and entreated Andrew Carnegie to say how many millions he would demand to license them to again prey undisturbed upon the American people.

Just prior to this time Carnegie had had a little trouble with Mr. Frick. The Henry C. Frick Coke Co. and the Carnegie Co. were owned by many of the same people.

Carnegie was a canny Scotchman, and he managed to get control, through his friends, of a majority of the directors of Frick's coke company, and then these good friends happened to remember that there was an old oral contract away back yonder by which the coke company had agreed to furnish to Carnegie his enormous requirements of coke at $1.60 a ton, when coke was selling at Pittsburgh, at that time, at about $3 a ton; and, having a majority of the directors, this company was forced to deliver the coke to Carnegie. Frick kicked over the traces and brought a suit. Then Carnegie retaliated and attempted to fire Frick out of the Carnegie Co. Another lawsuit was the result. In that suit Carnegie and Lauder and Schwab and Gayley, and the rest of them, all swore about a matter concerning which they had the most accurate knowledge, viz, that the Carnegie Co., all its properties—real, personal, and mixed, included—was worth less than $76,000,000. Subsequently Frick secured an option on this property.

Mr. BUCHANAN. What time was that?

Mr. STANLEY. That was within 18 months of the time the steel corporation was formed, December, 1900; Carnegie gave Mr. Frick an option on the properties for $250,000,000.

Now, a great many of the stockholders in the Carnegie Co. would have gone into the new company which Frick and the Moores were preparing to organize, so that the only actual cash necessary to the completion of the deal was $160,000,000, required to buy Carnegie out. Frick went to Pittsburgh, and he and the Mellons raised $80,000,000. They then appealed to Morgan for the additional $80,000,000 needed to retire Mr. Carnegie. Mr. Morgan refused to raise $80,000,000 for Carnegie's half interest in that concern, because the whole business was not worth $160,000,000.

Then there was no threat of competition. Afterwards came the breach with the "Morgan" and "Moore" groups, and Carnegie declared war. And then for those properties for which Mr. Morgan was unwilling to raise $160,000,000 they actually paid over $400,000,000; and if all his partners had been remunerated at same rate as Andrew Carnegie, the properties would have brought $660,000,000.

This enormous sum of itself is conclusive and overwhelming proof of the intent to create and to maintain a monopoly. Let us see. Here were any number of small companies. No one of them could have bought out Carnegie in the natural development of its business. This contemplated consolidation was proclaimed in all the papers. It rang around the globe, that certain interests in the steel industry were attempting, by cooperative action, by a gigantic conspiracy, to absorb Carnegie. It attracted the attention of the financial and industrial world, and I tell you that those who were high in authority at that time, who by the issuance of a single injunction, who in one hour could have prevented it by invoking the Sherman antitrust act—and you can always invoke it effectively to enjoin the commission of such an act before the deal is consummated and the mischief actually done. This has been done time and time again. But those intrusted with the solemn duty of enforcing the law—of protecting trade and commerce against every illegal restraint, were blind with the blindness of those who will not see, and deaf with that deafness that will not hear, and they permitted this conspiracy against the industries and the peace and the prosperity of eighty millions of people to be consummated, and there was never an affidavit filed, and there was never a murmur from the Department of Justice. And for that nonfeasance they must answer not only now, but to an indignant posterity. [Applause.]

This less than $300,000,000 worth of plants had previously been capitalized at over $800,000,000. Now, in the reorganization they were capitalized at more than $1,300,000,000—one billion in promises to pay. A billion of dollars in stocks and bonds issued, without the creation of one single solitary dime of value.

What did it mean? Let us see? The bonds were worthless unless the 5 per cent in gold was paid when demanded. In this case every 30 days it could be demanded. Five hundred million dollars of preferred stocks, paying 7 per cent. Unless that 7 per cent was paid they were worthless. Those stocks and bonds were hostages to preordained monopoly. Unless they could maintain the price, unless they could sell for inordinately more than was necessary to the economical operation of a plant out of debt and honestly capitalized, the United States Steel Corporation was doomed to failure at its birth. But the power of monopoly was there; the power to wring the price was in the hands of the men who held the market in the hollow of their hands.

Have you thought, have you considered the far-reaching effect of a steel monopoly? The Tobacco Trust is bad enough, but you can escape the exactions of a tobacco trust by ceasing the use of tobacco. The Meat Trust is extortionate enough and greedy enough, but, like the peasants of Europe, you can eat bread and drink water and escape the exactions of the Meat Trust. But there is no economy and no energy and no self-denial that will let you through the inexorable mesh of this web of steel. Like taxes and death, it is inevitable. It reaches every activity of life. It reaches every detail of your existence—social, domestic, industrial. You pay to it tribute in every tax rate. You pay it tribute in every freight charge. The farmer at his plow, the mechanic at his bench, the weaver at the loom, the miner in the bowels of the earth, the blacksmith at his anvil—everywhere, in labor, in recreation, in life, and in death. It levies its greedy and remorseless toll upon eighty millions of men. It is a part of the roof that shelters you. It sleeps with you in your bed, it sips from your cup, it is of the woof and warp of your raiment. Iron is the very vertebra of our domestic and industrial life. That nation is most prosperous in peace and most puissant in war which excels in the cheapness and facility with which the crude ore is converted into all the varied and innumerable uses to which this metal is adapted. When this monopoly was perfected, when this billion dollars of inflated capital was issued, its earning power was based upon the right to levy tribute upon the consumer and to reach him at every turn and at every corner and in every detail of his existence.

Prior to the formation of the American Steel & Wire Co. nails were selling at $1.50 a keg. In less than a year afterwards they were selling at $3.20 a keg. Just prior to the formation of the Tin Plate Co. American tin plate was selling at a little over $2 a hundred pounds, and it went to $5 in less than 12 months.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman to put a date on those figures.

Mr. STANLEY. It is the date of the formation of the American Tin Plate Co. The Steel & Wire Co. was formed in 1898.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I should like to ask whether it was in the nineties, during those hard times.

Mr. STANLEY. It was in 1898. It was hard times for people who bought wire and nails.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Those are scarcely fair times on which to form a basis of comparison.

Mr. STANLEY. Here is the test: If you will get Berguland's History of the United States Steel Corporation, you will find that the high prices which followed the formation of these subsidiaries of the steel corporation were due solely to price manipulation and monopolistic control, since foreign prices did not rise in the same way at the same time. Why, at the very time that they pushed the price of tin plate from $2 to $5 a hundred they were selling the same tin plate at $12 a ton less in Europe than in America. From 1906 until to-day the records will show that they have been selling tin plate at from $10 to $18 a ton less abroad than at home.

Take steel rods or wire rods, from which your wire fence is made. Wire rods were selling at $20 a ton when the American Steel & Wire Co. was formed, and in less than 12 months they sold for $50 a ton. That is the price you are paying for this magnificent organization.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question, if it will not take him off the line of his argument?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. How is it possible for this company to charge from $12 to $18 a ton more at home than they charge abroad?

Mr. STANLEY. There is a very high duty on tin plate. Without the duty that would be impossible. The extortion of the steel company is due to two beneficent institutions—a holding company and a high tariff. One is helpless without the other.

As stated by the majority of this committee in its recent report:

It appears that with the exception of rails and armor plate, steel manufacturers have not yet been able to render effective any agreement international in its scope, limiting output or fixing prices. No such contracts affecting the operations of American steel mills alone and raising the price to the domestic consumer above the cost to the foreign purchaser could be made effective without the aid of the Federal Government in excluding foreign competition or penalizing it by heavy import duties.

By agreement among themselves steel manufacturers have often been able to establish and to increase the price in the home market. Such agreements would have been to a great extent abortive had the consumer of such articles been permitted to procure them in an open and competitive market where the price was not determined either by agreement between a number of small manufacturers or by the inordinate power of a single monopoly. In such cases the producer is clearly entitled to the benefit of competition from abroad, competition at home having been restrained or destroyed by the wrongful act of the domestic manufacturer, and any legislation which renders effective the making of such combinations in restraint of trade or the creation of such monopolies is manifestly indefensible. No monopoly and no combination or conspiracy between monopolies limiting output or fixing prices not international in scope could ever seriously affect consumers if the opportunity was still left open to procure at a fair price in some other market not thus manipulated or controlled the commodities affected by such combinations among domestic producers.

In such a case the power of a domestic monopoly to practice extortion upon the public is directly dependent upon ancillary legislation excluding competition from abroad after it has been successfully destroyed at home. The difference between the cost of such commodities in the domestic and foreign market is the measure of the injury inflicted upon the consumer and of the advantage obtained by the domestic monopoly.

On page 1770 of the hearings are produced tables furnished by the corporation showing the price of the various articles manufactured by it and intended for foreign consumption. By a comparison of the prices given in this list with the cost of the same articles offered for sale at the mills of the corporation it can easily be ascertained to what extent the cost of steel and iron products sold in the home markets have been enhanced by highly protective or prohibitive duties.

It has been pretty well known in steel circles that the steel corporation's export prices have been almost uniformly lower than the domestic prices, but some of the concessions made to foreign consumers shown in the comparison are surprisingly large. In 1906, for instance, there was a spread between the average domestic f. o. b. price of structural shapes and the corporation's f. o. b. export price of nearly $9. In 1908 there was a spread in the case of plates of $7, and in 1909 rails were sold abroad on an average of $4 a ton less than at home. The biggest difference is in tin plates, in which the steel corporation has been for years in sharp competition with the Welsh makers. There was in 1906 a difference of nearly $19 a ton, and in 1910 there was a difference of about $12.50 a ton. A possible explanation of this is that the duty on tin plates is very high, now amounting to 1.2 cents per pound, or $26.88 per gross ton, as compared with $3.92 for steel rails.

The differences referred to above are shown in the following tables, which compare the average mill prices f. o. b. of some of the principal products exported by the United States Steel Corporation since 1906 with the average f. o. b. Pennsylvania mill domestic prices, as reported by the American Iron & Steel Association:

After the United States Steel Corporation was formed it determined to perpetuate this monopoly secured at such an inordinate price. The few old companies left, like the Cambria Steel Co. and the Bethlehem and the Lackawanna and Jones & Laughlin, were on the best of terms with the United States Steel Corporation. They were allied by pooling agreements. They had interlocking directorates. Samuel Mather, the great ore king, was a director in the Lackawanna and a director in the Steel Corporation. Percival Roberts was a director in the Pennsylvania Railroad, which owns the Cambria and the Pennsylvania steel companies, and was a high official and director in the United States Steel Corporation. They had no fears about jogging along in a good price-fixing way with these old companies. But some new Carnegie might arise, and as long as the great ore bodies remained uncontrolled and open on the market the very profits they were making, the very inordinate gains they were acquiring would tempt others into the business, and they determined to forever preclude the possibility of a new competitor in the steel business on a vast scale.

The first man to be satisfied was John D. Rockefeller, who was in possession of the greater portion of the Mesabi Range, the most magnificent ore body in the world. He had 400,000,000 tons on that range. The Rockefeller interests owned the Troy Steel Products Co. in the East. They operated the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in the West, and it was necessary to get Mr. Rockefeller out of the steel business, and that was like inducing Mr. Carnegie to retire from the same business. They had to pay him well. The story of how Rockefeller got into the steel business and how he got out of it is a strange tale with a world of pathos and of meanness in it. It illustrates the sinuous and silent and pitiless conduct of men who forget all else in their search for millions. I intended to show you, but I will not take the time, a map of that great range, which illustrates how that ore was deposited by prehistoric seas. All the ores that up to that time had been found were in slanting veins running down into the earth for thousands of feet.

Explorers in Minnesota, the Merritts—scientists who worked out a theory that ages and ages ago the great divide that separates the watershed of the St. Lawrence from that of the Mississippi was a rugged coast line, its granite cliffs jutting into an angry sea, and those laminated bands of ore forming the deposits of the Michigan and Vermilion Ranges were washed away by the waves dashing for ages against them, and that just as the ocean to-day disintegrates the rocks and scatters them in sand and gravel beds along the shore, so it deposited this heavy ore, having a greater specific gravity than rock, near the jagged shores of this ancient sea, near the granite promontories still resisting the rushing waters, and that in that range were buried enormous masses of precious ore left in the wake of the receding ocean current. With a compass they began to trace the perimeter of the tachinite which marked the primordial coast line, and scientists laughed at them. They traced it for miles and miles until they actually followed the sinuous course of the Mesabi Range; and then they dug a few feet down and unearthed and exposed the most enormous and the most valuable body of ore in this world—a billion tons of it lying horizontally a few feet below the surface. It was only necessary to skim off the superincumbent strata and the mining of this ore was no more expensive or difficult than the dipping up of sand with a scoop shovel. They formed companies; they built a railroad running from the Mesabi Range to within a few miles of Duluth and connecting with the Great Northern. It cost a little over $600,000. And they began to mine and transport ore worth many millions.

A reverend doctor by the name of Gates approached these great but guileless explorers one day and told them that Brother Rockefeller was rejoiced to hear the good news that God had directed these brave men to the Minnesota forests and through the icy air at the head of Lake Superior and had enabled them to unveil this enormous mass of wealth, richer than any gold mine on earth, and that Brother Rockefeller was going to help them since he had heard that they were godly men. And then Gates thanked the Lord that Rockefeller was at hand to assist them; and so these trusting souls took about $20,000,000 in stocks and bonds to New York and turned them over to Rockefeller to be put into a "consolidation" of some worthless properties of the oil king with these priceless deposits of the Merritt brothers. Mr. Rockefeller let them have $400,000, and said, "Take the money along, give me your note, just a duebill. You know how we do that in this country," and the unsuspecting man turned the fruits of all his years of toil and sacrifice—the rich realization of his dream of the great ore beds buried in the basin of tachinite—over to the voracious clutch of John D. Rockefeller. Then Gates came to Leonidas Merritt and said, "You are to be the manager of the concern; Rockefeller is going to 'squeeze' Oliver and all the small holders. We are not going to declare any more dividends, but are going to close this thing down until all the men who are not rich enough to wait for returns years ahead will have to get out of it, and then we will divide the rest." Merritt said, "They would put us in jail if we did that." And Gates assured him, "No; you can not put Mr. Rockefeller in jail with his five hundred millions." Then Leonidas Merritt straightened himself in his rugged pioneer manhood and honesty and replied, "You go back and tell Mr. Rockefeller that when I get ready to steal I will steal for myself." Gates said, "Then you will walk the ties back home," and he did. He went back penniless, broken in heart and in spirit. Half demented, he wandered into the wilds, into the snow-clad forests that fringe the headwaters of Lake Superior, and dwelt among the Indians. It is a sad commentary upon our boasted civilization that there among those semicivilized tribes, among the untutored denizens of the north woods, he found an unsullied faith, a kindliness and sense of duty and of honor, unknown to the pitiless Apaches of Wall Street. [Applause.]

This property which cost Rockefeller nothing, because the $400,000 was immediately reinvested in the property. Rockefeller without delay capitalized this railroad and ore field, under the style of the Lake Superior Consolidated Iron Mines, at $39,000,000, and it is now valued and capitalized by the Steel Corporation at $400,000,000.

A few years thereafter the United States Steel Corporation paid Rockefeller in stocks the colossal sum of $80,000,000 in round numbers for the same property.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman if it is or not true that Merritt swore to a retraction of that whole statement that the gentleman has just made?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes; it is true that Leonidas Merritt came home and found his brothers bankrupt and broken-hearted; one brother laid down and died. It is true that the two other Merritt boys for years, men who had been worth many millions, made their living out of fees received for attending the courts where they were sued and Rockefeller's agent came to them and said: "You beat us in the lower court, but we are not uneasy about the upper court, and we will beat you there." His lawyers said: "We can not represent you any longer, you are out of money," and at last Rockefeller paid him $400,000 for a clean bill of health. They said: "If you will sign a paper stating that Rockefeller was not to blame, we will pay you $400,000," and to save from penury his brothers whom his unsuspecting faith had wrecked, he signed the retraction. Now, gentlemen, what is a retraction worth to any man purchased at such a price? If Rockefeller's course was open and honorable he did not need any statement from Merritt to protect him, and if it was not, no purchased retraction could save him from just condemnation.

Mr. HARDY. What did he say before the committee?

Mr. STANLEY. He said he signed it at a time when his health was wrecked, his spirit broken, and he was worn and weakened in body and mind; that he had wrecked his family, had left them poverty stricken, and he would have signed anything to restore his brothers to something of the position which they had before Rockefeller ruined them.

Mr. HARDY. Did he swear that the statements that he had been telling about Rockefeller were true?

Mr. STANLEY. Absolutely, and the record shows that they are. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] will not question the truth of the statements of Alfred and Leonidas Merritt. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he questions the fact that Rockefeller paid them only $400,000 or that the properties were worth millions?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I want to ask the gentleman if this matter of Rockefeller and the Merritts is stated in the majority report.

Mr. STANLEY. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It was struck out by your own majority, was it not?

Mr. STANLEY. I do not think what happened in the conferences of the majority report has anything to do with it, but four Members of that majority made no objection to having Merritt's testimony go in, and one Member objected to it. I can call his name, if the gentleman wishes it, but I do not think it is necessary to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think it is just to the United States Steel Corporation to couple them with a transaction which took place many years before the United States Steel Corporation was ever thought of?

Mr. STANLEY. I do not couple them with the transaction; the transactions couple themselves. I do not blame the steel corporation for Rockefeller's rascality except that he was a director in the steel corporation. Mr. Rockefeller was consulted at the time the steel corporation was formed. This story illustrates the enormous sum that Rockefeller received for this ore body from the corporation, and is necessary to the formation of an estimate of the actual value of this deposit.

More than that, the steel corporation knew what Rockefeller paid for it, or could have ascertained it; they knew it was worth no such sum as $80,000,000 as an ore reserve, and that this huge price was paid as an inducement to keep Rockefeller and the interests behind him out of the steel business to prevent his interfering with the hold that they had on 80,000,000 consumers.

Mr. KINDRED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. KINDRED. Was one person out of the 80,000,000 people compelled to buy one share of United States Steel stock?

Mr. STANLEY. They are compelled to buy cooking utensils, stoves, tools, railroad rails, plows, trace chains. They can not live, they can not labor, they can not die without paying tribute to the United States Steel Corporation. I do not care who buys their stocks, we must buy their wares, and we are entitled to buy them at a fair price. Before this committee gets through we will buy them at a fair price. [Applause.]

Mr. FORNES. Do we pay any more for the same wares than we did before the corporation was formed?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman mentioned several forms of steel goods which he said were sold at from $10 to $50 cheaper per ton in Europe on account of the tariff. Will the gentleman tell what kind of steel that is?

Mr. STANLEY. Tin plate sold for from $10 to $18 a ton cheaper.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. What is the duty on tin plate?

Mr. STANLEY. I do not know the exact amount, but it was about $30 per ton. It is more than the difference between the price here and abroad.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I wish the gentleman would give us a reference to the figures in the hearings which will bear out his statements.

Mr. STANLEY. If the gentleman will turn to the figures in the hearings they will bear out my statement.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I hope in connection with the gentleman's speech he will do that. I have in my hand at the present time merely the tariff act of 1909.

Mr. STANLEY. What is the duty on tin plate?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not happen to find it.

Mr. STANLEY. It is about $30 a ton.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Perhaps the gentleman is right.

Mr. STANLEY. And the duty on tubes is about $30 a ton. The duty on all of these things is in excess of the difference in price at home and abroad.

Mr. FORNES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. I hope the gentleman will be brief in his question.

Mr. FORNES. I understood the gentleman to say that on all the articles in which the United States Steel Co. was dealing——

Mr. STANLEY. Oh, let the gentleman ask a question.

Mr. FORNES. This is the question: I understood the gentleman to say that after the United States Steel Corporation was formed all of the articles in that line of trade advanced in price. Is it not a fact that steel rails——

Mr. STANLEY. Oh, they are $28 a ton and have been for 10 years.

Mr. FORNES. Then the answer to my question was not correct, was it?

Mr. STANLEY. Oh, I will ask the gentleman to please not bother with catch questions about some single article. Nearly everything has advanced in price since the organization of these subcompanies, except steel rails, and that price has remained exactly the same ever since the steel corporation was formed, and will stay the same until somebody gets hold of the secret agreements between the railroad companies and the steel corporation, and then the price will drop.

Mr. FORNES. I understood the gentleman to say——

Mr. STANLEY. Oh, everybody knows that the price of steel rails is fixed by an agreement between the railroads and the steel corporation.

Mr. FORNES. I understood the gentleman that kettles—that all family utensils—were advanced in price.

Mr. STANLEY. I said those things were advanced at the time of the formation of these various companies, and they were, and that is all I said.

Mr. FORNES. I think the gentleman is mistaken, if he will study the market.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am not here to dicker with any gentleman about the price of a tin pan or a pot all night long. I am talking of things more important. We are discussing great issues, and we are not swapping pins. I hope gentlemen will ask me questions of a more serious import.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I know the chairman of the committee does not desire to do any act of injustice. I would not revert to the Merritt matter were it not for the fact that I think that a remark he made might create an erroneous impression. The gentleman stated that there was but one Member of the majority who objected to the details of the Merritt transaction going into the report.

Mr. STANLEY. That is correct.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I do not think it is correct.

Mr. STANLEY. There was only one objected to me.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I think there was more than one.

Mr. STANLEY. I did not hear from more than one.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. So far as I was personally concerned, I thought the Merritt story was intensely interesting, but I opposed going into all its details in the report, not because of any dispute as to what the Merritts said, but it was due to the fact that this was a transaction that occurred years before the organization of the steel corporation, and therefore I did not think that it was material enough and relevant enough to the matter we had under investigation to cumber our reports with it. The testimony is in the record, and I did not think it advisable to repeat it in the report.

Mr. STANLEY. As far as that is concerned, the record shows that when the Merritts testified there was a vote to exclude that testimony from the hearings, to prevent it from ever being made public, and on that vote four Democrats on the committee voted unanimously to let the public know about that transaction, and the minority voted against it. That is the situation.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think that is a fair statement? Was it not all published in great headlines in every paper in the country long before that vote was taken, and does not the statement of the gentleman's colleague, Mr. BEALL of Texas, this moment bear out the accuracy of the position of the Republicans?

Mr. STANLEY. Publish it in a newspaper and it is lost to-morrow and soon forgotten. Record it in a lasting memorial and it remains there for all time. I make this statement as evidence of the fact that my colleagues on this committee did believe that it was relevant or they would not have voted to leave it in the hearings.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Apparently they voted to take it out again.

There is a great difference between incorporating a statement in evidence taken before the committee and discussing that evidence in a report which is necessarily a brief compend of the evidence with conclusions thereon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to answer any questions, but the time of the debate is limited.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for two questions?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has spoken very eloquently in regard to the issuance of stocks and bonds on property valued at a much less price; I think in one instance the actual value was $30,000,000 and the stocks and bonds value $130,000,000. If that is correct, it was a transaction for which neither the Republicans nor the Democrats, I think, would stand for a moment. Will the gentleman tell us wherein the tariff is responsible for a transaction of that kind?

Mr. STANLEY. Oh, nobody claims the tariff is responsible for paying Rockefeller three or four times what this ore was worth. I said the tariff was responsible for the price to the consumer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Take the instance of the Mesabi Range, which the gentleman has treated so picturesquely. Suppose some man had deluded these unfortunate people by statements which led them to give up their property; could the tariff be held responsible for that?

Mr. STANLEY. I do not claim that the tariff was responsible for it, and have said so. The tariff is not responsible for John D. Rockefeller; he may in a degree be responsible for the tariff.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is not the tariff responsible for making it possible for them to do business in these large amounts?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am talking about the imposition of a tariff, whether it be for protection or for revenue only. I am asking whether that tariff is responsible for a criminal transaction.

Mr. STANLEY. I am not yielding for speeches. Now that is a nice little speech, but it has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do not the people who are earning their bread and butter in this country, who are dependent upon a protective tariff——

Mr. STANLEY. Oh, the people who are earning bread and butter are plundered by the protective tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has not proven it when he shows that one man in the United States robs another, or that one combination in the United States robs another combination, without regard to the tariff itself.

Mr. STANLEY. I do prove it when I show where 165 tin mills went into a combination to raise the price of their product 300 per cent and sent their product abroad and sold it for $18 a ton less than they did upon our own shores, and I do prove it when as you know and I know these things would be sold for the same price here that they bring abroad if the tin makers of Wales could have entered our market duty free with their cheaper products.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell whether this combination has extended to England, France, and Germany, as well as to the United States?

Mr. STANLEY. Not to the same extent, and if it had, the price fixed by such a combination here would have necessarily been no higher than the foreign price if your protective and prohibitive duties had not prevented the foreigner from coming here with his cheaper goods. That is axiomatic.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me put the third question and then I will quit. Did Andrew Carnegie, concerning whom the gentleman has made reference, appear before his committee and testify that he was in favor of reducing the tariff on iron and steel, or of eliminating the tariff altogether?

Mr. STANLEY. Oh, Mr. Carnegie said that the steel business did not need a tariff duty at all, but he is out of business now. And I believe the rest would say the same thing; they will all turn State's evidence as soon as they get out of the business and are no longer a part of the system. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman explain the reason why the man who has made his great profit through combinations that apparently have nothing to do with the tariff is able to ask the committee that all tariff be removed from that article which is manufactured at home and consumed throughout the world?

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman asks me to give Mr. Andrew Carnegie's reasons for thinking a certain thing. I am not a clairvoyant or a mind reader. I do not know why Andrew Carnegie thinks anything. I know what he said, but I do not know what he thought.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the protective-tariff system be responsible for the individual acts of men who happen to make money——

Mr. STANLEY. I must decline to further yield. Now, to get back. After they had secured these enormous ore holdings——

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. Is there any way by which this Government could get after Mr. John D. Rockefeller for his swindling operations?

Mr. STANLEY. Oh, it does; now and then.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will have to ask that I be allowed to proceed without interruption. I have so much to say, and although I sincerely desire to yield, it will be impossible for me to discuss one-tenth of this subject when one colleague bobs up and asks about the price of a pot, and another what made Mr. Carnegie think something. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but I invite his attention to the fact that an hour and a half of his time has expired. I am perfectly willing to yield to him from my time in order to enable him to take care of these interruptions from the Republican side of the House. I will say to the gentleman that if he will observe the clock he will remember that the order that we are acting under extends from 8 o'clock until 11 o'clock, and he will see that the time for the evening is already half expired. I will yield to the gentleman such time as he may need out of my own in which to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has been speaking 1 hour and 15 minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I invite the gentleman's attention to the fact that the order under which we are proceeding supposes that the time shall run from 8 o'clock until 11.

Mr. STANLEY. I am sure that the gentleman from Massachusetts will consider the time as running from 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and under the order by which we are meeting here he has had half of the time out of the three hours to-night. There will be three hours to-morrow night, making six hours.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is the Chair going to defy all the rules of the House by recognizing any gentleman for more than one hour at one time without the consent of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We are operating under a special rule.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I understand that; but that does not abrogate the rules of the House. I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding, and I shall ask unanimous consent that he may proceed, but I shall very much object to his proceeding without unanimous consent. Otherwise I shall call attention to the fact that there is no quorum present if I am not consulted when it is proposed that the regular rules of the House shall be violated.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to yield the floor now. My understanding was that in the adoption of three hours' time any one Member could take as much time as he liked.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I will not make the slightest objection if the gentleman will ask for that, but I object to this general assumption. I repeat that I will have no objection to the gentleman proceeding by unanimous consent, but I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that his hour and a half has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I shall ask for 15 minutes more, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman have 15 minutes more.

Mr. STANLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, to return to this question of the control of the ore reserves of the Northwest by the steel corporation. After the United States Steel Corporation had secured control of all the ore on the Mesabi Range owned by Rockefeller, James Gayley was sent by this corporation to the Superior ore ranges. It is idle to dispute about the tonnage of these ore holdings. Gayley declared that it was his purpose to procure every piece of ore property and every pound of ore in the Northwest, and the corporation's own minutes show that they obtained 90 per cent of all the old range ores—that is, all the ores outside of the Mesabi Range—and they obtained besides this, as Judge Gary said, everything that was good, everything that was first class, and everything that was best on the Mesabi Range, with one exception. To-day there is not 5 per cent of the ore on that range that can be purchased by any outsider at a reasonable price. It is held by the old and established steel companies. Mr. Carnegie, when before our committee, swore that no new steel company could be organized in this country, because it could not get the ore. It was preempted. Mr. Charles M. Schwab, the president of the United States Steel Corporation for years and now president of the Bethlehem Steel Co., swore there would never be another great steel company organized in the United States, because all the ores were preempted.

Mr. Carnegie, out of the business and void of bias or interest, is more emphatic in his statement of a condition with which he is perfectly familiar and of which he is thoroughly qualified to speak:

Mr. CARNEGIE. My view, Mr. Chairman, in regard to steel is that an element has come in which does not affect any other industry of which I have knowledge. Gentlemen, you can not organize new steel companies in this country now. Mark that.

The CHAIRMAN. Why not?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Because they could not buy ore.

The CHAIRMAN. They could not buy ore?

Mr. CARNEGIE. They could not buy ore at a price——

The CHAIRMAN. Are there not millions of tons of ore in Tennessee and West Virginia and Pennsylvania which no great concern has yet preempted and that are available at a small cost? I have heard that.

Mr. CARNEGIE. If no man has ever thought that he could buy these ores and go into the manufacture successfully, that is very significant. There have been hundreds of men in search of such a treasure. Do not run away with the idea that the ores of Tennessee can well compete with the ores they are getting from Lake Superior.

The CHAIRMAN. Why not?

Mr. CARNEGIE. Because the elements are not there. The ores are not the same. The expenses are higher. They are in the wrong place for manufacturing. The consumer is not near there. Believe me, the search for ore in this country has been very, very keen for many years. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. * * * Mr. Schwab claims that all of these ores, and Mr. Perrin and the rest of them say the same thing, are now held by the companies in operation, and that there is no more of it in the market available. Is that true?

Mr. REED. Mr. Schwab did not testify to that. Mr. Perrin did and Mr. Moore and Mr. ——

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Schwab said, if I remember correctly, that there would be no more new great iron concerns, because there was no ore available.

Mr. CARNEGIE. Yes; he did. Schwab is an authority on that. I think Schwab's statement is correct.

Mr. Chairman, you would be amazed at the price it would bring if there were new fields of ore discovered to-day. The end of the Lake Superior region is not far away, and what we are going to do I do not know. If there would be some further discoveries, possibly that would help the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there ores in the Lake Superior region now in sufficient quantities that could be secured and smelted at such a cost, by independents, as to make them available for the purpose of utilizing those ores as the basis of new competing concerns with the existing concerns?

Mr. CARNEGIE. The best evidence of that is that there has been no attempt of any competing concerns for many, many years.

Judge Gary was forced to admit before the Ways and Means Committee in 1908 that the steel corporation possessed an "ultimate" monopoly of raw materials:

Mr. COCHRAN. Now, among the conditions that contribute to that situation, an important element is your ownership and control of the ore supply?

Mr. GARY. Yes; of course, it is.

Mr. COCHRAN. You practically do control the ore supply of the country?

Mr. GARY. No; not now. Not for the immediate future.

Mr. COCHRAN. Well, the ultimate supply?

Mr. GARY. Yes; I think so—that is, pretty nearly. It is not absolute control.

To bring about the condition described by Mr. Carnegie, the Steel Corporation was willing to go to any length, to pay any price. The Hill interests were the last to surrender their great holdings to the Steel Corporation. Mr. Hill thoroughly understood the strategic advantage of his position, as evidenced by the inordinate demands made upon the Steel Corporation for the lease of his properties.

This year the Steel Corporation will pay $1.84 a ton for 4,500,000 tons—59 per cent iron—and incur an additional expense of not less than 10 cents per ton for concentrating 60 per cent of it. Allowing 5 cents for the extra cost of concentration, this ore delivered at Duluth will cost the Steel Corporation $1.89 a ton. The corporation can deliver the same ore from its own mines, now stripped and developed and tapped by two railroad systems, at not to exceed 70 cents a ton. This enormous bonus was paid and is paid for no other purpose than to keep this ore off the market or to prevent the organization of new steel companies by the Hill interests.

It must be remembered that these Hill properties involved more than a reserve for the future. New and competing steel companies might be organized at any time so long as they remained open to investors. They were an actual menace.

This the corporation knew, and so did Mr. Hill. Astute as Judge Gary, with a breadth of vision equal perhaps to Morgan's, the "empire builder" saw at an early date the possibility of this new and unexampled iron range, as did Rockefeller, and while the latter was assimilating the Merritt holdings, he secured a region only less extensive from the lumbermen, Wright and Davis, at a little greater expense.

Hill was more than an owner of iron ores. He was essentially a shipper, to such an extent that at one time the corporation hoped to secure these ores simply by giving all the traffic contracts for their shipment to the Great Northern lines.

Even the Commissioner of Corporations, Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, can find no palliation or excuse for this transparent endeavor to completely monopolize the raw materials of a continent. He says:

The only reasonable explanation which the bureau has found for this unusual transaction is that it was designed to prevent this ore from falling into the hands of competitors of the corporation. Had this ore been sold or leased in small parcels to a large number of independent producers, this might have tended to depress the price of ore as well as to foster competition in the manufacture of iron and steel. On the other hand, if these ore lands were simply held by the Great Northern interests without development, this would leave the opportunity open for the organization of a very important rival to the Steel Corporation. At this time, however, the Steel Corporation was the only concern in the iron and steel business which was in a position to consider the acquisition of these Hill ore lands in a single block. By securing control of these enormous reserves the Steel Corporation obviously strengthened its control of the ore industry and at the same time put obstacles in the way of further competition in the iron and steel industry.

The momentous statement of Mr. Carnegie that "an element has come into the steel industry which does not affect any other"—i. e., its absolute ownership and control of the sole supply of its raw material—should command the most earnest and serious attention of legislators.

No monopoly can be absolutely secure or for any length of time inordinately oppressive which is dependent upon another industry for its subsistence, which it does not control or can not successfully exploit. It, in the nature of things, must meet resistance from two directions continually, from the producer of its raw materials on the one hand and the consumer of its finished product on the other.

The American Tobacco Co., while destroying its competitors and controlling the price of its products to consumers, was in many instances successfully resisted by the organized and determined action of the planters who produced its raw materials.

Cattle growers by the cooperative establishment of abattoirs and the encouragement of the local butcher can to a degree escape the exactions of the great packing houses.

Every monopoly formed by the consolidation and control of any number of mills or shops and factories is to a greater or less degree dependent upon economy and efficiency in the operation of its plants, the skill of its workmen, and the excellence or cheapness of its product. Too inordinate a charge, too wanton an oppression, or too incapable a management of its business may encourage others to invade the preempted industry, and to contend for the lucrative profits enjoyed by a badly managed business.

But no amount of capital, no economy, no industry, no inventive genius can create the raw material, can reproduce an ore deposit. Intrenched in such an ownership, it becomes as impregnable as the metallic ranges upon which it rests. All rivalry, all opportunity to enter the business, thus secure in its exclusive control of a natural resource, which can neither be purchased by the expenditure of capital nor created by labor, is forever precluded. Such a monopoly, while reducing the wage of the laborer and enhancing the cost to the consumer, may contemplate with unconcern the inflation of its securities, and the inefficiency of its plants, or wastefulness and incompetence in the conduct of its affairs. The prosperity or the power of the steel corporation is not determined, however, by the extent of its control of any single branch of the industry.

This company was designed to comprehend within one corporate ownership every phase and every department of the industry, and to control every process and every agency incident to its operation. The acquiring of the ore reserves of the Northwest was but a single one of a long and coordinated series of carefully prepared plans by which the corporation proposed to dominate this business, in all its vast and varied ramifications, throughout the whole domain of mining, manufacture, transportation, and sale of its product.

After the Hill ores were secured, after 80 per cent of all the available ores in the Northwest were in the grasp of the steel corporation, and all the rest of the steel companies in the United States were compelled to obtain their reserves from the remaining 20 per cent, from that little 20 per cent there escaped them now and then a few million tons which would be made into pig iron and that pig iron offered for sale. And do you know the simple expedient adopted to control the price of that pig iron? They simply bought all the pig iron in the United States offered for sale in the open market, and their books show it. They absolutely controlled the price of pig iron. You will find it in their minutes over and over again the same statement, "Price pig iron fixed" at so much a ton.

The corporation's own records show they discussed the propriety of buying at one time over 2,000,000 tons of pig iron. Let it be always remembered that the control of pig iron necessarily means the unquestioned supremacy and complete control of the entire industry. When they could set the price on pig iron, they were able arbitrarily to determine the price of iron and steel in every other shape and form in the United States. Pig iron is the industrial standard by which the cost and value of the metal in all subsequent stages of manufacture is determined, for the reason that semifinished steel is not sold at so much a ton flat; it is sold at so much more than the price of pig iron at a given date. In an order for a thousand tons of steel billets, to be delivered six months from date, the purchaser agrees to pay so much more a ton than the price of a ton of pig iron at that date. The corporation sells billets and other semifinished material to independent steel makers all over the country, to be delivered from six months to a year from date, and when the time comes to deliver the price of pig iron is deliberately raised; and in its own minutes this concern admits it and that it is done for the deliberate purpose of destroying competitors under contract to purchase their requirements of raw material from this concern.

The whole plan and the effect of its operation upon competitors is recorded in detail in the records of the corporation. In the minutes of the directors of the Carnegie company I find the following memoranda:

The average price of pig iron for November was $22.81. * * * This would have the effect of advancing the price on our raw material contracts nearly $3 a ton. * * * When you consider that the price of finished material to-day is only $3 or $4 a ton above this figure, * * * how these people can pay this price for their raw material is a pretty hard problem.

And again:

Some of the prices made are simply astounding, especially considering the fact that our competitors have to buy their billets at a figure that does not permit of more than $2 a ton for conversion. * * * On forgings the mills which are in this business are holding up the price of billets and pulling down the price of finished forgings, which is practically putting the independent forge makers out of the market.

The directors complacently surveyed the desperate struggles of the small manufacturer, caught in the secret and sinister manipulation of this "sliding scale" as in a vise, and they coldly record in their minutes, "That will mean more shutdowns in the future than in the past." Others were forced into the hands of receivers, and standing in the midst of the ruin and wreckage of the victims of these pernicious plots they surveyed the havoc they had wrought among the "little fellows," especially the "agricultural people"—wagon makers, plow works, and other competitors of the Harvester Trust—they contemplated their frantic appeals for justice and futile efforts to escape the snare set for their helpless feet with complacency, if not with delight. When the last competitor that was "not good" was out of business it is recorded: "All competition is eliminated with the exception of Bethlehem," and that was owned by Charles M. Schwab.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD a table prepared from the figures of the American Iron & Steel Association, showing the Pittsburgh wholesale prices in eight leading steel products from 1901, the year the Steel Trust was organized, down to 1910.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the table specified. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The table is as follows:

Pittsburgh wholesale prices for each year of the decade.

Year.	Steel rails.	Ship plates, Pittsburgh.	Wire nails, Pittsburgh.	Steel bars, Pittsburgh.	Beams, Pittsburgh.	Tin-plate mill.	Bessemer iron, Pittsburgh.	Steel billets, Pittsburgh.	Average.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, when I found I could not agree with all the conclusions and join in all the recommendations of either the majority or the minority of the committee, I presented to the House my separate views. In that statement I briefly suggested a line of legislation that seemed to me to be needed to meet the situation. I also stated some of my reasons for dissenting from the views of my colleagues. I now ask the indulgence of the House for a short time to amplify my views as expressed in that report.

There seems to be one point on which all of the members of the committee are agreed, and that is that Federal legislation of some kind is needed to meet the situation. It is the unanimous opinion of the committee that Federal regulation is desirable. Neither the majority nor the minority members have agreed among themselves as to what that legislation should be.

It is clear that whatever legislation is had, whether it be to suppress and prevent monopolies or whether it be to recognize and regulate them, it must be based on that provision of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce. Under that clause Congress has broad powers over all corporations engaged in trade between the States, and this power exists to the exclusion of all other power. The States may not interfere in the regulation of such corporations in any phase or particular of their management and control where Congress has seen fit to extend the Federal jurisdiction.

Our dual system of government makes the regulation of interstate corporations a perplexing and difficult problem. The lack of uniformity in the laws of incorporation in the several States greatly multiplies the difficulties. There are as many different plans of chartering corporations as there are States, and these different plans provide for different charters. The powers granted and the limitations prescribed by the charters of one State do not agree with the powers granted and the limitations prescribed by the charters of other States, even though the objects and purposes of the corporations be the same.

Out of this unfortunate condition under which the commerce of the country is being carried on the first thing to be wrought is harmony—harmony of rights, harmony of privileges, and harmony of restrictions—to all corporations engaged in the same line of business, thus giving to all, so far as can be given by law, equal opportunities to compete for the markets which they desire.

If Congress can convert this confusion of rights, this Babel of privileges into one harmonious system, it will have done much to simplify the problem. When that step has been accomplished, I am convinced that our way will be open, clear, and well defined, whereby we may suppress and prevent trusts and monopolies, without injury to the business and commerce of the country and with complete relief to the people, from the wrongs of these dreaded combinations. It is with this end in view that I offer to the House and to the country my view of needed legislation.

In considering the question of the power either of the State or the Federal Government to exercise dominion over corporations the fact must always be borne in mind that a corporate charter is not a right to be demanded but purely a privilege to be granted. This proposition is axiomatic; otherwise the Government is subservient to some other power. It is of the essential essence of governments, both State and National, that they in their respective domains are supreme. This being true, the Government may prescribe whatever conditions and impose whatever limitations it sees fit on either men or capital seeking to exercise corporate power.

So far, the States alone, with only a few exceptions, have exercised the power of granting corporate privileges. They have granted these privileges to interstate and intrastate corporations alike. This is true as to interstate corporations, because and only because the Federal Government has not, to this time, seen fit to exercise its dominion, granted it by the interstate clause of the Constitution, over these corporations in relation to their creation. When Congress does by legislation declare jurisdiction over the subject, then Federal dominion will be extended thereby just as far as that declaration goes, and that dominion will be exclusive. State jurisdiction will be diminished in the same degree as Federal jurisdiction has been increased. This has been the declaration of all the courts, and in the very nature of the case must be true. Two powers can not exercise the same dominion over the same subject matter any more than can two objects occupy the same space at the same time. To illustrate by example: From the beginning of State governments down to 1908 the States exercised entire jurisdiction over personal injuries both in interstate and in intrastate commerce. This was because the Federal Government had not acted; Congress had not spoken. When Congress, by virtue of its power under the interstate clause of the Constitution, did speak, in the passage of the employers' liability act, and thereby extended Federal dominion over that subject, the jurisdiction of the States ceased and the personal-injury statutes of all the States in the Union, so far as they related to cases arising in interstate commerce, were by that act of Congress nullified and void.

It seems clear therefore that Congress, its power over interstate commerce being supreme and exclusive, may pass legislation providing for a system of Federal incorporation. It seems equally clear that when it does so the power of the States to grant charters to such corporations will be extinguished. The inevitable result will be a uniform and harmonious system of charters giving equal privileges and imposing equal restrictions on all alike and applicable alike on every acre of domain over which the Constitution prevails or the flag floats.

Mr. Speaker, my proposition, then, is, first, a uniform system of Federal charters to corporations engaged in interstate commerce. The application for a charter granting just such privileges and imposing just such limitation as Congress may prescribe by law should be a condition precedent to the issuance of the charter. The law should say to all, "You may engage in interstate commerce only on the condition that you ask for and receive a Federal charter defining your powers, your privileges, and your limitations."

I would not undertake, in the time allotted me, to give in detail the provisions of such a law. Indeed, I am not prepared to do so. There are, however, certain broad principles which I do not hesitate to say should be declared. It should provide for complete publicity by a system of reports to be made by the corporation to some Government agency designated by the law to receive them. These reports should show clearly the character and purpose of the corporation, the actual physical value of the corporate property, the amount at which the corporation is capitalized, which in no case should exceed the actual value of the corporate property, the volume of the business done from time to time by the corporation and its profits, and the conditions of labor engaged in its service. It should also provide for a system of Government inquiry into the affairs of the corporation from time to time to ascertain the correctness of these reports. This Government agency, whatever it may be, should be required to make reports to the President and to Congress showing the condition of all Federal corporations and indicate any violations of law which have been disclosed.

It would not be my purpose by such a plan to create government by commission, to which some gentlemen so strenuously object, nor in any sense extend the bureaucratic power of any department. This department, bureau, or commission, whatever it may be called, should have no power whatever to grant or deny privileges or favors. It should be its plain duty to receive and make reports as prescribed by law.

Congress may eliminate under this plan evils which have grown up and which contribute mightily to the creation of monopoly. One condition of every Federal charter should be that no corporation should own or control any part of the capital stock of another corporation engaged in the same line of industry or in any way related to it. Another should forbid the directors of one corporation from being directors in another and thus avoid the evil of interlocking directorates, a cunning device often employed to bring two or more corporations under one management, thus tending to create a trust and consequent monopoly.

It does not seem to me that the enforcement of such a law would be difficult. On the contrary, its enforcement would be so simple and easy that there would be but little likelihood of its violation. Supervision would be so complete that the Department of Justice would have at hand at all times the facts, if any, constituting disobedience of the law, and this would be an impelling influence to an obedience of the law. The present antitrust laws, if not adequate now, could readily be amended to provide punishment for violations of the law, or the law itself might work a forfeiture of the charter for disobedience of its provisions.

Before leaving this phase of the matter I desire to say that, in my opinion, the first great good accruing to the people by such legislation would be the elimination from business and trade of watered stock. There is no phase of our present system of corporate business from which so many evils flow as that of overcapitalization. No law or the absence of law permitting it can be defended on any ground, either of morals or justice. It has been used to cheat both classes of people that come in touch with the corporation indulging in it—those who buy the stock of the corporation and those who buy its products. Many people innocently believe that there is some relation between the face and the actual value of a share of stock. This deception has been apparently encouraged until millions of our people have invested their earnings on that basis, and many of them have been cheated and ruined. For a State to issue corporate privileges permitting and not expressly forbidding overcapitalization is, to say the least, a legalized device to make fraud easy.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Could the gentleman from Illinois state readily what States permit overcapitalization at the present time?

Mr. STERLING. I know many of them do. Illinois, Iowa, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and many of the others; practically all of the States do.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think not. Massachusetts has forbidden it for a good many years, but the gentleman from Kentucky can tell us whether Kentucky forbids it.

Mr. STANLEY. Kentucky forbids it; and I think this work to which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers gives the number of States that forbid overcapitalization. I am of the impression that there are only a few States in the Union that permit unlimited overcapitalization. New Jersey is one of them.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. New Jersey forbids it, I think, now.

Mr. STANLEY. Yes; very recently it has.

Mr. STERLING. The gentlemen from Massachusetts and Kentucky ought to know better than I about their own States, but I am of the opinion that both of them are mistaken.

Mr. STANLEY. Most of the States have a limit on overcapitalization.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does Illinois prohibit overcapitalization?

Mr. STERLING. It does not. I am sure but few States limit capitalization.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. When I stated that Massachusetts forbids it, I meant that it does not in all classes of securities. It forbids it entirely in all public-service corporations.

Mr. STERLING. I have not investigated that question particularly, but it is my opinion that there are very few, if any, States that limit capitalization in their general incorporation law. I presume all do in their banks and financial institutions.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Upon the question of Federal incorporation the gentleman has satisfied himself, I presume, that there is no constitutional objection or constitutional difficulty about that?

Mr. STERLING. I do not believe that there is a possibility of any violation of the Constitution by Federal incorporation. I gave my reason for thinking so in the first part of my remarks.

Mr. GARRETT. I know the gentleman proceeded upon that theory. He did not discuss the constitutional phases of it, however. I think I will say to the gentleman that there is very grave doubt as to whether there can be a constitutional grant of a charter. Of course I do not want to take the gentleman's time now.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I did discuss that question. I believe that what I have said upon that subject is conclusive. I do not believe there can be a possibility of a constitutional objection to Federal incorporation. Congress, whenever it sees fit to act, has absolute power over interstate corporations, exclusive power, supreme power, and the minute it acts and to the extent it acts then State jurisdiction ceases.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Tennessee will permit, I do not want to interrupt the colloquy, but I desire to get the idea of the gentleman from Illinois clearly, and then I can understand both gentlemen better. Is the gentleman from Illinois maintaining now that the Federal Government can incorporate an intrastate corporation?

Mr. STERLING. No. I am speaking of interstate corporations.

Mr. STANLEY. What does the gentleman mean by an interstate corporation?

Mr. STERLING. Corporations engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. GARRETT. As incident to the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, the gentleman thinks the Congress could provide for the granting of charters by the Federal Government, as I understand his position.

Mr. STERLING. That is my position exactly.

Mr. GARRETT. He does not think there is any doubt about it?

Mr. STERLING. That is my position.

The result of overcapitalization has been demoralizing to the business and capitalization of honest corporations. The practice has so shaken the confidence of the people in all corporations that the good ones have suffered and capital has often been diverted from safe and sound investment.

When the United States Steel Corporation was formed in 1901 the actual value of its physical property was not to exceed $700,000,000. Herbert Knox Smith in his report places it at $682,000,000. Its capitalization at the time of its organization was $1,400,000,000. So it was organized with a capital of more than twice the actual value of the property which it acquired from the constituent companies.

It is hardly probable that this huge concern would have been formed had it not been for this legalized opportunity to exploit these properties. I doubt if the allurements of monopoly alone would have been sufficient to induce this gigantic creation.

If this corporation had capitalized at the actual value of its tangible property it might have reduced its profits by one-half and then paid a very respectable dividend on its stock. It paid during the first 10 years of its existence about 12 per cent on the value of its physical properties, or about 6 per cent on its capitalization. The consumer, of course, paid the bills. He was paying the profit not only on real investment, but on millions of fictitious values.

It is claimed that these properties are worth the amount of the total capitalization because they pay a fair dividend. This is not the true measure of value. Wealth can not be created in that way. If so, then the mere fiat of incorporated monopoly may produce wealth. It has only to multiply its capital stock and then by the exercise of its monopolistic powers raise the price of its product sufficiently to pay a fair dividend and the thing is done. But where will it stop? Under our present system it will not stop. Greed and avarice will not let it stop. The strong arm of the Government alone can compel it to stop.

To capitalize on a basis of profits is in some instances to capitalize monopoly itself. The only true and honest basis of capitalization is the value of the physical property of the corporation. Let that be the rule of law, then point to the man, if you can, that will suffer by it.

Some gentlemen say Federal incorporation is an invasion of the rights of the States. The States have no rights over interstate corporations. They delegated all rights and powers over commerce between the States to the Federal Government, and such a position is a plain denial to Congress of the powers granted it by the Constitution. But how futile such an argument, even though it were valid. Under the present system the people of every State may be the helpless victims of corporate greed, organized under laws, in the making of which they had no voice, and over which they have no control. I deem it certain that the people of Illinois will get more even-handed justice in dealing with industrial corporations whose powers are hedged about by Federal statute, in the making of which they have a voice, than in dealing with those organized under the laws of many of the States.

On this point I desire to quote from Hon. Reuben M. Benjamin, a law writer of distinction, of my home city:

> Since monopolies are against "common right," and since the right of industry—the right of competition in all ordinary industrial pursuits—is both a liberty and a property, and is entitled to protection "under all State constitutions." The action of the Legislature and judiciary of New Jersey in recent years, in changing the free public policy of the common law to that of creating and upholding gigantic corporations designed to destroy all competition, is really an usurpation on the part of the State Legislature upheld by the State judiciary, and can receive no support from the true Jeffersonian advocates of State right.

Since it is agreed that the Federal Government has the power to control and regulate interstate corporations, and since it is agreed that it ought to do so, it follows that they should be the creatures of that Government, in order that there may be harmony of being, harmony of rights and limitations, and harmony of purpose.

With such publicity and control it will be easy, it seems to me, to separate the good from the bad, the desirable from the undesirable, and to check all tendencies in the future toward unlawful trusts, combinations in restraint of trade, and monopolies.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption right there?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. On the question of Federal incorporation and the constitutionality of it, I wish to ask if the attention of the gentleman, in studying that question, was directed to the fact that in the Constitutional Convention it was expressly proposed, in a proposition submitted by Mr. Madison, of Virginia, and, I think, also by Mr. Pinckney, that the Federal Government should be given the power to grant charters to corporations, and this was not adopted; and whether the gentleman regards that as having any significance in connection with the construction of that question?

Mr. STERLING. Considering the interstate-commerce clause, which gives Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States, and the fact that the courts have said repeatedly that that means that Congress has the exclusive power over interstate commerce and the agencies thereof, and that when it sees fit to act on any phase of the subject then the rights of the States cease, it seems to me there can be no question but that the Federal Government can take jurisdiction of the creation and control of interstate corporations to the entire exclusion of the States.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Is it not true that the original charter of the Santa Fe Railroad was a United States charter and also the Union Pacific?

Mr. STERLING. I do not believe that Congress granted those charters on the ground that it got the power from the interstate-commerce clause. It acted in those instances on the power derived from the clause relating to military and post roads.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, the suggestion is made in the report of some of my colleagues on the committee that the true remedy for relief does not lie in the dissolution of the trusts. It is believed by some that it is the duty of government to recognize monopoly and then protect the people by fixing the price of its product. That idea I desire to combat with whatever power I have. It seems to me to be un-American. It does not take into account the real character of our institutions or the true spirit of the American people. I have no doubt my colleagues and many other persons who adopt that view are sincere. Others espouse it, perhaps, because to them it is new. In these times a new thought always finds a multitude of champions simply because it is new. To them it means progress. To espouse it means a step forward. They do not stop to inquire whence it came or whither it leads. Yet the fact remains that new ideas are often very bad ones, while many old ideas are sublime wisdom.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that if he is speaking of the report made by the gentleman from New York and myself, we only suggest the fixing of the prices in case of an announcement of an unreasonable price fails to produce the effect as a subsequent question in the legislation.

Mr. STERLING. I understand. I do not think the gentleman advocates in his report the fixing of prices absolutely, but he suggests the first step in that direction.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That I admit.

Mr. STERLING. And when that step is taken there is no turning back.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. If the gentleman will allow me, is it not true that that was attempted during the French Revolution and met with an inevitable failure, as it always will?

Mr. STERLING. I think that is true.

But this idea of recognizing monopoly and fixing the price of its product is not in fact new. Away back in the fourteenth century England sought to protect her people from the extortions of monopoly by fixing prices by law. Parliament fixed the price at which the baker should sell his bread and the butcher his meat. It fixed the price of clothing and many of the common necessities. Then it followed, as a necessary and logical sequence, that it should fix the price of labor which produced these things. This did not take into account the fact that the habits and needs of men are different, and so Parliament sought to regulate the habits and appetites of men by passing a statute determining just what a laboring man and his family should eat and wear. Of course, these laws were impracticable and unenforceable and gradually fell into disuse. They were repealed from time to time, the last being stricken from the laws of England as late as 1856. But out of this condition there were evolved certain great principles of the common law, dictated by a sound public policy, which denounced monopoly as against the common good. That is the law now in the civilized nations of the world, made so by the experience and wisdom of mankind.

Two reasons are assigned for the adoption of Government recognition and fixing the prices of monopoly products: First, it will avoid destructive competition. Second, it will result in more economic production. Both reasons are the pleas of the monopolist. He is willing to waive his right to cut prices against his competitor if his competitor is prevented from cutting prices against him. He would welcome a law which would protect him not only against the folly of his competitor but against his own folly. Men, however, do not, as a rule, destroy themselves in order to destroy others. Men and corporations, on an equal footing, operating under uniform laws which dispense equal justice and equal opportunities, can not destroy each other. It is true that many a business man and business concern has been eliminated from the business world by competition. That has occurred and can occur only when one of the competitors is so strong as to possess monopolistic power. It is the monopoly itself that can and does destroy competition. Destroy the monopoly and we will have no more destructive competition. We will have healthy and sane rivalry, in which the public will receive its due share of consideration.

The claim that combination of competing forces results in more economic production is refuted both by experience and reason. It is the fundamental fallacy from which proceeds this doctrine of Government recognition and the fixing of prices by legislation. Where a single interest controls the market in any line there is no incentive to more economic production. When that interest can fix the selling price it is immaterial to it what the cost price may be. Cheapness of production is not a requisite to successful profits. It is competition that impels the producer to economy. Cheapness, if he attains it, is his coigne of vantage. To secure it means success. Every energy of mind and muscle is bent to that end. Better methods and better machinery are devised and used; every waste of labor, material, and time is eliminated. Under the competitive system, in rivalry for the markets, the public receives some benefit from these improvements in cheaper cost of living.

I will venture the assertion that the production of iron and steel products in their finished form has not been cheapened at all during the 11 years the United States Steel Corporation has reigned over that industry. These hearings do not disclose an instance of improved methods or any notable improvement in machinery during that time. In the beginning this corporation was an aggregation of 15 other corporations producing iron and steel in different form, to which a number of others have since been added. So far as production is concerned, these several constituent parts of the steel corporation are still separate units as distinct in their management and manner of production as they were before. Nothing whatever occurred in the organization of this great holding company that changed the character of the constituent parts or that changed their management or their methods. They continue to this day in the same old way. It is reasonable to suppose, however, if they had remained competitors, instead of becoming partners, that some progress would have been made in the manufacture of steel. Under the old plan the steel industry developed rapidly. Carnegie developed the manufacture of iron and steel amidst the fiercest competition, and others followed close at his heels all the time. When this company sold its interests to the steel corporation it was producing iron and steel more cheaply than it had ever been produced before and just as cheaply as it has been produced since. Mr. Carnegie says that the success of his company was largely due to the wisdom of its management in cheapening the cost of production. Why should the United States Steel Corporation produce more cheaply than did its constituent parts before this trust was formed? It must be remembered that the United States Steel Corporation does not produce at all. It does not produce a pound of ore; it does not make or sell an ounce of iron or steel. The head and front of this great corporation is not made up of manufacturers, but of financiers, who do not concern themselves with the dull cares of mill and shop. They care nothing about methods, machinery, or processes. Those things are left to the management of the subsidiary companies, just where they were before. But there is a difference, and I will tell you what it is. These subsidiary companies are now partners instead of competitors. They are no longer rivals. Their profits are assured. There is no need of economy in production. New processes and inventions add nothing. They can not be used to outstrip a rival. Waste is not material, because the public pays the bills.

What is there in that situation that has a tendency to cheapen production? The only effect it could have, and the only effect it did have, on the cost of production was to add to the overhead charges the munificent salaries of the high-priced officials who direct its affairs.

No, gentlemen, cheaper production was not one of the purposes of the steel corporation. The only purpose of, and the only reason for, its existence is to control prices and output.

What of the so-called independents? There are a multitude of other companies which produce nearly, if not quite, half the iron and steel used in the United States. So far as the record shows, the only connection they have had with the United States Steel Corporation lies in the fact that they participated in the Gary dinners, which was quite sufficient. While they may be said to be in a sense competitors of the corporation, they are in no sense rivals of it or of each other. They exist by grace. This great organization has not pursued them, but it has led them. They know full well that it can go into their territory at any time and strike them down one by one. It can by reason of its monopolistic power bring about "destructive competition." It is not sufficient answer to say that the United States Steel Corporation has not greatly abused this power. The fact remains that the power exists, a menace to the public welfare and against sound public policy. All free people will submit to be ruled in their affairs by only one power, and that is the power which they delegate to a just government. [Applause.]

What I have said of the United States Steel Corporation is not intended as a criticism especially applicable to it. It was intended to illustrate, as best I could, the evil of all monopoly.

Those who espouse the doctrine of Government recognition of trusts and monopolies agree that it inevitably follows that Government shall fix the price of their products. This will be necessary in order to protect the public from extortion. But where will this lead us? If we fix the price of the product, must we not also fix the price of the raw material and of the labor that converts it? If we fix the price of labor, it follows that we must protect the laborer by fixing the price of those things that sustain labor, such as food, clothing, and shelter. Suppose, for the purpose of illustration, that the Government concludes to recognize the Beef Trust, if one exists, and fix the price at which it shall sell meat to the retailer. If we stop there, the profits of the Beef Trust will not be curtailed at all. We must remember that that great trust may now fix the price at both ends of the road—the price which it pays the farmer and the price which the retailer pays it. If, in order to protect the consumer, the price to the retailer should be greatly reduced, it will make but little difference to the Beef Trust, for it will recoup by reducing the price to the man who produces the cattle. If the farmer is not satisfied with that, then must Congress intervene and compel the farmer to produce cattle and sell them to the Beef Trust at a fixed price. How simple, but thus it is the whole propositon is reduced to an absurdity.

Gentlemen point, for a vindication of their theory, to the legislation by Congress regulating railroad rates. This furnishes no parallel to the situation in the industrial world. I think the Government may well determine maximum rates for freight and passengers. This is practicable, because transportation by rail is a natural monopoly. How few points in the country have competing lines to other points. There are, in some instances, parallel lines between the great railroad centers; but the vast majority of points where freight and passengers are received and delivered have no competing lines. This is so from the very nature of the business. There will not be and there can not be competition in transportation between all points, or any two points, until the volume of business justifies it. I am not so unreasonable as to contend for the competitive system, where competition is naturally impossible.

There is no half-way point in this proposed scheme. When we once have embarked on that course we will be impelled by the very logic of the situation to go to the end. All products, the products of the farm and the factory, the products of the mill and the mine, and all humanity which creates and consumes them, are so related and interdependent that, if a part, then all, must come under the dominion of this strange doctrine of governmental paternalism. If we pursue such a course, it will lead us, perhaps slowly, but none the less inevitably, to an extreme of socialism that no party in this country has ever yet dared to espouse.

It is urged that new industrial conditions render this proposed plan of Government recognition and price fixing desirable and necessary. What is this new industrial condition of which they talk? We have heard of it only in recent years. What has brought it about? Human nature and human needs are very much the same as a quarter of a century ago. Progress has gone on in a safe and steady course. The country has developed in wealth and civilization along lines tending to improve the conditions of her citizenship. I can not find, however, in this any reason or excuse for this new industrial condition which I agree exists and which gentlemen urge as the reason for this revolutionary proposal to change the whole industrial system of the country.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. I desire to ask if the gentleman recognizes that there could be such a thing as a legal combination as bearing upon this question?

Mr. STERLING. Does the gentleman mean a combination of corporations?

Mr. JACKSON. A combination of anything. We must realize, especially under the late decisions of our Supreme Court, that certain partnerships and purchases are legal; in other words, that the legal combination depends upon the intent rather than upon the machinery or vehicle by which it is accomplished.

Mr. STERLING. I put the limitation at monopoly. When any concern reaches the point that it has monopolistic power, then it ought to be checked. Many combinations may be made between producers that do not constitute a monopoly, and they will do no harm, but when they get to be so powerful that they can destroy competitors, then the Government ought to place a limitation upon it.

Mr. JACKSON. I agree with much of what the gentleman has said, but he does recognize that in the case of the railroads and in other cases the monopoly results from the nature of the business, and sometimes even from the size of the business, in a perfectly legal and even a moral way, does it not?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. In that case how can the Government escape the regulation of that monopoly?

Mr. STERLING. We are not escaping it. We are fixing maximum rates now in the case of railroads.

Mr. JACKSON. I do not want to take up too much of the gentleman's time, as I think he and I substantially agree, but the gentleman will remember that prior to the Munn case no one would have supposed that elevator charges could be a subject of public regulation. Does not the gentleman think that is true?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know what anybody supposed about it, but the court held they could be regulated.

Mr. JACKSON. And held they could be regulated because they had produced a monopoly in which the public was interested.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. JACKSON. I hope the gentleman will let me conclude my colloquy with the gentleman.

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. Now, if that is true there may be cases where the public will be absolutely helpless, where a business absolutely legally organized becomes a monopoly and a monopoly to such an extent that the public has an interest in it, unless the public steps in and regulates that business——

Mr. STERLING. Well, that is true.

Mr. JACKSON. In other words, the gentleman would not object to a regulation of prices of an elevator monopoly whether it was legal or illegal, would he?

Mr. STERLING. As I say, in all natural monopolies, I think, it is perfectly proper for the Government to fix a maximum rate——

Mr. JACKSON. And that is the only point of difference——

Mr. STERLING (continuing). There might be some other lines of business besides railroads that would develop into natural monopolies.

Mr. JACKSON. Might not a monopoly succeed in becoming a monopoly largely or almost wholly on account of its size?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. JACKSON. Then, the gentleman would favor public regulation?

Mr. STERLING. I favor public regulation in all of them; that is what I am urging here.

Mr. JACKSON. I mean even to the extent of regulating prices if it were the best way of controlling that sort of monopoly?

Mr. STERLING. If it were the best way, but it is not.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Let me put a question there and see if I can get the gentleman's idea. Suppose an industrial undertaking has a predominance in an industry indistinguishable from a monopoly, yet as that industry is clothed with no unfair advantage; suppose it is what we call a good trust, but does, as a matter of fact, present monopolistic features, would the gentleman dissolve such a trust as that?

Mr. STERLING. Under the plan which I suggest the Government will have supervision over the growth of all these industries, and if the time ever comes when by natural growth any of these industries get so large as to have monopolistic power, then I would limit the amount of capital that they could employ in that business.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Somewhat after the plan of Senator CUMMINS. Is the gentleman familiar with his plan?

Mr. STERLING. I am not familiar with it. I doubt now whether any important industry of the country simply, by natural growth or by the accretion of profits, would grow into a great monopoly. All monopolies from which we suffer to-day have been created by combinations of integral parts. That is what has produced these gigantic trusts which control the business of the country at this time. Not one of them, if they had not united their plants and their concerns, would have developed into the size we find them.

Mr. STANLEY. I quite agree with the gentleman except his idea of Federal incorporation. In all else I unequivocally concur, but I would ask in that connection, speaking of dissolving trusts, would the gentleman contend that the mere size of a business would subject it to dissolution under the Sherman Act? I am inclined to believe if they entered into no combination in restraint of trade it would not fall under the provisions of that act.

Mr. STERLING. I am suggesting my own ideas with reference to legislation. If, under the supervision of the Government, any concern should approach the size of monopoly, then the Government should limit the amount of capital. I would limit the capital rather than fix prices of products.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Now, the gentleman would not contend that no two companies should be allowed to combine, for instance, if they combined without any watered stock, providing the motive was not a restriction of competiton.

Mr. STERLING. If neither the motive nor the result was monopoly, they should be allowed to combine, of course.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. But if the result might be a monopoly from the growth of the combined companies?

Mr. STERLING. Then I would put a limitation on it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. That is to say, if the total amount of capital required for an industry were $500,000,000, you might say, no single industry shall be allowed to have more than one hundred or a hundred and fifty million for that business.

Mr. STERLING. I would limit it so it could not acquire a monopoly.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I can not yield further; my time has about expired.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest there have been so many interruptions of Mr. STERLING and because we are so much interested in the magnificent address he is making, that the Chair should take 10 or 15 minutes after the time has expired and add to his time on account of interruptions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not do that under the order of the House.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. How much time has the gentleman left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas, who is going to speak later, that the gentleman from Illinois consume the rest of this evening and the gentleman from Kansas and I both speak to-morrow evening.

Mr. JACKSON. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed so long as he sees fit this evening until 11 o'clock.

Mr. STERLING. I think 10 minutes is all the time I need.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can proceed under the unanimous consent.

Mr. STERLING. If we analyze this new industrial condition we will find that it is brought about by these very trusts, combinations in restraint of trade, and monopolies which the plan proposes to recognize and permit to exist. In fact, they are the new industrial condition. They have grown so great and strong in recent years that they constitute this new condition in themselves and that is all there is in this suggested reason for revolutionary legislation. If we suppress the trusts and monopolies we will obliterate the new industrial condition. If we prevent them in the future this new condition will never return to plague the people or to inspire statesmen with grotesque ideas of legislation. To contend that such a plan is necessary by reason of existing conditions is to admit that the people are powerless to dissolve harmful combinations and to render to all citizens equal rights and equal opportunities.

When we come to scrutinize the future possibilities of such a course it becomes abhorrent. Under such a plan, in course of time, every field of industrial activity will be occupied and dominated by some powerful monopoly, to the exclusion of all others. Such a law would throw around it a sacred circle within which no other may enter. Within its scope the trust magnate will be supreme. These present day captains of finance will become the feudal lords of industry, intrenched behind the law, secure in their titles and their profits. The great army of men and women, who by their skill and labor are to-day converting nature's materials to the uses of mankind, and who in a large measure constitute the very bone and sinew of the Republic will become an humble and despised vassalage shorn of that right of independent action, so essential to the dignity of free men. Caste will develop more rigid and unrelenting than any that ever hindered progressive civilization in the old world.

It has been our boast that all men are equal before the law, and our pride that opportunities were open to all alike. The recognition of such principles has been the glory of our institutions, and I am opposed to revolutionary measures which will destroy those principles. When they are gone what will become of the young man who has talent and ambition to get on in the world? At the threshold of his manhood he finds all opportunities preempted, and the avenues to wealth and distinction closed. To erect legal barriers to the hopes and aspirations of the young, means national and industrial decay.

It is proper that I should read here what the Supreme Court has said of monopoly and its effect upon the rights and opportunities of the American citizen. In the case of the Crescent City Live Stock Co. (111 U. S., 746) the Supreme Court of the United States held that certain monopoly features of the act incorporating the company were invalid. In the opinion, Mr. Justice Field used this language:

> As in our intercourse with our fellowmen certain principles of morality are assumed to exist, without which society would be impossible, so certain inherent rights lie at the foundation of all governmental action, and upon a recognition of them alone can free institutions be maintained. These inherent rights have never been more happily expressed than in the Declaration of Independence, "that new evangel of liberty" to the people: "We hold these truths to be self-evident"—that is, so plain that their truth is recognized upon their mere statement, "that all men are endowed," not by edicts of emperors or decrees of Parliament or acts of Congress, but "by their Creator, with certain inalienable rights"—that is, rights which can not be bartered away or given away, or taken away except in punishment of crime; "and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and to secure these," not grant them, but secure them, "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Among these inalienable rights, as proclaimed in that great document, is the right of men to pursue their happiness, by which is meant the right to pursue any lawful business or vocation, in any manner not inconsistent with the equal rights of others, which may increase their prosperity or develop their faculties, so as to give to them their highest enjoyment. * * * Whilst, therefore, I fully concur in the decision of the court that it was entirely competent for the State to annul the monopoly features of the original act incorporating the plaintiff, I am of the opinion that the act, in creating the monopoly in an ordinary employment and business, was to that extent against common right and void.

In the same case Mr. Justice Bradley said:

> I hold it to be an incontrovertible proposition of both English and American public law that all mere monopolies are odious and against common right. * * * The right to follow any of the common occupations of life is an inalienable right; it was formulated as such under the phrase "pursuit of happiness" in the Declaration of Independence, which commenced with the fundamental proposition that "all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This right is a large ingredient in the civil liberty of the citizen. To deny it to all but a few favored individuals, by investing the latter with a monopoly, is to invade one of the fundamental privileges of the citizen contrary not only to common right, but, as I think, to the express words of the Constitution. * * *
> Monopolies are the bane of our body politic at the present day. In the eager pursuit of gain they are sought in every direction. They exhibit themselves in corners, in the stock market and produce market, and in many other ways. If, by legislative enactment, they can be carried into the common avocations and callings of life, so as to cut off the right of the citizen to choose his avocation, the right to earn his bread by the trade which he had learned, and if there is no constitutional means of putting a check to such enormity, I can only say that it is time the Constitution was still further amended.

None will deny that the Supreme Court announced the true American doctrine in that case, and who would change that doctrine? To say that monopoly is against common right is in harmony with the natural sense of human justice. It is against common right because it deprives the citizen of equal protection and opportunity and bars him in his pursuit of happiness. We may by legislation change the legal status of monopoly, but we can never change its true character. It will forever be, in fact if not in law, against sound public policy. [Applause.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire to ask the gentleman if it is his understanding that those favoring the giving to an industrial commission the power to fix prices in certain cases desire to acquiesce in the existence of monopoly, or whether they desire to abandon the antitrust law, both statute and common law? I want to say that if the gentleman thinks so, I think he is badly mistaken.

Mr. STERLING. Does the gentleman mean to ask if the men who control these monopolies are in favor of that?

Mr. LAFFERTY. I mean the men who are now favoring a national industrial commission, as, for instance, the new Progressive Party.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know what their views are. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. I mean the able men of the party. I understand that the Progressives favor the power being lodged in a governmental tribunal to fix the maximum prices in certain cases, only as a cumulative remedy to dissolution and as a remedy to prosecutions under that law, and that we are not willing to acquiesce under monopolistic conditions.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] wish to continue to-night?

Mr. JACKSON. Oh, no.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Illinois sits down I shall be glad if he will permit me to ask him some questions. I was very glad to hear what the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] had to say, because on reading their platform—that is, the Progressive platform—I could not determine whether they intended that or not. It was quite different from the Outlook of last November.

Mr. LAFFERTY. If the gentleman will read Col. Roosevelt's speech, he will notice that he says that he would not abandon the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The Sherman antitrust law says you must destroy the monopolies. Col. Roosevelt says he would not destroy them. He is riding two horses that are traveling in opposite directions. He has clearly changed his opinions from those expressed in the Outlook last November. I knew he would, because you gentlemen who told us that you had seen his speech assured us that you could rest on his declaration in regard to the trusts. He has done exactly what you told him not to do. He has gone on and put in a statement that is equivocal in its nature; so much so that the American people do not know whether he is for recognition or for dissolution of the trusts to-day.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I stated a while ago that he is for dissolution.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. We are glad to hear it, but he has not said so. He has preserved the same beautiful silence on that question that he has preserved on the question of immigration, and he has expressed himself no more clearly on that than he has on the question of the tariff.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me a question there?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman does not deny that, under the Sherman antitrust law and the present interpretation of it by the courts, there may be monopolies which can not be dissolved?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Not being a lawyer, I could not say as to that. But I am aware that there are two features to the Sherman Antitrust Act—one being the prohibition of all combinations in restraint of trade and the other being that feature which forbids monopoly.

Mr. JACKSON. It forbids both monopoly and combination.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I know that combinations not in unreasonable restraint of trade are held to be not dissoluble. Whether a "good trust," which is not monopolistic, is, owing to its mere bigness, dissoluble under the law, I am unable to state until the court has spoken.

Mr. JACKSON. Of course it would not be dissoluble except as interpreted by the court, and as the court now interprets the law there is a distinction between monopoly and restraint of trade.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I understand that there is a distinction between monopoly and restraint of trade.

Mr. JACKSON. There is a difference in the definition but not in the penalty. The combination or the monopoly which results merely as an incident of a lawful contract, of course, can not be reached under the Sherman law under the present definition of the Supreme Court.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like at this point to put in the RECORD an interview with Col. Roosevelt in the New York World of July 5, in which he says he is in favor of the immediate repeal of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and says that it ought never to have been written, and never ought to have been enforced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] asks unanimous consent to put in the RECORD an article from the New York American containing the views of Col. Roosevelt.

Mr. STANLEY. An interview; and also to put in excerpts from his messages, in which he demanded the repeal of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky what his purpose in that is. Is it his purpose to prove that Col. Roosevelt is inconsistent?

Mr. STANLEY. Not to prove it, but to illustrate it.

Mr. BOWMAN. I want to ask the gentleman if the article is authenticated or not?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman can put it in in his own time. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] some questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

The article referred to is as follows:

REPEAL OF ANTITRUST LAW AND GOVERNMENT REGULATION—ROOSEVELT TO MAKE HIGH COST OF LIVING, AND NOT THE PROSECUTION OF THE TRUSTS, BUT THE SUPERVISION AND CONTROL OF THE TRUSTS, SUPREME ISSUES OF HIS CAMPAIGN—SUBSTITUTE OFFICIAL RECOGNITION OF THE TRUSTS, HE ADDS, BUT WITH DEFINITE CONTROL AND REGULATION BY THE GOVERNMENT—WILSON CAN NOT WIN, HE ASSERTS, AS FREE-TRADE PLATFORM IN DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM MEANS RUIN TO FARMERS AND TO INDUSTRY.

OYSTER BAY, July 5, 1912.

The policy of the Progressive Party respecting the trusts was taken up to-night in a three-hour discussion at Sagamore Hill. In the conference were Senator DIXON, Medill McCormick, George W. Perkins, Henry L. Stoddard, of New York, and C. J. Hamlin, one of the Roosevelt leaders of Erie County.

The New York American, which was the first newspaper to announce—which it did exclusively three months ago—that Roosevelt would bolt the Republican Party, although that seemed incredible at the time, can now announce the cardinal points of the Roosevelt platform.

The third party will declare unequivocally for Government regulation of the trusts as one of the means of reducing the high cost of living.

Roosevelt and his advisers agreed that the uncontrolled money combinations play a distinct part in the problem of existence. They worked over a plank that will declare for definite governmental control, with a view to giving the wage earner his share of what the colonel calls the "prize money" yielded by the tariff.

REGULATION HELD TO BE ESSENTIAL.

The argument was made at the conference that neither the Republican nor Democratic platform points the way to the solution of the tariff question. The mere assertion that the two parties favor reduction of the tariff, it was argued, does not strike at the vital and fundamental of the problem. What is needed—and this Col. Roosevelt impressed on his leaders—is absolute control of the concentrated industries, so that the power to keep up prices may be regulated not by the trusts but by the Government itself.

On the stump during the latter part of the summer, as Col. Roosevelt swings through the country on his campaign, he will denounce the encroachment of the trusts. He intends to challenge the Democratic and Republican candidates to show that their party platform points to any real way out of the industrial crisis into which, the colonel maintains, the country has been plunged.

ENTIRELY DIFFERENT LAW NEEDED.

"Gov. Wilson is a free trader," said Roosevelt, in speaking of the position of the Baltimore candidate in the campaign, "but he can not go out before the country upon the platform adopted at Baltimore. If he does, he can not hope to make a convincing campaign.

"The Democratic convention, as well as the Republican, declared for enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law. That law really should never have been put upon the statute books. I enforced it while I was President, taking the position that, as a law, it ought to be carried into effect, and so long as it was a law I would enforce it.

"What is needed now is an entirely different law, and one that does not work harm to the farmer, the toiler. The Sherman law, if strictly enforced, will immeasurably hurt the inoffensive person who, like the farmer, goes into a cooperative enterprise. The Democratic and Republican platforms are wrong in supporting it. No candidate can go before the people and urge its enforcement."

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Illinois indicates a belief that the cure proposed for this problem is to forbid corporations to have more than a certain amount of capital invested in business. Have I correctly grasped his idea?

Mr. STERLING. I think under proper Government supervision, forbidding watered stock, and forbidding combinations, there would be little possibility of any one industry reaching monopolistic size in the steel business, or in the meat business, or in any industrial business; but if it should, if any one should so outstrip the others that it should attain the power of destroying its competitors, then I would suggest as a remedy that it be limited in its capitalization.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will not the gentleman admit we are in that situation to-day?

Mr. STERLING. No; except by combinations and the formation of trusts.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. But I want to point out to the gentleman——

Mr. STERLING. Let me suggest further that if the United States Steel Corporation was dissolved, and if these constituent companies were then dissolved into their original integral parts—because they are nearly all of them made up by combinations of other corporations—there would not be any steel concerns in this country of any great magnitude at the present time.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No; but the gentleman forgets that one of those integral parts would be the Minnesota Iron Co., with most of the best ore land, and one would be the Gary company. I do not think it would be possible to dissolve them in the way the gentleman indicates. But what I want to ask the gentleman is this: If he is right in saying that the remedy is to forbid an excess of capital, he would not forbid a concern having as much as 30 per cent of the industry, would he?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know how much it should be.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce that the hour of 11 o'clock has arrived, the time fixed for adjournment under the order of the House.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The order under which we are acting says that we shall have six hours for debate, of which I am to control three. Owing to a recess being taken we did not begin this evening until 20 minutes past 8. How am I to have my three hours?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that in order that the time may be fairly divided we consider that the session to-night extend until 11.20 instead of 11 o'clock. I really think that clock up there is wrong.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more, to develop the idea which the gentleman from Illinois suggests.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The point I am trying to get at is that there are two distinct kinds of trusts. There is a trust which consists of one large organization, like the United States Steel Corporation or the International Harvester Co., and there is an entirely different kind of trust, such as the Beef Trust is alleged to be, which is nothing more nor less than four individuals or corporations, each with a limited capital, having as we are told an understanding amongst themselves as to prices. I simply point out that fact as a suggestion to the gentleman that the mere control of the amount of capital allowed to any one concern in a business will not force individuals to compete.

Mr. STERLING. That is a difference of opinion.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 9, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.
